Prosecutors and FBI agents said a confidential informant who is a U.S. citizen and was also at the training camp confirmed for authorities that Maldonado received firearms and bombmaking training and was aware al-Qaeda members were also being trained at the camp.

U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle said prosecutors plan to present evidence against Maldanado to a grand jury before March 13.

American Said To Have Ties To Al Qaeda Is Denied Bail (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 21 — An American convert to Islam who the government says took his family on jihad to Somalia and then lied to the F.B.I. was ordered held without bond Wednesday after a federal judge found sufficient evidence that he had been trained in weapons and bomb making by Al Qaeda.

The defendant, Daniel J. Maldonado, also known as Daniel Alijughaifi, recently lived in Houston and Boston. Mr. Maldonado was “a flight risk and danger to the community” and must remain in jail pending trial, the judge, Calvin Botley ruled.

But Judge Botley granted a defense request that Mr. Maldonado, 28, gaunt from malaria and malnutrition, be given extra rations in jail.

Mr. Maldonado was arrested in Kenya on Jan. 21 after Islamist insurgents in Somalia were routed by Somali and Ethiopian forces, and he was flown to Houston by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Feb. 12. His wife had died of malaria in Somalia, and their three children were flown by the F.B.I. to Mr. Maldonado’s parents in Londonderry, N.H., where Mr. Maldonado grew up. His mother, Rena Maldonado, said the family was too distraught to comment.

The government’s case is laid out in an F.B.I. affidavit based on statements attributed to Mr. Maldonado and corroborating information from a confidential witness, another American said to have been with him in Somalia. It portrays Mr. Maldonado as “angry with America,” supportive of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and “willing to become a suicide bomber if he were wounded and could not otherwise fight.”

The United States attorney in Houston, Don DeGabrielle, said he would ask a grand jury for an indictment before March 13. If convicted, Mr. Maldonado, one of at least 15 Americans charged with aiding Al Qaeda since the Sept. 11 attacks, could receive life in prison.

Brent E. Newton, the public defender for Mr. Maldonado, said his client had gone to Somalia to support a legal faction, the Islamic Courts Union, not Al Qaeda, and had trained only with “a hodgepodge of mujahadeen groups.” As for bomb-making, Mr. Newton said, “he watched some old man do this stuff, but merely watching someone do something is not conspiring with someone to do it.” Mr. Newton also questioned whether Mr. Maldonado had been properly advised of his rights.

At a two-day detention hearing that was unusual for the explicitness of the evidence disclosed, Mr. Maldonado was said to have given the F.B.I. false information, then admitted that he “wrote or told many dishonest statements” and revised his account while still falling short of the truth, an F.B.I. agent testified.

The agent, Lucille Eglen-Anderson, who questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, said he had also tried to recruit an American friend to join the Islamist insurgents battling the Somali and Ethiopian government forces. In a coded call, Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified, Mr. Maldonado said he was "at the culinary institute leaning how to make P.B.J."

She and other agents testified that Mr. Maldonado was at a terrorist training camp run by Al Qaeda, where he was learning to shoot an AK-47 and make bombs. The government charges that he "conspired to use a weapon of mass destruction, that is, a bomb" and received "military-type training from Al Qaeda."

Mr. Maldonado's allegedly conflicting statements to the F.B.I. came out after his lawyer, Mr. Newton, said Tuesday that he needed to see the statements in order to question Ms. Eglen-Anderson, whom he had called as an adverse witness.

Judge Botley then recessed the hearing until the government could provide them Wednesday morning.

Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified that other F.B.I. agents happened to be in Kenya when Kenyan authorities notified American officials that Mr. Maldonado had been captured, along with several British citizens and a Swede. They began questioning him on Jan. 27, 2007, she said, driving him to a safe house with a kitchen and a well-stocked refrigerator.

Although he was in the legal custody of the Kenyans, she said, Mr. Maldonado was read his Miranda rights about remaining silent and requesting a lawyer.

For reasons Mr. Newton did not explain, he read into the record large parts of Mr. Maldonado's statements to the F.B.I., beginning with a four-page document based on statements made on Jan. 27, in which Mr. Maldonado said he had gone to Somalia with his family "to open a bookstore" and to pursue other "business opportunities."

But in a second document read in court, Mr. Maldonado told the F.B.I. the next day that he had lied and "today I feel the need to tell the truth."

Two days later, on Jan. 30, Agent Eglen-Anderson testified, Mr. Maldonado went back over his original four-page statement to make and initial corrections. "I left out the fact that I wanted to fight jihad," he wrote.

He had told of meeting a certain sheik in Mogadishu, Somalia, but on Jan. 30 he added, "I left out the fact that he gave me a gun and magazine."

But he still did not reveal the full story of his activities, Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified. She said the F.B.I. knew this because of what agents had been told by an informant, another American who was described only as a confidential witness before agents first questioned Mr. Maldonado on Jan. 27. The informant was so trusted by the mujahadeen, the F.B.I. said, that they had asked him to return to the United States to recruit English-speaking women for terrorist missions.

The informant's identity remained secret, Mr. DeGabrielle, the United States attorney, said. "But if there's a trial," he added, "it will come out."

The Spanish Connection (WSJ)

By Edward Jay Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The 9/11 Commission relied on information derived from two captured al Qaeda perpetrators for much of its picture of the conspiracy leading up to the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The interrogations of these men -- Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or "KSM," who masterminded the plot and got Osama bin Laden to finance it, and Ramzi Binalshibh, who acted as KSM's liaison with lead suicide terrorist Mohammed Atta -- were performed by the CIA at secret locations.

KSM claimed that he left almost all the tactical details to Atta, and therefore could not say where Atta went, or whom he visited, in the final months of the plot. Binalshibh claimed he was Atta's only contact with al Qaeda during this period and that, other than himself, Atta never met with anyone on his trips abroad in 2001.

If these accounts are true, it follows that the conspiracy was a contained one, and the 9/11 Commission could preclude outside collaborators, including the participation of foreign countries. Thus, although the CIA was unable to trace the origin of the money supplied to Atta, the commission deemed this gap "of little practical significance" since the CIA's prisoners established that no one else was involved in the plot. Thus, too, when the CIA found that Iran had "apparently facilitated" the travel of eight of the 9/11 muscle hijackers in flights to and from Afghanistan (by not putting the required stamps on their passports, and by having a top Hezbollah official accompany their flights in and out of Iran), the commission could nevertheless rule out the possibility Iran or Hezbollah were "aware of the planning." The basis for this conclusion was the information provided by KSM and Binalshibh.

But what if these CIA prisoners -- who after all are diehard jihadists -- were lying?

Enter Judge Baltazar Garzon, Spain's terrorism magistrate, who has been for many years investigating the links between al Qaeda and a Spanish Islamic cell headed by one Imad Eddin Barakat Yarkas (who Mr. Garzon arrested in November 2001 and is currently in prison on a conspiracy conviction). The Spanish security service secretly had this cell under scrutiny since the mid-1990s; Mr. Garzon was thus able to draw on wiretaps, surveillance reports and other intelligence, as well as his own interrogations of suspects and captured documents from Afghanistan.

Mr. Garzon has produced a 697-page investigative report for Madrid's central court in September 2003, which charges that the Spanish cell -- through its connections to Mohammed Atta's Hamburg cell and some of the pilots it recruited -- helped plan, finance and support the 9/11 attacks.

In an interview, Mr. Garzon explained to me through an interpreter that the support of the Spanish cell began in the early days of the plot and continued up until the attack. He described evidence that ranged from video tapes that Spanish police had confiscated from the home of one of the Spanish conspirators, which methodically surveyed the twin towers of the World Trade Center from five different angles in the late 1990s, to a phone call intercepted by Spanish intelligence in August 2001 (at a time when the hijackers were buying tickets on the planes they planned to commandeer), in which an operative in London informed Yarkas that associates in "classes" had now "entered the aviation field," and were beheading "the bird." After drawing a diagram for me on a blackboard of how the Spanish cell connected to Atta's and Binalshibh's recruiters in Germany, he said it was "supporting the operation at every level."

Consider the unexplained activities of Atta and Binalshibh in Spain in 2001. Atta made two trips to Madrid, paid for with al Qaeda funds at critical points in the plot. The first one was in January, just after he finished his flight training classes in Florida and qualified as a pilot. The second one was just after most of the contingent of muscle hijackers had arrived in Florida in July. During that second trip, July 7 to July 19, Atta clocked 1,908 kilometers on his rented Hyundai and changed hotels frequently -- except for five nights, where he vanished from all hotel registries.

Atta's 9/11 co-conspirator, Binalshibh, also made two trips to Spain: The first, July 9 to July 16, was to the Terragona resort region near Barcelona, where he met up with Atta and then, during the same period, also vanished from the hotel registries. Binalshibh's second trip, Sept. 5 to Sept. 7, was to Madrid, where he obtained a bogus passport which he used to fly to Pakistan and make his escape to Afghanistan.

Why did Atta and Binalshibh make these trips? The 9/11 Commission turned to the CIA, which reported that Binalshibh (captured in 2002) said in his interrogation that neither he nor Atta had contacted anyone else in Spain. Thus the commission stated, "According to Binalshibh, they did not meet with anyone else while in Spain."

The problem here is that Atta and Binalshibh made independent trips to Spain. Atta went to Madrid in January when Binalshibh was in Germany; Binalshibh went to Madrid in September when Atta was in America. And when Atta arrived in Madrid on July 8, Binalshibh was in Hamburg. They were never in Madrid at the same time. On July 9, Atta did meet up with Binalshibh in the resort area of Terragona, but Atta then stayed in Spain three days after Binalshibh returned to Hamburg.

Presumably, they made separate trips because they had separate business, but the critical fact is this: Binalshibh was not in a position to know whom Atta did (or didn't) contact in Madrid or during his final three days in Spain.

Mr. Garzon argues that his extensive investigation of the Spanish cell directly contradicts Binalshibh's story that he and Atta had seen no one else.

Take, for example, the week they were together, July 9 to July 16. Both Atta and Binalshibh dropped from sight, leaving no hotel records, cellphone logs or credit-card receipts. Mr. Garzon reasons that someone organized a safe house for them to conduct their business.

That person, according to Mr. Garzon, is Mohamed Belfatmi, aka "Mohamed the Algerian," a man who had worked closely with the Spanish cell in getting its operatives in and out of Afghanistan for terrorist training. About a month before Atta's arrival in Spain, Belfatmi rented a house in Terragona very near to where Atta's rented car was last seen parked.

Mr. Garzon says that Belfatmi's house was used for the 9/11 "final planning sessions." From telephone intercepts, Mr. Garzon has established that Binalshibh was in contact with Belfatmi after the latter had returned to Germany. And in a brief call Belfatmi made to Yarkas on Sept. 1, Yarkas, correctly suspecting that his phone was being tapped, abruptly cut Belfatmi off, telling him not to continue with "that theme."

Later that week, Belfatmi flew to Karachi with Binalshibh's and Atta's Hamburg roommate and fellow al Qaeda cell member Said Bahaji, staying with him at the same hotel. Binalshibh arrived in Karachi on a separate flight. So did other members of the Hamburg cell, who along with Belfatmi and Bahaji escaped to Afghanistan (and have not been yet apprehended).

Mr. Garzon concluded that Binalshibh knew both Yarkas -- whose private number he had in his address book -- and Belfatmi. According to Mr. Garzon, Binalshibh "was clearly lying to the CIA to protect those he and Atta saw in Spain."

Baltazar Garzon, known for his prosecutorial zeal, is a controversial figure in Spain, having investigated everything from Basque terrorism to the Madrid bombing investigation whose alleged perpetrators are currently on trial in Madrid. But even many who don't agree with his methods -- or his politics -- agree he is on solid ground in his relentless pursuit of the connections between the Spanish cell and al Qaeda.

Yet if Mr. Garzon is correct about the Spanish connection to 9/11, it is not only the effectiveness of the CIA's interrogation of its al Qaeda prisoners that is called into question. The information from Binalshibh, KSM and other detainees was used to fill in the missing pieces of the jigsaw, and those gaps concerned the contacts the 9/11 conspirators might have had with others wishing to harm America. By saying that no one else was involved -- not in Spain, Iran, Hezbollah, Malaysia, Iraq, the Czech Republic or Pakistan -- these detainees allowed the 9/11 Commission to complete its picture of al Qaeda as a solitary entity.

Yet to come to its conclusion on this most fundamental issue, the commission was prohibited from seeing any of the detainees whose accounts it relied on. Nor was it allowed even to question the CIA interrogators to determine the way that information was obtained. The commission's joint chairmen themselves later acknowledged that they "had no way of evaluating the credibility of detainee information." So when Judge Garzon comes up with evidence that runs counter to detainees' claims, cracks begin to emerge in the entire picture.

Affirming Military Tribunals (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals decision on Tuesday upholding the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress last year is a welcome victory for common sense in the war on terror. Now we'll find out if the Supreme Court meant what it said last year about deferring to the two elected branches on the handling of enemy combatants.

We never had a problem with the Bush Administration's plan to set up military commissions shortly after 9/11. It is the duty of the executive branch -- which can act with dispatch and be held accountable by voters -- to conduct wars. And military tribunals have been successfully employed by past Presidents, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR.

Nevertheless, the Administration's critics kept insisting that enemy combatants captured in the war on terror were entitled to due process considerations while hostilities continued. And they took their arguments all the way to the Supreme Court.

The result was last year's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. That 5-3 ruling (Chief Justice John Roberts was recused) did not, as many on the left believe, question the government's right to set up military tribunals or hold unlawful combatants for the duration of the war. Rather, the Court held that the Pentagon's tribunals in place at the time violated certain rules in the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Furthermore, the Court invited Congress to revise these rules. In his concurring opinion, Justice Stephen Breyer reiterated that the majority took issue not with the existence of these tribunals, but with the way they had come into being. "Nothing prevents the President from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary," wrote Justice Breyer.

In a separate concurrence, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that "as presently structured, Hamdan's military commission exceeds the bounds Congress has placed on the President's authority." But he added, "Because Congress has prescribed these limits, Congress can change them."

That's exactly what lawmakers did in passing the Military Commissions Act that President Bush signed into law last October. The appellate court's 2-1 ruling this week, which held that Guantanamo detainees don't have the right to challenge their imprisonment in federal courts, affirms the constitutionality of that law. A Supreme Court appeal is likely. But a reversal would require the Justices not only to defy the will of the other two branches but also to ignore their own instructions to Congress in Hamdan.

Not that some won't be urging such a course of action. In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers argues that the Military Commissions Act, which effectively suspends habeas corpus for terrorist detainees, is unconstitutional. But the majority opinion, written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, is solidly anchored in Supreme Court jurisprudence. And the Court has long held that aliens held overseas have no constitutional rights unless Congress decides to confer them statutorily.

"Precedent in this court and the Supreme Court holds that the Constitution does not confer rights on aliens without property or presence within the United States," wrote Judge Randolph. He cited as the "controlling case" the Supreme Court's Johnson v. Eisentrager decision, the 1950 ruling rejecting the proposition that aliens are entitled to Fifth Amendment rights outside of the U.S.

The Court in Eisentrager went on to explain why it's prudent not to confer constitutional rights on enemy combatants: "If the Fifth Amendment confers its rights on all the world . . . [it] would mean that during military occupation irreconcilable enemy elements, guerrilla fighters, and 'werewolves' could require the American Judiciary to assure them freedoms of speech, press, and assembly as in the First Amendment, right to bear arms as in the Second, security against 'unreasonable' searches and seizures as in the Fourth, as well as rights to jury trial as in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments."

We don't doubt that antiwar activists and lawyers at the ACLU would have no problem granting such protections to suspected al Qaeda members and their allies. And such critics in Congress of tribunals as Senate Judiciary Chairman Pat Leahy have every right to try to rewrite the Military Commissions Act, if they have the political nerve. But we're also sure that prosecuting a war on terror would be significantly more difficult as a result. Having so ostentatiously invited Congress to act in Hamdan, the Supreme Court could also now help the country and its own reputation by agreeing with Judge Randolph.

American Liberty At The Precipice (NYT)

In another low moment for American justice, a federal appeals court ruled on Tuesday that detainees held at the prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, do not have the right to be heard in court. The ruling relied on a shameful law that President Bush stampeded through Congress last fall that gives dangerously short shrift to the Constitution.

The right of prisoners to challenge their confinement — habeas corpus — is enshrined in the Constitution and is central to American liberty. Congress and the Supreme Court should act quickly and forcefully to undo the grievous damage that last fall's law — and this week's ruling — have done to this basic freedom.

The Supreme Court ruled last year on the jerry-built system of military tribunals that the Bush Administration established to try the Guantánamo detainees, finding it illegal. Mr. Bush responded by driving through Congress the Military Commissions Act, which presumed to deny the right of habeas corpus to any noncitizen designated as an "enemy combatant." This frightening law raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. And it gives the government the power to take away habeas rights from any noncitizen living in the United States who is unfortunate enough to be labeled an enemy combatant.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which rejected the detainees' claims by a vote of 2 to 1, should have permitted the detainees to be heard in court — and it should have ruled that the law is unconstitutional.

As Judge Judith Rogers argued in a strong dissent, the Supreme Court has already rejected the argument that detainees do not have habeas rights because Guantánamo is located outside the United States. Judge Rogers also rightly noted that the Constitution limits the circumstances under which Congress can suspend habeas to "cases of Rebellion or invasion," which is hardly the situation today. Moreover, she said, the act's alternative provisions for review of cases are constitutionally inadequate. The Supreme Court should add this case to its docket right away and reverse it before this term ends.

Congress should not wait for the Supreme Court to act. With the Democrats now in charge, it is in a good position to pass a new law that fixes the dangerous mess it has made. Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Arlen Specter,

Republican of Pennsylvania, have introduced a bill that would repeal the provision in the Military Commissions Act that purports to obliterate the habeas corpus rights of detainees.

The Bush administration's assault on civil liberties does not end with habeas corpus. Congress should also move quickly to pass another crucial bill, introduced by Senator Christopher Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, that, among other steps, would once and for all outlaw the use of evidence obtained through torture.

When the Founding Fathers put habeas corpus in Article I of the Constitution, they were underscoring the vital importance to a democracy of allowing prisoners to challenge their confinement in a court of law. Much has changed since Sept. 11, but the bedrock principles of American freedom must remain.

A War Under Law (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Smith

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Congress Must Address U.S. Detainee Policies

In November, Americans voiced their frustration with the war in Iraq and gave control of Congress to the Democrats. The voters rejected the president's swaggering, go-it-alone approach and the administration's contemptuous attitude toward the Geneva Conventions, which led to the abuses at Abu Ghraib, actions that so damaged our credibility that other nations are much less willing to cooperate in the war on terrorism. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and her able legal adviser, John Bellinger, have pushed for reforms that have begun to reverse this trend -- but much more must be done.

Sens. Christopher J. Dodd and Patrick J. Leahy introduced legislation last week that will move us further in the right direction. But there are three things Congress should do.

First, Congress should reconsider the detainee legislation passed last fall. Last-minute changes rammed through by the White House watered down many of the bill's key provisions. On the treatment of detainees and interrogation techniques it created two standards -- one for the military and another for the CIA. The standards for the military are in an Army Field Manual, but the CIA standards are to be enumerated in a presidential executive order. Rumors suggest that the White House is struggling to develop those rules. Congress should relieve the president of that task before he makes a bad situation worse.

If Vice President Cheney has his way, a good dunking may be among the approved CIA techniques, even though "waterboarding" is prohibited by the Army Field Manual. Cheney's October remarks that dunking a detainee was " a no-brainer" were irresponsible and added to the confusion in the field (and around the world) about the rules for treatment of detainees.

It is not clear why the military and the CIA should have different standards for the treatment and interrogation of detainees. All U.S. agencies should use the techniques best able to elicit information that is vital to our security. And why should the CIA once again be asked to take risks not knowing whether, when the political winds change in Washington, its officers will be left facing charges that they violated the law?

Hearings should be held to determine which interrogation techniques have produced useful intelligence. Lawmakers should review the recent report of the government's Intelligence Science Board, which concluded that there was no scientific evidence that coercive techniques produced good intelligence. Congress should also consider the requirements of international law and develop a single standard that will apply equally to all agencies.

Second, Congress should repeal the provisions that stripped detainees at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere of the right of habeas corpus and that instead gave them an extremely limited right to challenge their detentions. A federal appeals court, interpreting lawmakers' last effort, ruled Tuesday that detainees do not have the right to use a habeas petition to challenge the basis of their detention. The case will surely be appealed to the Supreme Court because detainees must have the right to argue to a federal judge -- not a military officer, as in the current law -- that the factual basis on which they are being held indefinitely and without criminal charges is not accurate. Detainees' right to habeas corpus could be limited, as was suggested by Sens. Arlen Specter and Patrick Leahy, to prevent frivolous lawsuits over conditions at Guantanamo. But detaining men with no hope of a fair hearing ensures that, if they weren't terrorists when they were detained, they probably will be when they are finally released.

Third, Congress should also examine the practice of "rendition," or sending detainees to countries for trial or detention where, it is alleged, they can be mistreated or tortured. Before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, rendition was a valuable but selectively used tool of U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies. Since Sept. 11 it has been used extensively, and its continued viability has been questioned. Congress should establish a solid legal footing for renditions, including measures to ensure that anyone sent to another country is not mistreated.

The administration should listen, really listen, to the American people and to those in Congress and the military who understand that adhering to international law and our core values will help us win the war on terrorism. It will take years to get out of the hole we're in, but if Congress leads and the president understands, we can begin climbing out.

Drop This Case (WP)

"FOR THE rule of law to prevail, litigation must have a beginning and an end." So wrote Judge Bruce Einhorn in a federal case that has become the Jarndyce and Jarndyce of immigration law-- it passed the 20-year mark last month. The saga of the Los Angeles Eight, though their number is now down to two, involves Palestinians whom the government has been seeking to deport for their activities on behalf of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) -- activities such as raising money, holding meetings and distributing magazines in the mid-1980s. Six of the group have since been granted residency status, and the government hasn't moved against them. But two, Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh, remain the subject of deportation proceedings, though they were legal permanent residents at the time of their activities. They have never been accused of any terrorist action or criminal violation, and the government concedes that their actions would be constitutionally protected if they were U.S. citizens.

The PFLP is a loathsome group that has carried out terrorist activities. It was an important and legitimate policy change, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to tighten the law to make raising money here for terrorist groups a crime. But that law was not in place when Mr. Hamide and Mr. Shehadeh were allegedly involved with the PFLP; they say they were never members but only distributed its magazine. At this point, if not from the outset, the pursuit of two law-abiding, middle-aged men with roots and families in this country is misplaced and even self-defeating on the part of the government. The case of the Los Angeles Eight has become an unnecessary flash point for Arab Americans convinced that the government is discriminating against them.

In addition, the government's behavior undercuts its argument for deportation. "A reasonable argument could be made that if Hamide and Shehadeh have engaged in terrorist activity, particularly in the context of today's world, then the government would be prepared to move heaven and Earth -- not to mention some mounds of paper -- to complete the trial and deportation" of them, Judge Einhorn wrote. Instead, the government has delayed presenting its case and ignored court orders to turn over potentially exculpatory evidence. "The repeated actions of the government in not complying with the court's orders have prevented" the two men "from obtaining fair hearings and closure in their case," Judge Einhorn concluded, calling the government's behavior "an embarrassment to the rule of law."

It's well past time for this to end. The government has until the end of the month to appeal the judge's ruling. It should, instead, drop this case, as it should have done years ago.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Safe (AP)

By Chase Squires, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE, Colo. -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured a federal prison holding some of the nation's most violent and disruptive inmates on Wednesday and said the facility is secure, but he conceded that it could be improved.

"Are there challenges? Yes," said Gonzales, the nation's top law enforcement official. "Can we do better? Yes."

Gonzales agreed to visit the prison, known as Supermax, after Colorado's two senators raised concerns about staffing and security.

He stopped short of promising to increase the number of guards or build an additional fence around the compound, as some state and local officials have advocated. Instead, he said he was willing to listen.

"The question is reaching a general consensus on what is needed," Gonzales said. "There may be additional staffing that we can provide to the facilities here."

Supermax, 90 miles southwest of Denver, houses 474 of the nation's most notorious convicts, including Olympic bomber Eric Rudolph and Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

Security at the 490-bed prison, built in 1994 for $60 million, has been under scrutiny for months. Last year, an arbitrator found that staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail.

The Justice Department says that all mail and phone calls to and from inmates labeled as terrorists have been monitored since October, and that perimeter security has been beefed up.

Sens. Wayne Allard, a Republican, and Ken Salazar, a Democrat, accompanied Gonzales.

John Gage, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees, also took the tour. He said prison officers are not asking for more money, just more staff.

Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, also on the tour, said Supermax staffing is higher than it was five years ago and enough to safely manage the facility.

AG Rates Supermax Up To Par (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 22, 2007

After tour, Gonzales "comfortable" with prison setup

Florence - A battle over how to run the nation's booming federal prison system intensified Wednesday as U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, guard-union leaders and lawmakers toured the ultra- high-security Supermax facility and held an unofficial summit.

Gonzales emerged two hours later and pronounced Supermax up to par, lauding recent efforts to make sure mail and phone calls from terrorist prisoners are monitored.

"I'm comfortable with where we are at today on this issue," he said after a Supermax tour that was off-limits to reporters.

But guard-union leaders bristled, warning that thin staffing has put prisons on the brink of disastrous riots as the nation's federal inmate population approaches 200,000.

Supermax union president Barbara Batulis, who accompanied Gonzales, said terrorists housed there still are able to communicate with followers in Spain and Iraq.

Union leaders have begun mobilizing a lobbying blitz to demand $500 million from Congress to hire more guards nationwide, said John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees.

New surveillance technology at Supermax and other prisons ignores the core issue of inadequate staffing, Gage said. "Those cameras will not replace correctional officers. And electric fences? We're not talking about escapes here. We're talking about safety within the walls," he said.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, who accompanied Gonzales along with U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, also raised questions.

Federal prison chiefs "have to do more. They have to recognize ... we need to have much more linguistic capability in Arabic" in order to understand and assess terrorist-prisoner communications, said Salazar, D-Colo.

Allard, R-Colo., praised Gonzales for being "willing to sit down and listen" in what he and Salazar cast as a continuing dialogue about prison conditions.

Gonzales runs the Justice Department, which oversees some 114 federal prisons. After meeting with guards and supervisors Wednesday, he acknowledged their anxieties. But he made no commitment to hire more guards here or build an outer-perimeter fence.

Improvements in the future are possible. "We're always evaluating what we do," Gonzales said, flanked by Bureau of Prisons director Harley Lappin at a news conference. It's up to Lappin to identify problems in prisons such as increasing assaults, Gonzales said.

In recent days here, outbreaks of violence prompted tower guards at the high-security U.S. Penitentiary adjacent to Supermax to fire lethal and nonlethal rounds to stop inmates from killing one another, said Ken Shatto, union president at the penitentiary.

"Today I'm trying to head off full-blown riots," he said. "That's where I think we are headed. This is no good for the safety and security of staffers and inmates alike."

In Supermax, assaults on guards have increased and convicted terrorists seem to be communicating more by shouting between their cells, while three new interpreters struggle to monitor phone calls and recreation-area communications as well as screen mail, guards and union officials said.

Threats to kill staff members have increased to about 110 last year, double the number in 2005, said chief union steward Bob Snelson, who represented guards last fall before an arbitrator who found dangerous understaffing.

Guards lament that, after a Justice Department inspector general's report and lawmakers focused attention on problems at Supermax last fall, federal prison chiefs began moving staff from the neighboring penitentiary and medium-security prison to Supermax.

"It's a shell game with bodies," Batulis said. These moves increased pressures at the other facilities, where riots in January left several guards injured.

The inspector general's report last fall indicated that three terrorists convicted in the World Trade Center attacks of 1993 wrote more than 90 letters to Islamic extremists outside the prison.

A Bureau of Prisons document made available Wednesday said that newly hired language specialists have not received sufficient intelligence training and that "BOP's intelligence capability ... is not well-developed."

Attorney General Tours Supermax (PUEBCHF)

By Tracy Harmon

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison - Supermax - Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety.

Gonzales toured the prison with U.S. Sens. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., and Wayne Allard, R-Colo., as well as Federal Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin and U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colo. Gonzales is the second of the nation's chief law enforcement officers to visit the prison - former U.S. Attorney Janet Reno helped dedicate Supermax in January 1995.

"I heard from Senators Salazar and Allard their concerns about the facility here in Florence and what we could do," Gonzales said. "We had good discussions with staff today and are committed to a safe facility here and at facilities throughout the nation.

"I want to ensure we are doing everything we can for the wonderful people who work here and the safety of the community," Gonzales said.

Salazar said since he and Allard took separate tours of Supermax late last year that additional staff have been added, technology has been improved and in lieu of perimeter fencing being added, a control tower has been enhanced to provide a 360 degree view of the complex and an armored vehicle has been added to patrols.

"We are committed to making sure this is the safest and most secure for the protection of the people who work and live here," Salazar said.

Guard towers loom over the Supermax facility, the highest security area at the Federal Prison in Florence. Officials there told U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that perimeter security for the federal prison complex had been increased in recent months.

Allard said the tour Wednesday was fruitful.

"This is a great complex with employees that do a great job. We probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the concerns at least right away, but more employees and more security could be coming in the future," Allard said.

Since the Inspector General's office issued a report last year detailing relaxed inmate phone and mail monitoring, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the general mail being sent to or from inmates designated as terrorist inmates since October of last year. Mail is not delivered to or sent from terrorist inmates until after it is read and translated if necessary.

Lappin said the bureau has added additional translator analysts. As a result, 100 percent of phone calls for terrorist inmates are monitored; however, because language translators may not always be available, the prison records the conversations for later translation.

According to a Bureau of Prisons press release, the Supermax prison is at 92 percent staffing level with 327 staff members. Lappin was questioned about a bureau report which indicated that a minimum 240 correctional officers are needed at the prison.

"There were 185 correctional officers at this same time last year. It may have been that 240 were needed years and years ago, but with the current population, we can safely manage with the number of officers we have - staff numbers coming down at a prison after it has opened is not uncommon," Lappin said.

Gonzales was questioned about union officials' characterization of a general deterioration of all federal prisons.

"I have heard the anxiety and I would like to know the source. Have there been an increased number of assaults and if in fact there have and those concerns exist, we have good communication in place to resolve the issues," Gonzales said.

"There is anxiety with any change and how to manage an increasing prison population," Lappin said. "Are there challenges? Yes. Can we do better? Yes. This is what this (tour) is all about."

Technology improvements at Supermax include the addition of 96 cameras over the past two years, replacing 64 older cameras for a total of 400 cameras in operation in the prison. A complexwide armed mobile patrol vehicle was added in December to provide additional perimeter security.

A beefed-up command tower has been made taller and outfitted with an encrypted monitoring system which provides ground-level and overhead views of all four prisons at the complex. In addition, plans are in place to further enhance the abilities of the tower.

In terms of future spending and oversight of additional funds being funneled to the Department of Justice, Allard said he and Salazar will continue to work with the bureau and participate in budget hearings to ask tough questions.

Supermax Security Concerns Are Being Addressed, AG Says (RMN)

Staffing levels adequate; mail, calls monitored

FLORENCE - All the mail and telephone calls of terrorists housed at Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison, are being monitored under new tighter security procedures, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday after touring the prison.

Less certain are other security improvements sought by the prison's staff and the townspeople of Florence, including more corrections officers and a perimeter fence around the four-prison federal complex that includes Supermax.

Supermax's 475 inmates are considered the most dangerous in the country's federal prison system and include a roster of international and domestic terrorists: Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef, shoe bomber Richard Reid, Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, and Olympic and abortion clinic bomber Eric Rudolph.

Security troubles cast the prison into the national spotlight last fall after a Justice Department inspector general's report found that a shortage of Arabic translators prevented the screening of dozens of letters from convicted terrorists to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004.

That problem has been solved, said Gonzales, who toured the prison with Colorado's two U.S. senators, Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, and Rep. Doug Lamborn, whose congressional district includes the prison.

"I am confident that we're doing what we should be doing monitoring communications in and out of the facility," Gonzales said.

About 30 Supermax prisoners have been designated terrorists by the courts, making them subject to special security measures.

Federal Bureau of Prisons officials said that since last October it has monitored 100 percent of the mail and phone calls of the designated inmates.

The Bureau of Prisons also has beefed up its counterterrorism unit to enhance monitoring of terrorist inmates' communications and two FBI agents have been assigned to the prison, officials said.

Other prison security improvements may not come about as quickly.

The Supermax staffing level was 15 percent to 25 percent below what the Bureau of Prisons defined in a 2005 "mission critical" report as the minimum staffing level to operate the prison safely, officials of the prison employees' union said last summer.

Since then, the staff has been increased from fewer than 180 to 193, with several of the new employees coming from the neighboring high-security and medium-security prisons in the Florence complex.

"It's robbing Peter to pay Paul," said Barbara Batulus of the Association of Federal Government Employees, which represents the federal prison staffers.

But Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, who accompanied Gonzales Wednesday, said he was comfortable with the current Supermax staffing level.

No Promises For Supermax Fence, Guards (COLOSG)

U.S. attorney general says security has been improved

FLORENCE - The nation's top law enforcement official said Wednesday that recent changes have improved safety at the federal Supermax prison, home to terrorists and many of the nation's most dangerous criminals.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales didn't pledge to hire more staff or build a perimeter fence — two of the concerns that have been voiced by local officials and the union representing Supermax employees — but said such measures are still options.

"There has been additional staffing. We've got additional technology in place," Gonzales said during a news conference after touring the prison. "We've provided additional tools to deal with the concern about perimeter fencing."

Gonzales visited the prison at the request of U.S. Sens. Wayne Allard, a Republican, and Ken Salazar, a Democrat, who accompanied Gonzales on Wednesday, along with U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colorado Springs.

The prison has been under fire since last fall, when a federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail and an arbitrator ruled staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees.

Officials said more mail screeners have been hired, and new hires have brought the number of correctional officers to 193. There were 240 when the prison opened. Officials said 92 percent of authorized positions have been filled.

"We believe we can safely manage this institution with the current population and the current procedures with the number of correctional staff we have," said Harley Lappin, director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, who also toured the prison.

Officials also touted the addition of 96 cameras, an armed mobile patrol vehicle, a new communications tower with an overhead view of the entire complex and other "technological advances" to improve security.

The senators praised the changes at the prison, though they said more new officers may be needed — something Gonzales said would be considered if deemed necessary.

"We're not able to hit 100 percent of what we want to have here," Allard said. "We're probably not going to be able to take care of all of these concerns, at least immediately."

Gonzales said a perimeter fence, estimated to cost $20 million, is still on the table, though it doesn't appear necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0134986

"The question is, is that a wise use of taxpayer dollars going forward?" Gonzales said. "That's something the senators and I will be engaging in a dialogue about.

"I am committed to ensuring that we have safe and secure facilities, not just here but throughout all of our federal facilities," he said.

State Rep. Liane "Buffie" McFadyen, whose district includes Supermax and 11 other prisons, has been one of the most vocal Supermax critics. She said more officers are still needed.

"If I have to choose between the increased staff from the bureau or the fence, I would like the staff," McFadyen said.

Supermax Tour (KXTU)

By Christina Salvo

KXTU-TV, Fox 21, Colorado Springs/Pueblo, February 22, 2007

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the Supermax Prison in Florence Wednesday along with Senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard to see what steps have been taken to improve the safety and security of the facility.

The prison has been criticized by state and federal officials because of staffing levels inadequate monitoring and security measures. Supermax houses some of the most harden criminals including both foreign and domestic terrorists, which is what raised so many eyebrows when a report came out last year faulting the facility for among other things not reading all incoming and outgoing mail from the highest-risk prisoners and not monitoring telephone calls.

"I am confident were doing what should be doing to monitor communication both in and out of these faculties," said Attorney General Gonzales.

Big words following big steps that have been taken in the last few months to address security and safety issues in what should be the nation's most secure penitentiary.

"The issue of additional staffing: there are now some additional correctional officers that have been added to this facility," said Sen. Salazar.

Presently the Department of Justice reports 92% of authorized positions are filled putting the inmate-to-staff ratio at 1.5:1, the lowest of its kind in comparison.

But is that enough for a prison housing some of the world's most dangerous criminals?

"I think we have additional funding and one of the things we will look at is should there be additional staffing," said the Attorney General.

While he has pledged his commitment and obligation to addressing any additional security needs, the question the Attorney General said will be reaching a consensus on what is absolutely needed. A perfect example is the debate over what some said is the need to replace the "cow fence" that currently lines the perimeter with a hardened one. Since the issue was 1st raised additional steps have been taken to address that concern . We now have armed mobile patrol, now have a tower with additional surveillance. So the question now is whether that is a wise use of tax payers dollars," said Gonzales.

With regard to the concern over monitoring inmate communication the Department of Justice reports that the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100% of mail sent and received by inmates designated as terrorists as well as their phone calls.

While the Attorney General Gonzales said he is satisfied with the steps that have been taken, more can be done to continue to safeguard those who work inside Supermax and those that live in the surrounding area.

US Attorney General Addresses Supermax Security (KRDO)

By Stephanie Wurtz

KRDO-TV, ABC 13, Colorado Springs, February 22, 2007

It houses some of the most dangerous criminals in the world, but is Colorado's Supermax Prison secure? The nation's top law enforcement official toured the complex Wednesday. After his tour, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he's confident in the security of the prison complex and is satisfied that steps have already been taken to address safety concerns. But he and Colorado's lawmakers agree: work at Supermax is not done. "We all care, in a very united way, that we have safe and secure facilities," says Sen. Ken Salazar, (D) Colorado, "there are issues that have been raised and we have addressed some of those." Addressing concerns by adding some staff and security cameras.

The complex has also employed translators and increased the monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls. "Whether or not they have any terrorist connections, whether or not they've been ordered to subject to any administrative restrictions, will dictate the level of monitoring that does occur," says Gonzales, "but we've had some good discussions about that and I'm confident we're doing what we should be doing." One item still unresolved-- the question of whether the complex needs more perimeter fencing. "We now have armed mobile patrols, we now have a tower that provides additional surveillance," Gonzales says of increased perimeter security, "so the question is whether or not [perimeter fencing] is a wise use of taxpayers' money going forward."

Lawmakers and law enforcement will continue to discuss that issue and any future changes may be needed at Supermax. "Not only is this a great complex that does a great job, but also," says Sen. Wayne Allard, (R) Colorado, "we understand that we're probably unable to meet 100% if the needs of what we want to do here." But Gonzales says the tour was a step forward in what he calls an ongoing process. "We're always evaluating what we do; not just in this area, but everything we do in fighting crime and fighting terrorism," says Gonzales. The attorney general didn't offer any specifics about what may be next in the future of Supermax, but did reiterate the fact that discussions will continue.

Guard Union Calls 'new' Staffers Shell Game By Feds (PUEBCH)

By Tracy Harmon, THE PUEBLO CHIEFTAIN

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE - Union officials on Wednesday accused the Federal Bureau of Prisons of taking correctional staff intended for other prisons to help staff the Supermax penitentiary.

The Supermax, which is referred to by prison officials as the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary, houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including convicted terrorists.

"We got our 18 (additional officers), but they are taking staff from other institutions and funneling them to ours," said Barb Batulis, American Federation of Government Employees Local 1302 president for the Supermax. "It is like robbing Peter to pay Paul and they are trying to put it back on me because I told them they had to do something about the staffing."

Union officials suspect that the 18 new officers put on staff at Supermax actually were supposed to go to work at the lower security Federal Correctional Complex prisons in Florence. The complex houses four prisons - Supermax, the high-security United States Penitentiary, the medium-security Federal Correctional Institution and a low-security camp.

"Even with the additional staff, we are still below 'mission critical' levels of at least 20 correctional officers," Batulis said. "And we haven't gotten any additional (Arabic) translators. We still have just three and that is not a lot to monitor all the calls and mail for the (terrorist) inmates."

Holly Pruyne, who is the Local 1300 president representing the medium security and camp prisons, said five correctional officers intended for the Federal Correctional Institution were reassigned to Supermax.

"The FCI has a maximum rated capacity of 794 inmates. We are at 1,174 inmates now and are going up to 1,300. We have 79 percent of the staff we need for the basic mission critical status," Pruyne said.

Union officials said on Jan. 3 and Jan. 9, when disturbances were occurring at the high-security penitentiary, staff from both Supermax and the FCI responded to help. With a total of 42 staffers responding, the incidents left the FCI with few officers and inmates who were not on lock-down status.

"These inmates know this," Pruyne said. "Another example is that there will be four people at the front gate (Wednesday) for the (Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez's visit) dog-and-pony show and two of them were pulled from phone call monitoring at the FCI."

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees national union of Washington, D.C., was among high-ranking union officials in town Wednesday to bring a voice to the short staffing problem, which he said exists across the nation.

"The reason we are here is because there is a storm occurring in the correctional industry," Gage said. "The Bureau of Prisons is trying to replace correctional officers with technology, in a minimalist approach that is certainly not working."

Gage said the federal inmate population is growing by nearly 9,000 inmates a year, while staffing is down. He said prison problems have increased as a result.

In the two-year period from February 1999 to January 2001 federal prison assaults on staff numbered 2,095; between 2003 and 2005, the assaults on staff increased by 778.

Another alarming statistic, Gage said, is that the instances of tower officers taking shots into prison compounds has gone up 500 percent.

"This is simply about cutting money and risking safety. It is disingenuous of the administration to say cameras or electric fences are improving safety in the prisons. There is never a replacement for the professional correctional officer," Gage said.

Gage said union officials believe it would take $500 million to correct the problem. He said Congress has dedicated an additional $143 million in the budget for the U.S. Justice Department for 2007.

"Now the Justice Department has to put that money into staffing," Gage said.

Batulis said she and other union officials will return to the nation's capital next week to lobby Congress and "follow where the money goes to make sure it goes where it is supposed to go."

Volunteer Group Lags In Replacing Gulf Houses (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton And Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAY ST. LOUIS, Miss. — In the two years following the 2004 tsunami in the Indian Ocean, Habitat for Humanity International, the nondenominational Christian ministry, built or repaired 8,500 houses in Indonesia, Thailand, India and Sri Lanka.

Habitat for Humanity seemed poised to do the same thing along the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina hit in 2005. Just days after the storm, its chief executive appeared on CNN, promising to build and repair as many homes as it could pay for, "hopefully in the thousands." The organization quickly mustered 50,000 volunteers, raised $127 million, and attracted prominent backers like President Bush and the New Orleans jazz luminaries Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis.

But almost 18 months after storms destroyed more than 250,000 homes, Habitat for Humanity says it has built just 10 houses for poor hurricane victims here, 36 in New Orleans, and a total of 416 along the entire coast, from Alabama to Texas. More are under construction, for a total of 702.

That slower pace reflects, in part, the more complex houses that Habitat builds in the United States, as well as the mind-numbing issues — involving insurance costs and government regulations — that seem to have bogged down efforts to rebuild after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But Habitat International is starting to face criticism that its procedures are slow, rigid and perhaps unsuited to helping disaster victims, however rewarding its efforts are for its volunteers. The organization is working through its independent local affiliates, which function like franchises and which have tended to build a dozen houses a year each.

"I don't think they were prepared to undertake the massive rebuilding efforts required after Katrina," Fred Carl Jr., who was the Hurricane Katrina housing coordinator for Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, wrote in an e-mail message.

"I think they're very good at building a few homes through their local chapters," Mr. Carl continued, "but this was a whole new ballgame and I think they may have underestimated the vast challenge this involved."

This criticism is echoed by some leaders of charitable and housing groups who are reluctant to be quoted because they work with Habitat. Some suggest that Habitat's insistence on working through affiliates has slowed it. The group has spent $61.5 million of the $127 million it raised for the Gulf Coast. Nearly three dozen of the houses it has built were paid for by other charities.

Even within the organization, some have questioned its continued emphasis on building from scratch, rather than on helping people repair and rebuild damaged houses.

Habitat for Humanity officials say they hit the ground running after the storms and are pleased with the pace of building. The group says it will meet its goal of 1,000 houses under construction or completed by the end of August, the second anniversary of Hurricane Katrina, and it plans to build 1,000 more.

Along the Gulf Coast, "we had built 57 homes a year, now we're building 57 a month," said Kenneth J. Meinert, a volunteer who left his job running a building company in Canada to coordinate Habitat for Humanity's storm response. "In these conditions, to have built 700 homes, it's an absolute work of God," he added.

Habitat, with more than $1 billion in annual revenues, is based in Atlanta and Americus, Ga., and has operations worldwide. Its mission often seems as much about providing spiritual fulfillment to its volunteers as it is about improving new homeowners' lives.

"Habitat really taps into this American ethos, this real barn-raising sensibility," said Jerome P. Baggett, a professor at the Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley, who has written a book on the group. "But building many houses is more complex than building the occasional barn."

Traditionally, Habitat volunteers raise money and use donated materials to build $60,000 houses in their own communities. In the region today, most of the volunteers come from "away," as Mr. Meinert put it, and the group has used some factory-built modular houses.

In an interview here, Mr. Meinert said that about 400 of the 700 houses were what the group calls House in a Box projects, framed outside the Gulf Coast by volunteers and then trucked south for assembly.

Habitat for Humanity lent volunteers to house-gutting groups, he said, and has given some of its money to other organizations working on the Gulf Coast, including $3 million to help finance home repairs.

So far, Mr. Meinert said, of the $61.5 million spent, about $15 million has gone to Louisiana affiliates and $15 million to those in Mississippi.

Critics have questioned Habitat's continued emphasis on building new homes rather than on rehabilitation. They note that other groups have done more with this approach: volunteers from Southern Baptist churches mucked out 12,000 houses in Mississippi alone, and have rebuilt or repaired 3,000, while volunteers from Mennonite congregations have repaired hundreds of houses and built 31 new ones last year. Even the small Southern Mutual Help Association, a nonprofit that reported revenues of $3.3 million in 2005, has helped rehabilitate or rebuild more than 500.

In one successful variation on the national group's procedures, Habitat's Northern Virginia affiliate has rebuilt two dozen houses in East Biloxi, Miss., and plans to build 50 more this year. Karen Cleveland, the executive director of the Virginia group, said it paid $10,000 to $15,000 a house.

Like others urging Habitat International toward flexibility, Ms. Cleveland traveled to its offices in Americus to make the case for a similar approach across the organization. She was told the group was committed to the House in a Box strategy.

Ronnie McBrayer, the former director of Habitat for Humanity's affiliate in Walton County, Fla., said his group's efforts to help rebuild the town of Pearlington, Miss., had been met with indifference and then hostility from some organization officials. Habitat insisted its name be removed from that project, which was focused on providing interim housing for people living in tents, he said.

Mr. Meinert of Habitat International said the Florida affiliate was doing work that was not traditionally part of the group's mission. "We would not take donors' money and send it there in large quantities to build temporary housing," he said.

Mr. McBrayer, now a hospital chaplain, said there was a conflict of values between his affiliate and national leaders. "Our grass-roots group values speed and putting a roof over heads," he said.

The organization had some experience in disaster recovery before the tsunami. But the wave of donations that followed it prompted the group to create a special unit that has spent about $42 million of the more than $71 million it collected for building and repairing 8,500 houses overseas, said Mike Carscaddon, the organization's executive vice president.

The money went farther there in part, he said, because houses in developing countries are typically smaller than homes here and cost about $5,000 apiece.

Habitat for Humanity does not give houses away; it provides 20-year no-interest mortgages and uses the payments to finance more houses. To qualify, families must have incomes well below the median for their areas, but steady enough to cover mortgages. (Traditionally, 90 percent of applicants are rejected.)

They must also have good credit, agree to contribute several hundred hours of "sweat equity," attend classes on finances and homeownership and in some areas, including New Orleans, come up with several thousand dollars for taxes and insurance.

Those strict requirements have frustrated some applicants for one Habitat project, Musicians' Village, set on eight acres in the Upper Ninth Ward of New Orleans. The project was publicized as a way to bring back the city's displaced traditional jazz and blues musicians, though it will include nonmusicians, too. It will also have several duplex apartments for older musicians and a community center.

Some musicians have complained that Habitat has rejected them, and others that its processes discouraged them from applying.

Tanio Hingle, the bass drummer with the New Birth Brass Band, said he had applied for the program but was not pursuing it. He said he thought Habitat should provide housing first and worry about the paperwork later.

Complaints like his started surfacing in the New Orleans news media last year. Mr. Connick and Mr. Marsalis recently asked Jackie Harris, a music producer who now works for them, to help musicians through the process for the Habitat project, which will eventually include more than 70 houses on-site and 150 in the area.

Ms. Harris said the musicians and Habitat had misunderstood one other but were adjusting. “It’s been a learning curve for both,” she said.

Habitat officials say that in New Orleans and in Covington, which is across Lake Pontchartrain, their efforts have encouraged homeowners and private developers to build or rehabilitate nearby houses.

And they say they have been flexible after the hurricanes, reducing the hours of required sweat equity, for example, and allowing musicians to use performance records rather than pay stubs to prove income.

Along the Gulf Coast, those fortunate enough to qualify for Habitat housing call it a blessing. Sylvia Ragan, a dialysis technician, is moving into a house here on Union Street after living in a trailer for 18 months with her daughter, Denetra Shelley, who is 11.

“I couldn’t pay anybody for the blood, sweat and tears that went into this house,” Ms. Ragan said. “I will cherish this forever.”

Post-Katrina Baton Rouge Struggles With Its Identity (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BATON ROUGE — The tables are dressed in crisp, white linen. Many of the signature dishes that made Galatoire's restaurant an institution on New Orleans' Bourbon Street — the Oysters Rockefeller, the Salad Maison, the Trout Amandine — are on the menu.

But outside this Galatoire's, there's no bawdy street scene. Instead, Galatoire's Bistro — opened hastily in late 2005 after the flooding from Hurricane Katrina forced the Bourbon Street location to close for several months — is the unlikely anchor of a shopping center in suburban Baton Rouge.

It's a taste of New Orleans wrapped in suburban sprawl, a symbol of the post-Katrina migration that continues to redefine daily life in this city 80 miles northwest of New Orleans. Perhaps no other city was affected more by the hundreds of thousands of people who fled New Orleans after Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005. Within days, Baton Rouge, a city of 225,000, was an overwhelmed mass of about 500,000.

Many evacuees were just passing through, but city officials say that today, Baton Rouge's population remains 275,000-325,000. From the Los Angeles-style gridlock on Interstate 10 to the overcrowded schools and the escalating real estate prices that have fueled a housing crunch, Baton Rouge has the look and feel of a place grappling for control of its direction.

And although the influx of new residents hasn't dramatically increased crime rates, many residents sense that Baton Rouge has lost some of the small-city civility it enjoyed during what they call "Pre-K" — before Katrina. Last spring, a Louisiana State University survey examining Katrina's impact found that 30% of Baton Rouge residents believed that "rude and unfriendly" people were a serious problem in the city.

Residents' most common complaint? The traffic, by far. More than two-thirds of those surveyed by LSU said it was a serious problem.

Baton Rouge's population has reached the mark that pre-Katrina projections estimated for the year 2030. Government officials say their planning for a range of projects has had to be accelerated by up to a quarter-century.

DOJ_NMG_0134991

Since Katrina, voters have approved a $500 million road-building plan that is being funded by sales tax receipts. Meanwhile, the police department is scrambling to add 100 officers to its 600-member force at a time when police and fire units are being stretched by emergency calls.

The expansion of public safety units is being funded by a benefit of Baton Rouge's growth: a $25 million surplus from sales tax revenue from 2005 and 2006.

The financial picture isn't as clear in the Ascension Parish and East Baton Rouge Parish school systems, which need dozens of buildings to handle the addition of more than 4,000 students since Katrina. It's unclear when the schools could be built or how they'd be funded.

"We'll never be the Baton Rouge we were prior to Katrina," Mayor Melvin "Kip" Holden says.

Evacuees "changed the landscape of this region forever," Baton Rouge police Sgt. Don Kelly says. "None of us really knows what the long-term impact will be."

The message on the electronic billboard on westbound I-10 on a recent afternoon warned drivers that a 3-mile stretch toward downtown would take nearly 20 minutes to travel.

On Baton Rouge-area highways and roads where congestion was rare less than two years ago, lengthy, grind-it-out trips often are the norm — regardless of the time of day.

To make sure she arrives at her Postal Service job in New Orleans for the start of her 11 p.m. shift, hurricane transplant Kathleen Lucien sometimes leaves her home in Baton Rouge at 8 p.m.

Unlike many other urban areas, Baton Rouge does not have a highway loop around it to help ease congestion on local streets.

Holden credits his election in November 2004 to a campaign that emphasized transportation improvements. However, it wasn't until after Katrina that voters approved the $500 million plan to improve roads. Three dozen congestion spots are targeted for improvements; about 80% of the work will be done in the next decade.

Holden says the city needs at least another $1 billion to rebuild 50 miles of the sewer system, build and fix sidewalks and expand I-10.

"The city has changed," Holden says, adding that state and federal assistance will be needed.

Ascension Parish schools Superintendent Donald Songy says he'll never forget the scene at Dutchtown Middle School when students returned to the suburban Baton Rouge campus after the summer break last September.

The first day of school always involves some chaos, Songy says, but this was ridiculous. Nearly 2,000 children converged on a campus that normally had about 1,100. A gym was converted into three sixth-grade classrooms.

"We got hit with 10 years of growth overnight," Songy says.

Before Katrina, school officials in Ascension Parish had estimated the area's deliberate growth would put their system's enrollment at about 16,000 students from 2010 to 2015. In the fall of 2006, a year after Katrina, 18,000 students were registered in Ascension Parish schools. Songy says the growth occurred so quickly that the "personality of the district" changed instantly, from rural to "booming suburbia."

Next year, the first of five new schools is scheduled to open. Songy says that even if it could open now, it would be overcrowded.

A similar surge in enrollment occurred in the urban East Baton Rouge Parish school system, on a much larger scale.

After Katrina, enrollment jumped from 46,212 to 52,923. It has declined since then, as some families who fled New Orleans for Baton Rouge have moved on. Enrollment in East Baton Rouge Parish now is about 48,465, Superintendent Charlotte Placide says.

To help the school system handle the growth, Placide says, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) built 78 temporary classrooms on 39 campuses. Placide reopened two schools that had been closed. She says that when the schools opened less than a month after Katrina, every student and teacher in them was an evacuee.

The FEMA classrooms helped, but Placide says the district needs more permanent buildings. She says that even if more classroom space can be arranged, she worries about the system's ability to help students scarred by the trauma surrounding the flooding and evacuation of New Orleans.

"Many of these children had difficult experiences in that hurricane," she says. "How that will play out as they get older, I don't know. I'm concerned about the unknown."

When the first wave of evacuees washed into Baton Rouge, fear spread across the city, Kelly says. There were reports — nearly all false — of looting, rioting and armed gang members running wild, he says.

"There was a genuine fear that the city would be overrun," Mayor Holden says.

To Holden's relief, fears that Katrina evacuees would spark a sustained crime wave in Baton Rouge have not been realized.

The month after the storm, robberies and car thefts did rise by nearly 50%, according to Baton Rouge police records. Homicides increased from 47 in 2004 to 56 last year, but given the rise in Baton Rouge's population, the total from 2006 actually represented a lower homicide rate per capita than the city had the year before Katrina.

The experience has been different in other cities with significant numbers of hurricane evacuees —notably Houston, where an estimated 150,000 evacuees fled. Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt says his department linked evacuees to 24% of the slayings there during the first five months of 2006.

In Baton Rouge, Kelly says, perhaps a few of the 56 slayings last year involved evacuees. "There is a perception to this day that evacuees are driving (an) increase in crime," he says. "That is not necessarily so."

Kelly says there is anecdotal evidence that evacuees who settled in Baton Rouge were likely to have family or friends here, perhaps making the evacuees less likely to resort to crime than those who went elsewhere. Even so, the police department is rushing to boost personnel to keep up with the demands of the population increase. The 100 new cops planned for the department will be hired over the next four years.

The hiring is "related to the population increase," Kelly says. "We're still seeing growth."

In Springbrook, a new subdivision of homes southeast of Baton Rouge, move-in days have a non-traditional look.

Many buyers show up to take possession of their new homes without any moving vans or trucks loaded with furniture. Eric Dudley, a salesman for KB Homes, says that generally, a car pulls up with all of a family's possessions packed in a few suitcases or plastic bags.

"A lot of the people we see are people who have lost everything," Dudley says. "They are just trying to get their lives back together."

At least 40% of the people moving into the 55-acre development were displaced by the storm, says Clint Szubinski, KB's Gulf Coast region president. Those who settle there are fortunate: Because of the rising demand for homes here, prices are escalating beyond the reach of many potential buyers, creating what real estate analysts say is a crisis in affordable housing.

The average home price in East Baton Rouge Parish in 2006 was $15,000 more than in 2005. In Ascension Parish, the average home price was $201,846 last year, up from $161,673 in 2005.

Rents increased after the storm by about 12%, according to D. Wesley Moore, an adjunct professor at LSU's Real Estate Research Institute. Before the storm, a typical two-bedroom apartment rented for $627 per month. Afterward, the average was $703.

David McKey, incoming president of the Baton Rouge Board of Realtors, says the most urgent need is for affordable homes costing $100,000-$150,000. The city's goal is to boost the supply of such housing by 5,000 units within five years.

In Springbrook, where homes sell for $160,000-$180,000, the price was right for Kathleen Lucien, her daughter, Nina, and Lucien's 6-year-old grandson, Jadon, all formerly of New Orleans' heavily damaged 9th Ward. Lucien says she bought in Baton Rouge so "we'll never have to run from a hurricane again."

She still thinks of rebuilding her home in New Orleans, if she can reach a settlement with her insurance company. On her daily commute to and from New Orleans, she often drives by her old place. "A lot of people I know are staying here," Lucien says. "The people of Baton Rouge greeted us with open arms, mostly. I like it in Baton Rouge. But I still love New Orleans."

WAR NEWS:

Britain To Remove 1,600 Troops From Iraq By Spring (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

LONDON -- Britain's decision to pull 1,600 troops out of Iraq by spring, touted by U.S. and British leaders as a turning point in Iraqi sovereignty, was widely seen Wednesday as a telling admission that the British military can no longer sustain simultaneous wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The British military is approaching "operational failure," former Defense Staff chief Lord Charles Guthrie warned this week.

"Because the British army is in essence fighting a far more intensive counterinsurgency war in Afghanistan, there's been a realization that there has to be some sort of transfer of resources form Iraq to Afghanistan," said Clive Jones, a senior lecturer in Middle East politics at the University of Leeds, who has closely followed Britain's Iraq deployment.

"It's either that, or you risk in some ways losing both," he said. "It's the classic case of 'Let's declare victory and get out.' "

Prime Minister Tony Blair's government has been pressed to add 800 new troops to Afghanistan to halt a resurgent Taliban and a worrying escalation of drug trafficking, at the same time that it is beset by criticism for joining the United States in an unpopular invasion and prolonged war in Iraq.

The decision to draw down forces by more than 20 percent in the southern city of Basra means that Britain will significantly shrink its military footprint at a time when the Pentagon is increasing U.S. forces to battle militants to the north, in Baghdad and Anbar province.

The Bush administration hastened to present the British decision as an indication that the U.S.-led military operation was succeeding. Vice President Dick Cheney called the reduction "an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," and White House press secretary Tony Snow said the U.S.-led coalition "remains intact" despite a roster that has fallen from 35 countries in 2004 to 25 now.

But the Pentagon, in its most recent quarterly report to Congress, listed Basra as one of five cities outside Baghdad where violence remained "significant," and said the region is one of only two that are "not ready for transition" to Iraqi authorities.

Once a promising beacon, Basra suffers from sectarian violence as well as Shiite militia clashes over oil smuggling. Ferocious street battles have broken out between rival Shiite groups in provincial capitals such as Samawa, Kut and Diwaniyah over the last year.

Democratic leaders in Congress denounced the Bush assessment as misleading.

"No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. "This should be a wake up call to the administration. Prime Minister Blair's announced redeployment of British troops is a stunning rejection of President Bush's high-risk Iraq policy."

U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the British decision "confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people" about the decision to boost the U.S. force.

"The president's escalation plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq is out of step with the American people and our allies," Pelosi said in a written statement. "Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?"

In Britain, Blair's opponents quickly painted the withdrawal as an admission of failure. "The unpalatable truth is that we will leave behind a country on the brink of civil war, in which reconstruction has stalled and corruption is endemic, and a region that is a lot less stable than it was in 2003," Liberal Democratic leader Menzies Campbell said in Wednesday's parliament debate on the troop drawdown.

"That is a long way short of the beacon of democracy in the Middle East that was promised some four years ago," he said.

For Blair, the decision to begin reducing Britain's 7,100 troops in the south to 5,500, with possible further withdrawals later in the year, was almost a political necessity. His Labor Party is trailing in the polls ahead of crucial regional elections in the spring, and Blair is preparing to hand over the country later this year to his likely successor, chancellor of the exchequer Gordon Brown, who favors a phase-out of Britain's deployment in Iraq.

In announcing the troop reductions, Blair said they coincide with the increasing assumption of security responsibilities by Iraqi military and police forces. He said British troops will continue to patrol the border with Iran and remain at their main base in Basra through at least 2008, to assist Iraqi forces if needed.

"It is important to show the Iraqi people that we do not desire our forces to remain any longer than they are needed; but whilst they are needed, we will be at their side," Blair told Parliament.

Most analysts say the prime minister's assertion that significant progress has been made in securing southern Iraq stretches facts on the ground. Though the south is not nearly as violent and chaotic as the capital and the Sunni heartland, it remains jittery, unstable and frequently bloody. Shiite militias and armed gangs lord over cities like Basra and Amara, as well as the long desolate stretches of roadway through the marshlands and deserts of the south.

British bases in Basra regularly come under mortar fire. British troops engage in almost daily gunfights with militiamen. In recent months, the British offices all but evacuated their downtown base and moved to a more secure site on the grounds of the city's airport.

A study on the south issued this week by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a think tank that has been sympathetic to the administration's foreign policy goals, describes southern Iraq in dire terms. It notes that Basra itself, once one of Iraq's more liberal and cosmopolitan cities, has become a bastion for Islamists who use the south's vast oil wealth to "fill their war chests."

"The province has suffered one of the worst reversals of fortune of any area in Iraq since the fall of Saddam's regime," said the report.

Times staff writers Borzou Daragahi in Baghdad, and James Gerstenzang, Paul Richter and Peter Spiegel in Washington contributed to this report.

Ally's Timing Is Awkward For Bush (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

As the British announced the beginning of their departure from Iraq yesterday, President Bush's top foreign policy aide proclaimed it "basically a good-news story." Yet for an already besieged White House, the decision was doing a good job masquerading as a bad-news story.

What national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley meant was that the British believe they have made enough progress in southern Iraq to turn over more of their sector to Iraqi forces. To many back in Washington, though, what resonated was that Bush's main partner in Iraq is starting to get out just as the president is sending in more U.S. troops.

No matter the military merits, the British move, followed by a similar announcement by Denmark, roiled the political debate in Washington at perhaps the worst moment for the White House. Democrats seized on the news as evidence that Bush's international coalition is collapsing and that the United States is increasingly alone in a losing cause. Even some Republicans, and, in private, White House aides, agreed that the announcement sent an ill-timed message to the American public.

"What I'm worried about is that the American public will be quite perplexed by the president adding forces while our principal ally is subtracting forces," said Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), a longtime war supporter who opposes Bush's troop increase. "That is the burden we are being left with here."

The notion that the British pullback actually signals success sounds like bad spin, added Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "I think it's Alice in Wonderland looking through the looking glass," he said.

White House officials said they had known for a while that the British were moving in this direction and that Prime Minister Tony Blair informed Bush of his decision during a secure videoconference Tuesday. But the rest of Washington was taken by surprise, and Republicans were put back on their heels, just as they were beginning to feel more confident that the fight over war strategy was shifting their way.

The House last week approved a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's planned deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province in western Iraq. But Republicans have since been on offense, hammering a House Democratic plan that would tie war funding in a supplemental spending bill to strict new standards for resting, equipping and training troops.

The strategy, championed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and endorsed in principle by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), was supposed to neutralize GOP charges that Democrats plan to "de-fund" the war, while forcing Republicans to defend the deployment of troops who are not rated fully trained and equipped. But Republicans labeled it a "slow bleed" strategy that would leave troops in harm's way by blocking their reinforcements.

Vice President Cheney was the latest to jump on Murtha's plan, yesterday calling it "a huge mistake" and a "policy of defeat" that would embolden terrorists.

"If we were to do what Speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all we'll do is validate the al-Qaeda strategy," he told ABC News in Japan, where he is traveling. "The al-Qaeda strategy is to break the will of the American people."

Pelosi bristled at the attack, issuing a statement complaining that Cheney was besmirching her patriotism and calling on Bush to "repudiate and distance himself from the Vice President's remark."

The news of Britain's partial withdrawal, though, swamped the funding debate for at least a day. "The timing of the British announcement is very unfortunate," said Nile Gardiner, a scholar at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "The British decision is going to be used as a political football by opponents of the president's Iraq plan."

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) said the move will undercut Republicans in Congress trying to stave off attempts to limit what Bush can do in Iraq.

"It's probably not going to bode well for those of us who want to make a case against what Murtha and Pelosi plan for the supplemental," LaHood said. "It does not help."

Blair's announcement could also boost calls by Democrats and some Republicans for a serious change in Iraq policy -- not just in the number of troops fighting but also in what those troops should do. The British plan to withdraw 2,100 of 7,100 troops by summer's end and to redeploy the remainder away from combat toward more training of Iraqi troops and patrolling the Iranian border. That mirrors bipartisan Senate proposals for U.S. forces that are spelled out in two stalled nonbinding resolutions, including one co-sponsored by Warner.

"What the British are doing, and what we really need to do, is to tease out the cultural complexities of this thing," said Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (R-Md.). "On the one hand, they are signaling to all the Iraqi people, whatever sect they are -- Sunnis, Shias, Kurds -- they are not going to be an occupying force. That's a powerful signal to send. And the other signal is that they are passing the torch to the Iraqis, who are the only ones who can handle this ancient -- I'd say primitive -- sectarian dispute."

The White House argued that comparing the British situation in Basra and the U.S. position in Baghdad fundamentally distorts reality. The south, where the British have been in charge, has no Sunni insurgency and far less violence than Baghdad or Anbar. The coalition plan all along has been to pull out foreign troops when an area is ready for Iraqi control, the White House said.

"The fact that they have made some progress on the ground is going to enable them to move some of the forces out, and that's ultimately the kind of thing that we want to be able to see throughout Iraq," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. He said no consideration was given to asking the British to instead redeploy those departing troops to help their U.S. counterparts in Baghdad or Anbar.

Hadley, speaking to reporters in Brussels, where he was traveling, said he did not mean to suggest the British departure signals "an unalloyed picture of progress," but he rejected a more negative interpretation. "I didn't want people to think it reflected a lack of confidence by the British in the mission or a turning away from the mission," he said. "It is not."

Still, other administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity so they could talk candidly about political strategy, expressed frustration that the British decision will look bad to everyday Americans, and acknowledged that it will provide ammunition to domestic opponents.

"It's a brick in the hands of folks who want to take cheap shots," one official said. "But I think it's unfair."

Britain To Withdraw Troops In 'Coming Months' (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 22, 2007

LONDON — Prime Minister Tony Blair said Wednesday that Britain will pull 1,600 of its 7,100 troops in Iraq out of the southern part of the country in coming months.

ON DEADLINE: How Fleet Street is covering the news of Brits and Danes pulling out | AUDIO

The number could be cut even more — to below 5,000 — by August if Iraqi forces demonstrate that they have secured the southern part of the country, he said.

However, Blair said, British forces would remain in Iraq into next year or "for as long as we are wanted and have a job to do."

This is the first time that Britain has set a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, although Blair has said that British troops would pull out when Iraqi army and police were able to maintain order themselves. Britain had 9,000 troops in Iraq two years ago.

The British withdrawal comes as President Bush is sending 21,500 U.S. troops to try to secure the violence-racked area around Baghdad farther north.

In Najaf, a Shiite holy city about 95 miles south of Baghdad, a suicide car bomber struck a police checkpoint today, killing at least 13 people. Najaf is in the spiritual heartland of the militia factions led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Blair and Bush talked by secure video link Tuesday about the proposals, U.S. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said. Bush views Britain's troop cutbacks as "a sign of success" in Iraq, he said.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow, on a trip with Bush to Tennessee, said Britain's decision was not made on a timeline of the sort the president has rejected for American troops. "What you had is progress first, and then the removal," Snow said.

"The president's made clear all along, we want to move as rapidly as we can to build capability on the part of the Iraqis so they can in fact assume, first, primary responsibility and then eventually sole responsibility," he said.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said there was no thought that the British were abandoning the United States when it is struggling to send thousands more troops into Iraq. He said the British "have been steadfast allies in Iraq and they will continue to be."

Blair's announcement, made in a noon-hour speech in the House of Commons, followed an earlier announcement by Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen that Denmark was withdrawing its 460 troops from southern Iraq.

The Danish force, which has been under British command, will pull out in August, Rasmussen said.

Lithuania, too, said it was "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said.

In Tokyo, Vice President Dick Cheney called Blair's announcement good news. "I look at it and see it is actually an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Cheney told ABC News.

In Berlin, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said today that the U.S.-led coalition of international forces in Iraq is still intact.

"The coalition remains intact and in fact the British will have thousands of soldiers deployed in Iraq in the south," she said at a joint news conference with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier. "It is the plan that as it is possible to transfer responsibility to the Iraqis, that coalition forces would no longer be needed in those circumstances," she said.

Blair said the withdrawal was possible because the Iraqi army and police have increasingly demonstrated that they can secure and patrol most of the Basra area. That allows British troops to pull back into a supporting role and allow the size of force to be reduced.

On Tuesday, Britain handed over control of an Iraqi army division based in Basra. The 10th Iraqi Army Division, which was trained by British troops, now takes its orders from Iraqi military commanders in Baghdad.

Violence in Basra has decreased in recent months. Basra province is experiencing 5 attacks a day, opposed to nearly 40 a day for Baghdad, according to the latest Defense Department quarterly report.The biggest threat in Basra, and the south in general, is escalating Shia-on-Shia violence between rival Shia militias.

British defense analyst Eric Grove saw both military and political pressure behind the announcement, which he says represents the beginning of the end of British military presence in Iraq.

The Ministry of Defense, he said, is under pressure with troops deployed both in Iraq and Afghanistan. To ease it, military commanders have pushed hard in the last year to build up and train Iraqi army and police so that it could draw down its troops there and reinforce those in Afghanistan.

"We do want to run down the commitment (in Iraq), if for no other reason than our commitment in Afghanistan," said Grove, director of the Center for International Security and War Studies at the University of Salford in Manchester.

At the same time, he said, Blair would like to draw down the number of troops in Iraq before elections in Scotland in May and before his likely successor, Chancellor Gordon Brown, takes over.

Brown has said he would like to see troop levels in Iraq reduced by several thousand by the end of this year.

Democrats Seize On UK Troop Cuts (FT)

By James Blitz, Daniel Dombey And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The Bush administration on Wednesday welcomed Tony Blair's decision to withdraw nearly a quarter of the British troops in Iraq over the next few months, saying the move showed that in parts of the country "things are going pretty well".

But although the British prime minister told parliament that the withdrawal of 1,600 troops would allow Iraqis to "write the next chapter in their history", prominent Democrats in Congress said the move was a sign that Britain was now giving up on the US in Iraq and contrasted it with the surge in US troop numbers deployed to contain the violence in Baghdad.

Mr Blair announced to parliament that the 7,100 troops serving in Basra would be cut to 5,500 "over the coming months", with hopes that 500 more would leave as early as late summer.

Mr Blair said that some soldiers stationed at Basra air base would remain into 2008 to help secure supply routes, the Iran border and to support Iraqi forces.

Downing Street officials said the decision to cut troop numbers to 5,500 was broadly in line with plans drawn up by the Ministry of Defence at the end of last year.

However, there were strong indications earlier this year that the British had initially been looking to announce a deeper cut at this stage – to about 4,500 troops. Some British officials concede that these plans have been disrupted by the continuing violence in Basra.

Mr Blair on Wednesday admitted that "the problems remain formidable" in the south of Iraq.

"What all of this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be but the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by the Iraqis," he said.

In Washington, meanwhile, the White House and leading Democrats differed fiercely over the implications of the UK move.

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, said the British "have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole which is to be able to transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqis as conditions permit". But Edward Kennedy, a senior Democratic senator, said the British redeployment was a "stunning rejection" of the president's decision to increase US troop numbers around Baghdad by 21,500.

"No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq," Mr Kennedy said.

Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the UK move "weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US".

"This is a war of perceptions, as well as military power, and the influence of British cuts will be negative," said Mr Cordesman. "The British cuts will in many ways simply reflect the political reality that the British 'lost' the south more than a year ago. The Shia will take over, Iranian influence will probably expand, and more Sunni, Christians, and other minorities will leave."

Rice Calls Iraq Coalition 'Intact' (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The Bush administration maintained yesterday that its Iraq coalition was still in good shape despite announcements by Britain and two other countries that they would withdraw all or some of their troops by the end of the year.

"The coalition remains intact," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a visit to Berlin. "It is the plan that -- as it is possible to transfer responsibilities to the Iraqis -- coalition forces would no longer be needed."

Miss Rice spoke just hours after British Prime Minister Tony Blair announced in Parliament that Britain would cut 1,600 troops from its 7,100-strong force in southern Iraq in the coming months.

He said several hundred more could come home by late summer if conditions permit. There were 40,000 British troops in Iraq when the war began, and roughly 9,000 in place two years ago.

Denmark said it planned to withdraw its 460 troops from southern Iraq by August. A Lithuanian Defense Ministry spokeswoman said her country was "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from the same area in August.

The United States put the best face on the announcements, declaring the withdrawals were evidence of the improved security situation in southern Iraq.

But analysts on both sides of the Atlantic disagreed.

British military analysts said the decision to reduce troops in Basra was not warranted by conditions on the ground. Rather, they cited domestic politics, an overstretched military and fears of being caught in a struggle between the United States and Iran.

Mr. Blair's decision, said Toby Dodge of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, was based on his desire "to clear the decks so that he is remembered for something a bit better that the invasion of Iraq and its bloody aftermath.

"This 'mission accomplished' stuff is rubbish. Basra is incredibly dangerous," said Mr. Dodge.

The troop cut also reduces the likelihood that Prince Harry, son of Prince Charles and third in line to the throne, will find himself as a soldier in Iraq.

The prince, a second lieutenant in the Household Cavalry, reportedly has threatened to quit the military if his unit is sent to Iraq without him in April. But military brass worry that he would become a "bullet magnet" for insurgents hoping to make a public relations splash.

Mr. Blair said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had agreed to his plan, under which British troops will remain at least through next year, increasingly focusing on support and training of Iraqi forces.

If those forces show themselves capable of maintaining order, he said, the British commitment could fall to fewer than 5,000 troops by late summer.

British army Maj. Chris Ormond-King, a spokesman for the British-led multinational force based in Basra, said in a briefing last month that the overwhelmingly Shi'ite Muslim south did not have the same sectarian problems that have spurred fighting in Baghdad and other parts of the country.

"The militias are not a problem for us," he told reporters traveling with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates. "What is a problem are some of the rogue elements in those militias."

He acknowledged that a small British garrison in the heart of Basra is routinely hit by mortar fire and small arms attacks from groups protesting the multinational force's presence in the country.

In addition to the political pressures, Mr. Dodge said, the British army "is incredibly overstretched" and can no longer effectively operate both in Iraq and Afghanistan at the same time.

"They are wonderful soldiers who are grievously understaffed and underfunded, stretched way too thin and with almost no modern equipment to speak of," agreed Robert Killebrew, a U.S. national security analyst who follows Iraq closely.

British troops have obligations around the world, and have a significant presence in Afghanistan, where they are working with U.S. and NATO troops to beat back the Taliban and create a viable Afghan state.

Mr. Dodge said that behind closed doors in the British Foreign Office, there was a strong sense that the attacks against British troops in southern Iraq were backed by Iran, rather than the result of the local security situation.

Maj. Ormond-King said Iran's influence was palpable among Shi'ite groups in the south, who are receiving money, logistical help, military training and arms.

Washington has accused elements of the Iranian government of providing radical Shi'ite militias with sophisticated bomb technology that has killed some 170 U.S. soldiers.

If tensions between the United States and Iran were to worsen and Washington decided to attack Iranian facilities, British forces in southern Iraq would be on the front lines of any Iranian retribution, Maj. Ormond-King said.

Mr. Dodge said there was "the real fear that British troops will get caught between the United States and Tehran on this."

Iraqi forces have already taken over from British-led troops in two of the south's four provinces. Plans to transfer control of a third province, Maysan, have been put on hold over recent security concerns.

But Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the British had long ago lost the political fight and ceded Basra and Maysan to Shi'ite Islamist factions.

"The British were not defeated in a military sense, but lost in the political sense if 'victory' means securing the southeast for the central government and some form of national unity," Mr. Cordesman said.

Democrats Seize On British Iraq Withdrawal Plan (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 22, 2007

Congressional Democrats, seizing on an announcement from Great Britain that it would begin withdrawing troops from Iraq, said Wednesday that the White House should take a cue from its closest ally and get U.S. soldiers out of Iraq instead of sending in more.

"Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?" asked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) after Britain's Prime Minister Tony Blair announced earlier Wednesday that a large part of the British force would withdraw from southern Iraq.

Blair said 1,600 of the 7,100 soldiers would withdraw in the coming months, with further troop reductions already planned later this year. He added that Iraqis would be able to take care of their own security in areas where British soldiers were stationed. Denmark also announced that it would withdraw its smaller contingent, which is working in cooperation with the British.

"The president's escalation plan has been rejected by bipartisan majorities in the House and Senate and opposed by Americans all across the country," Pelosi said, referring to votes last week in the House and the Senate. "The announcement by the British government confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people about the president's decision to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq."

But the administration said Blair's announcement is welcome news because it shows that Iraqis are increasingly able to take care of their own security needs.

"It indicates that there's been some progress in Basra," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters aboard Air Force One. "The fact that there has been progress in a couple of areas - one is training up Iraqis to take over some of the responsibilities that the Brits and the Danes have been handling within Basra - has made it possible for Britain to remove some of the forces."

In an interview with ABC News, Vice President Cheney, who is traveling in Asia, said he sees Britain's plan as "an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well."

But Democrats offered a different take on Britain's decision.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) said, "America's leading ally in Iraq has decided that a timetable for the phased redeployment of troops is the only responsible policy to help force Iraqis to stand up for Iraq."

Kerry has decided not to seek the presidency again in 2008 and instead said he would focus his energy on getting U.S. troops out of Iraq. "After years of touting Prime Minister Blair's resolve, the [Bush] administration should now pay attention to his new policy," Kerry stated, adding it is "inexplicable" why Bush is seeking to send additional troops to Iraq at this time.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said the decisions by Britain and Denmark "leaves us increasingly isolated in Iraq," adding that "the coalition, which was never sufficiently robust to begin with, has all but disappeared."

Democrats Hail British Pullout (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Democrats yesterday cheered the news that Britain will begin withdrawing troops from Iraq as proof that the rest of the word sees reducing troops as the best solution to the war, but the White House defended the action as a sign of how well things are going.

"The British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair announced he will bring home 1,600 of Britain's 7,100 troops now serving in Iraq in the next few months. Meanwhile, Denmark announced plans to withdraw its troops, which number in the hundreds, this summer. Lithuania also is considering withdrawing its contingent of dozens of troops.

Acknowledging that Basra, where British forces are stationed, is not "how we want it to be," Mr. Blair said the time is ripe to let the Iraqis take over security.

The move is bound to get wrapped up in the debate in Congress.

Last week, the House passed a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan to send 4,000 more Marines to Anbar province to pursue al Qaeda terrorists, and about 17,500 soldiers to Baghdad to try to end sectarian violence. Republicans have blocked a similar resolution in the Senate.

Democrats argued that Mr. Blair's decision proved the major U.S. partner in Iraq has come to the conclusion that the way to prod Iraq is with fewer troops, not more.

"America's leading ally in Iraq has decided that a timetable for the phased redeployment of troops is the only responsible policy to help force Iraqis to stand up for Iraq," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. "After years of touting Prime Minister Blair's resolve, the administration should now pay attention to his new policy."

Although Mr. Blair said his troops are leaving without having accomplished what they had hoped, the White House said it was a good sign.

"What I see is an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Vice President Dick Cheney, traveling in Japan, told ABC News.

Mr. Cheney said a friend, "a guy who knows the region very well," recently drove from Baghdad to Basra and "found the situation dramatically improved compared with where it was a year or so ago, sort of validated the British view that they have made progress in southern Iraq, and that they can therefore afford to reduce their force posture."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the British are basing their decision on benchmarks, not timetables.

He ruled out asking British troops to transfer to Baghdad or Anbar province to help ease the burden on U.S. troops.

"There has been a division of labor within Iraq and people do have separate responsibilities," he said.

Britain Cuts Its Losses (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

Spin it any way you like, Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement that Britain will be withdrawing up to 1,600 of its 7,100 remaining troops in Iraq can't be welcome military or political news for President Bush.

This isn't the first reduction in the British contingent, which originally numbered 40,000. But it comes at a time of spiraling violence in Iraq and emboldened opposition in Washington to Mr. Bush's disastrous war. It also comes as Mr. Blair is preparing to leave office, painfully aware that popular fury over the war threatens to overwhelm his entire legacy.

The British announcement has already served as the catalyst for other departures. Denmark, with 460 troops under British command, announced yesterday that it would leave by August. With the Pentagon already straining to find enough soldiers for Iraq, a troop drawdown by its most militarily capable ally can only add to the strain — and to the clamor for bringing American forces home as well.

The White House strove to cast Mr. Blair's political necessity as a sign of "some progress in Basra," Iraq's second-largest city, which British forces have had military responsibility for since the invasion. Vice President Dick Cheney — even more disconnected from reality — chimed in that the British pullback shows that there are some parts of Iraq where "things are going pretty well."

Mr. Blair knows better, and candidly acknowledged that Basra is not "how we want it to be," but said that it was time for the Iraqis to write "the next chapter in Basra's history." Mr. Blair also insisted that the situation there is "very different from Baghdad," where, he said, an "orgy of terrorism" has been unleashed — his out-the-door endorsement for President Bush's troop buildup in the capital.

But if there is comparatively more calm in Basra, that is only because the outnumbered British forces have ceded control to Shiite sectarian militias and local police forces controlled by rival armed factions.

Just two months ago, British and Iraqi soldiers stormed a Basra police station, rescuing 127 prisoners from what British officials said was almost certain execution. There is so far little evidence that Iraq's national armed forces on their own will be able to protect Basra's innocent civilians or even that they mean to try.

Whether it is Basra with fewer British troops or Baghdad with more Americans, nothing in Iraq is "going pretty well."

Lithuania Mulling Iraq Troop Withdrawal (AP)

Lithuania is "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said Wednesday.

Defense Ministry spokeswoman Ruta Apeitkyte told The Associated Press that the Baltic country was considering not replacing the contingent when its mission ends in August.

It was the first time that Lithuania, a staunch U.S. ally, indicated it would reduce its commitment in Iraq.

Blair Plans To Withdraw 1,600 Troops From Iraq (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Joshua Partlow

LONDON, Feb. 21 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday that 1,600 British troops would return home from Iraq in the coming months and that a further 500 soldiers may be withdrawn by the end of summer.

Even though Britain has only 7,100 troops in Iraq, compared with the 135,000-strong U.S. contingent, they carry symbolic importance as the largest allied presence. British forces make up half of the roughly 14,000 non-U.S. troops in the coalition in Iraq.

Vice President Cheney, in an interview with ABC News during a visit to Tokyo, called the planned withdrawal "an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well." Democratic leaders noted, however, that the British are withdrawing as President Bush is sending an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq.

Iraqi leaders generally welcomed the withdrawal plan, although Sunni officials said they feared the departure of British troops from Shiite-dominated southern Iraq would lead to increased sectarian violence that Iraqi security forces would be unable to stop.

Blair's plans allow him in the final months of his administration to show a measure of independence from Washington on Iraq policy. Battered in public opinion polls because of his support of the war, Blair has said he will step down by September.

At the same time Blair was speaking in London, the Danish prime minister, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, announced in Denmark that its 460 troops under British command in Iraq will return home by August. In Lithuania, a Defense Ministry spokeswoman said the country is "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq in August.

Blair said the British reduction in troops was possible because security conditions were better in southern Iraq, where British troops patrol, than in Baghdad, where many U.S. troops are located. He said that "80 to 90 percent of the violence" is in Baghdad, which is enduring an "orgy of terrorism."

British troops just completed an operation to turn over control of security to Iraqi forces in the southern city of Basra, Blair said. "What all of this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be. But it does mean that the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis," he said.

But military and political analysts disputed Blair's upbeat description of the situation in the Basra area. They also said they believed the timing of the British drawdown may have more to do with plunging polls for Blair's Labor Party, pressure from British military officials and Blair's desire to begin an endgame for Iraq before he leaves office.

A poll this week showed that only 29 percent of respondents would vote for Labor, while 42 percent favored the opposition Conservative Party, the worst showing by Labor since 1992.

British military leaders are increasingly complaining of overstretched forces and low morale, and there has been growing military pressure on Blair to reduce the presence, said Michael Williams, head of the transatlantic program at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies.

"While the British zone is much quieter," he said, the Basra area "still has a number of security issues" and it "is foolhardy" to believe that Iraqi forces are ready to assume total control of the area. He also noted that if Blair had the political will, he could deploy some troops to help out the Americans in Baghdad instead of sending them home.

Coalition troops have handed over security control to the Iraqis in three southern provinces: Najaf, Muthanna and Dhi Qar. The 15 other provinces are still under the control of U.S.-led forces. American military officials have said they expect the Iraqis to take operational control of all Iraqi army divisions by this summer and to take security control in all provinces by fall.

"The Iraqi government feels very comfortable about the southern provinces and especially Basra; we have good security forces there," said Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Askari said he expects that after two months, the British troops will have moved out of the city center, restricting themselves to their bases, and that by the end of August 2008 there will be a full withdrawal of British troops.

"Now, the Iraqi security forces are not prepared. There will be a big security gap" when the British leave, said Naseer al-Ani, a Sunni member of parliament.

Ani and other Iraqi politicians saw the general trend of departing Western troops, whom they consider occupiers, as beneficial in the long term.

"Originally, the British forces, the American forces were coming to solve the situation and then they will leave. But we've seen the opposite: Wherever they stay for a long time . . . the situation keeps getting worse and worse," he said.

Iraqi forces in some cases have relied on coalition troops to bail them out in areas under their responsibility. In late January, a month after Iraqis took control of Najaf province, the Iraqi army needed the help of U.S. air support and ground troops to defeat an armed Shiite cult.

Still, officials in Najaf, which has a population of about 1.4 million people, said the departure of U.S. troops has been a political benefit.

"When the multinational forces were in Najaf, we had a lot of legal violations," said Najaf's governor, Asad Sultan Abu Gillel. Military operations were "carried out without legal notification, without an order from a judge," he said.

"This caused many problems for us with the local people," Abu Gillel said. "We live in a country filled with problems and terrorism, but at least we have full control."

At top strength, Britain had 40,000 troops in Iraq during the 2003 invasion. As of Feb. 9, 132 British military personnel in Iraq had died or were missing and believed killed since the invasion, said Lt. Col. Simon Etherington, a British military spokesman in Baghdad.

Blair declined to give any clear date for total withdrawal, saying the remaining troops would stay "into 2008 or as long as we are wanted and have a job to do." He added, "Increasingly, our role will be supporting and training, and our numbers will be able to reduce accordingly." He delivered his speech in the House of Commons.

Conservative leader David Cameron embraced the cuts, saying, "That news will be welcomed in this House, in the country and especially to the families of those serving in Iraq over the coming months."

Liberal Democrat leader Menzies Campbell, whose party opposed the war, said: "The unpalatable truth, Mr. Speaker, is this: that we will leave behind a country on the brink of civil war, where reconstruction has stalled, where corruption is endemic, and a region that is a lot less stable than it was in 2003."

Besides the United States and Britain, only five countries have 500 or more troops in Iraq: South Korea has 2,300, Poland and Georgia each have 900, Romania has 600 and Australia has 550, according to the Associated Press.

West European countries have remained largely opposed to the war, while East European countries, including former Soviet republics, have been more enthusiastic. The parliament in Bulgaria voted Wednesday to extend the mission of its 120 noncombat troops in Iraq until the end of March 2008. It also has 35 support personnel there.

Iran, Militias Could Gain From British Pullout (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

DOJ_NMG_0135003

BAGHDAD — Britain's planned reduction in its force in southern Iraq could empower Iran and lead to more bloodshed between rival Shiite Muslim groups, analysts warned Wednesday.

The area around Basra is less violent than Baghdad, and sectarian killings are rare, in part because it is overwhelmingly Shiite. But the government's authority there is rivaled by armed groups that are "thoroughly intertwined with criminal enterprises," according to a report from the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"In the coming year, the drawdown of British forces in the deep south will likely be accompanied by an upsurge of factional violence as the long-delayed fight for local supremacy begins in earnest," said the report, written by Iraq security specialists Michael Knights and Ed Williams.

The militias already engage in regular street battles over lucrative oil smuggling. The region has 70% of Iraq's oil fields.

Vice President Cheney said Wednesday that the planned British withdrawal was a response to improved security in the area. "What I see is an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Cheney told ABC News.

Late last year, Basra province was experiencing an average of five attacks a day against troops and civilians, compared with nearly 40 a day in Baghdad, according to a Defense Department quarterly report in December.

On Tuesday, Britain handed over control of an Iraqi army division based in Basra. The 10th Iraqi Army Division, which was trained by British troops, now takes its orders from Iraqi military commanders in Baghdad.

Questions linger, however, about the Iraqi security forces in the area. In late December, more than 800 British soldiers raided a police station housing Basra's "serious crime unit," where police were accused of arresting, torturing and killing rival clansmen. The British soldiers killed seven gunmen, rescued 127 prisoners and ultimately reduced the two-story building to rubble.

"The Iraqi security forces in Basra are not equipped or qualified to take on responsibility," said Abo Amar al-Mayahi, head of Basra's Badr Organization, a Shiite group. "If they took over now, there will be a lot of chances for bad things to happen."

A spokesman for the British military in Basra could not be reached for comment.

Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, said the British withdrawal will "leave a vacuum that will be filled by Shiite militias backed by Iran." The Bush administration has recently accused Iran of providing weapons to Shiite militias in a drive to bolster Iranian influence in Iraq.

Smuggling across the nearby Iranian border, currently patrolled by British troops, could also soar with fewer British soldiers in the area, said Juan Cole, a University of Michigan history professor and expert on Iraq's Shiites.

Cole said militias often steal oil after it leaves refineries, load it on boats and then sell it on the black market in other Persian Gulf countries. "It's really dangerous in so many ways," Cole said of the British withdrawal. "Basra is not under control."

U.S. commanders may also need to find other ways to escort fuel and supply convoys running between Basra or Kuwait and the rest of Iraq, Cole said. That security has been handled by British troops, he said.

"This idea that the British could leave because the local authorities have things under control is just completely false," he said.

Also Wednesday:

•A Black Hawk helicopter went down north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. All nine people on board were evacuated, and there were no serious injuries.

"The indications are now that it was brought down by small-arms fire and … rocket-propelled grenades," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told CNN.

Seven American helicopters, including two operated by aprivate security company, have gone down in Iraq since Jan. 20.

•In Baghdad, insurgents blew up a pickup carrying chlorine gas canisters. It was the second such attack in two days. The explosion killed at least five people and sent more than 55 to hospitals gasping for breath and rubbing stinging eyes, police said.

Chlorine causes respiratory trouble and skin irritation in low levels and can be fatal with heavy exposure. "Terrorists are using dirty means," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, an Iraqi military spokesman.

•A suicide car bomber struck a police checkpoint in the Shiite holy city of Najaf. The attack killed 13 people. The blast hit while streets were filled with morning shoppers.

Britain To Trim Iraq Force By 1,600 In Coming Months (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday that up to 1,600 of the roughly 7,100 British troops in southern Iraq would begin to withdraw in coming months, a sharp contrast to the continuing American troop buildup in Baghdad.

The British withdrawal was more modest than government ministers had suggested in recent weeks, and Mr. Blair offered no clear timetable for the drawdown, during which Iraqi forces will take over some of the responsibility for patrolling Basra and the surrounding area.

The announcement was made after months of public criticism of Mr. Blair's government over a war that has become increasingly unpopular at home. At the same time, senior British commanders have complained that their forces are stretched thin by their twin deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan, and military analysts have said a reduction in the Basra force could free troops to meet growing responsibilities in Afghanistan.

A British opposition politician, Sir Menzies Campbell, said the move would leave Iraq far from being the "beacon of democracy" that Mr. Blair had once promised. And in his speech on Wednesday, the prime minister acknowledged that conditions in southern Iraq were not what he had hoped.

"What all this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be," Mr. Blair said, "but it does mean that the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

The city, he said, "is still a difficult and dangerous place." But he drew a clear distinction between the perils facing British forces in southern Iraq and conditions for American troops farther north.

The "situation in Basra is very different from Baghdad," he told Parliament, because there was no Sunni insurgency there, little sectarian violence and "no Al Qaeda base," while "an orgy of terrorism" had been unleashed on Baghdad. Even so, he said, British troops, whom he described as "brave beyond belief," were regularly coming under fire in southern Iraq.

Word of the planned withdrawal received widespread publication here on Tuesday, and the White House released a kind of public blessing of the idea then, saying it pointed to increased stability in the south.

On Wednesday, Bush administration officials reiterated that the announcement of the British withdrawal had been expected for months, and they played down the potential security risks of having fewer troops in and around Basra.

"This moderate reduction that the British are doing is possible because they have been able to achieve success in Basra," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. He acknowledged that attacks in the city had actually increased over the last year but said a withdrawal was possible because the British had handed over responsibility for security to Iraqi security forces. British troops would continue to patrol near Iraq's border with Iran, he said.

Another senior Defense Department official said that, if security conditions deteriorated in the south, American commanders might need to send in their own forces to help remaining British units and Iraqi troops. He noted that the United States also usually keeps reserve forces nearby in Kuwait that could be sent into Iraq as well.

"If something flares, we will react to it with the forces on the ground," the official said. He added: "We always plan for contingencies. However, we do not expect trouble."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said the British decision shows that "they have made some progress on the ground." He said that "is going to enable them to move some of the forces out, and that's ultimately the kind of thing that we want to be able to see throughout Iraq."

Democratic leaders in Congress saw it differently.

"By announcing its decision to redeploy troops from Iraq, the British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept," said Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the majority leader. "There can be no purely military solution in Iraq."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, said, "the announcement by the British government confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people about the president's decision to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq."

Other European governments with troops in Iraq also announced Wednesday that they were pulling out or thinking about it.

Around 460 Danish soldiers under British command in southern Iraq will be withdrawn by August, the government in Copenhagen said, and Lithuania said it was considering pulling out a small contingent of 53 soldiers in the south.

But it was Britain that has long been the most prominent United States ally in Iraq, with most of its forces deployed in and around Basra. At the time of the 2003 invasion, Britain committed about 40,000 air force, naval and army personnel to the fight, but that figure was reduced to about 9,000 two years ago and 7,100 now.

On Wednesday, Mr. Blair said that further withdrawals could reduce the British force level to less than 5,000 by late summer, but that British troops would remain "for as long as we are wanted and have a job to do," at least into 2008.

In essence, the reduction in British forces will mean British troops pulling back to a support and training role to two bases, mainly one at the Basra airport, to support Iraqi forces patrolling the city, Mr. Blair said. British troops will also patrol the border with Iran, which Britain accuses of supporting Shiite militias in southern Iraq.

Mr. Blair indicated that the timing of the withdrawal would hinge on the levels of conflict in southern Iraq, depending "in part on what we do, what the Iraqi authorities themselves do, but also on the attitude of those we are together fighting."

He denied suggestions by political opponents that British troops would be leaving what one antiwar opposition legislator, Charles Kennedy, called a "quagmire." And he rejected accusations from antiwar politicians that the 2003 invasion itself had inspired Iraq's bloodletting. "We did not cause the terrorism," Mr. Blair said. "The terrorists caused the terrorism."

On Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice denied suggestions that the British withdrawal plans meant the coalition forged to topple Saddam Hussein had crumbled. She said the British "have been terrific."

"The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits," she said during a visit to Berlin to conduct Middle East peace negotiations. "The coalition remains intact and, in fact, the British still have thousands of troops deployed in Iraq."

Mr. Blair also used his announcement on Wednesday to deliver a broad review of Middle East policy and went on to meet in London with Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority.

Speaking to Parliament, Mr. Blair drew a distinction between Iran and Syria. "They should not be treated as if the same," he said. "There is evidence recently that Syria has realized the threat Al Qaeda poses and is acting against it. But its intentions towards Iraq remain ambiguous and, towards Lebanon, hostile."

"But both countries — though very different — have a clear choice: work with the international community, or defy it," Mr. Blair said.

As US Surges, British Start Exiting Iraq (CSM)

By Mark Rice-Oxley And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

British prime minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday the beginning of the end of British military involvement in Iraq, starting with a 25 percent drawdown before summer.

Denmark also said it would pull all of its 460 ground troops from Iraq by August.

Mr. Blair's decision is, in part, an acknowledgment of the British public's anger over the war and a desire to focus on Afghanistan. Southern Iraq, where British troops operate, is not yet "how we want it to be," Blair said. "But ... the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

Blair's move isn't likely to help the Bush administration. Fewer British troops in Basra will leave Iran in a stronger position and puts at risk US military supply lines in Iraq, say analysts, at a time of an escalating US-Iranian standoff.

"This is more about Tony Blair's legacy than the situation on the ground," says Toby Dodge, an Iraq historian at Queen Mary, University of London. After 10 years in office, Blair is expected to step down some time in the summer, and analysts say, he is eager to say that he finished what he started in Iraq.

From 7,100 to 4,000 in 2007

Blair said Wednesday that 1,600 of the 7,100-strong force will leave in the coming months, with hundreds more to pull out throughout the summer. In all, 3,000 could be gone by year's end, by which time all four southern provinces that were under the British should have been handed over to Iraqi control. The remaining troops will shift roles, taking a more discreet, remote approach inside their base at Basra airport, as the Iraqi security forces take on day-to-day security matters.

This is "a recognition that the British forces have done whatever good they're going to be able to do in southern Iraq," says Michael Clarke, a defense expert at King's College, London. "It's not the same as saying the job is done."

But removing British troops will not please the White House, coming as it does on the heels of President Bush's decision to "surge" 21,000 more US troops into Baghdad and Anbar Province and the president's assertions that Iran is responsible for much of the violence inside Iraq.

"There is no doubt that any British troop reduction that is not coordinated with a US reduction weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US," Anthony Cordesman, the former director of intelligence analysis for the Defense Department and now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, wrote Wednesday. "This is a war of perceptions, as well as military power, and the influence of the British cuts will be negative."

Basra's problems are very different from Baghdad's. In the southern port city, British troops have seen bullying and execution of political opponents by the dominant Shiite militias in the city rather than the sectarian civil war that rages in the capital. There is no city in Iraq where Iran has more influence, which means the Islamic Republic may be better placed to strike out at American assets through local proxies. One concern: US military supply lines running north from Kuwait could be at greater risk, especially if the bellicose rhetoric between Tehran and Washington escalates.

A spokesman for Mr. Bush's National Security Council said that "we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis." But some analysts say that is largely political spin, pointing out that Basra is as troubled today as it was a year ago.

In the nearly four years that British troops have been responsible for Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, Shiite militias have co-opted the police and many of the city's political institutions while British forces have been increasingly confined to their bases.

There are two major political militias in the city – one close to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, another to the Fadila Islamic party of his rival Muhammad Yaqubi – as well as a number of smaller gangs that engage in tribal extortion and kidnap for ransom.

"The British certainly aren't doing what the Americans want them to," says Mr. Dodge.

But senior British officers have been arguing that Britain's commitment to Afghanistan, which many see as a more important mission than Iraq, is stretching their forces thin. Last fall, the British general, Sir Richard Dannatt, said he supported withdrawal from Iraq because the British presence in Basra appeared to be aggravating the local population.

In September 2005, British forces assaulted the main jail in Basra to release two soldiers detained by the Basra police. Basra's governor called Britain's actions "barbaric and irresponsible." Though extreme, that is not the only case of enmity between the British and Iraqi security forces they're training.

In his speech Wednesday, Blair appeared to agree with General Dannatt's point. He said that unlike Baghdad, relatively homogenous Basra – it has many Sunnis, but not in sufficient numbers to challenge the Shiites – has little sectarian violence, no Al Qaeda presence and no Sunni insurgents. "The bulk of the attacks are on the multinational force," he said, the inference being that the removal of troops would stem the violence.

Britain's approach for more than two years has been one of conciliation and compromise with local militia leaders. British officers in the south have said privately that approach was largely dictated by the small size of their force – making the option of going to war with the Shiite militias unattractive.

At the moment, Britain's 7,100 troops in the south equal one soldier for every 451 residents of Basra and the neighboring Maysan Province, also under British control. A new manual for counterinsurgency written by senior US generals argues for about 20 troops for every 1,000 residents, which in the case of southern Iraq would mean about 70,000 British troops.

"The British long ago essentially ceded the two provinces they control ... to Shiite Islamist factions," writes Mr. Cordesman. "The British cuts will in many ways simply reflect the reality that the British 'lost' the south more than a year ago. The Shiites will take over, Iranian influence will expand, and more Sunnis, Christians, and other minorities will leave."

Dodge argues that Britain is well aware of this and is deciding to simply get out of the way of what looks to be a messier conflict.

"The big fear is that the British in the south will be hostages to US policy toward Iran," says Dodge. "There is a link between [British] casualties in the south and rising tensions with Iran. What Iran has effectively done is infiltrate its people and bought influence and kept the pan boiling."

Rising British casualties

British casualties have been light compared with American ones: the British have lost 34 troops in the past two years, compared to 996 US deaths. But the trend has inched upward since last fall, according to statistics compiled by Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent website that tracks Iraq casualties.

In the past six months, 17 British troops have been killed. In the six months prior to that period, 12 British soldiers were killed. And in the six months prior to that, 10 were killed.

Mr. Clarke of King's College says that Britain is less worried about expanded US conflict with Iran and more concerned about what's possible given the small size of its Army. "What is at the forefront," he says, "is the idea that keeping major forces in Iraq for the long-term future is impossible."

The End Of The Alliance (NYT)

By Bartle Breese Bull

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

YESTERDAY'S announcement by Prime Minister Tony Blair that Britain will cut its troops in Iraq by 30 percent over the next six months and perhaps fully withdraw in 2008, followed by the news that the Danish contingent is also heading home, may seem like the death knell of the so-called coalition of the willing and a severe blow to American hopes.

Still — and I am well aware of how unpopular the presence of British troops in Iraq is among his electorate — Mr. Blair's decision may have as much to do with strategic good sense as it does with domestic politics.

The truth is that the British gave up trying to win their war in southern Iraq a long time ago, and they probably accomplished as much as they could. Contrary to the grumbling among many Americans, they have done a lot of good work in southern Iraq. I have seen British troops on patrol in the marshes and countryside, watched grateful Iraqis rush to ask for their help in mediating tribal disputes or providing more protection from the militias.

Thanks to British oversight and protection, Saddam Hussein's cruel efforts to drain the country's southern marshes have been completely reversed. The marshes are now back to about 40 percent of their original size, with parts visibly flourishing. (With 75 percent of the water of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers now siphoned off by neighboring countries before it gets to Iraq, it is unlikely that the marshes will ever recover fully.)

When I visited a date palm plantation near Basra last year, Iraqi farmers told me that British aircraft had sprayed almost 100,000 trees with insecticide, helping their production to double since the days of Saddam Hussein's rule. (One of the men also insisted that I visit the old British cemetery in Baghdad. It was beautiful, he said: a sanctuary, a paradise. "And the gravestones are safe," he assured me. "I have removed them, so no one will destroy them.")

The British successes have also been political. In the south, Iraq's elections and constitutional processes have been far more successful in terms of security and turnout than almost anywhere else in the country. There was never a popular uprising against the British presence.

True, after the Coldstream Guards stormed a Basra police station in 2005 to free two special operations troops being held captive, a photograph of a guardsman on fire atop his armored vehicle led newspapers around the world, giving the impression of a city and a region in flames. But the reality was quite different: that day, the angry crowd numbered only 200 — this in a city of two million, after two years of war.

Even over the last 12 months, the British military posture in the south has not been as passive as has widely been perceived outside of Iraq. One night last December, in a successful effort to capture weapons caches and terrorist leaders, more than 1,000 British troops in Basra, using high-speed landing craft and dozens of armored vehicles and tanks, carried out the largest coalition "strike operation" since the invasion.

But despite these successes, it seems the British never intended to “win” the war in southern Iraq. The British withdrawal from Iraq began almost immediately after the invasion. The British presence in the south, which was 46,000 troops in April 2003, has been under 10,000 since May 2004.

Unwilling or unable to rid the streets and farmland of Maysan, Dhi Qar, Muthanna and Basra of the militias who are the main threats to order in the largely Shiite south, the British troops’ goal has been to keep a lid on things until they could leave. They have not had the resources or the mandate to win a war against either the Iran-backed Badr Brigades or the more nationalist Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr. And if those rival Shiite forces were to begin a fratricidal conflict, there is little the Britons would be able to do to intervene.

Americans must bear in mind that the situation in the south is very different from Baghdad and the Sunni triangle. In bloody Anbar Province the game is changing, and an American presence is helping convince local tribes to turn against the bleak worldview offered by Al Qaeda. In Baghdad, residents frequently express a wish for the Americans to return after they have declared a neighborhood cleared and moved on (as the current initiative in the capital is supposed to do). But there is no large constituency in Basra calling for the British to stay in force.

The “moral hazard” argument — the idea that the longer coalition troops stay, the longer we simply allow the Iraqis to avoid sorting out their own problems — is perhaps the most powerful claim for coalition troops to leave Iraq altogether. To some extent this is too simplistic: in Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle, the problems are too severe to be left to the country’s nascent security services immediately. But in the Shiite-dominated south, the centrifugal forces are less threatening than anywhere else.

Iraq’s historical state is one of constant internal violence. It is also, contrary to the claims of those who feel the country is a false concept of Western imperialism, one of territorial integrity within the current borders, which existed for 400 years of loose federalism under the Ottomans.

The priority now is to give Iraqis the best possible conditions to achieve the best feasible Iraq: one that stays whole; suffers less internal violence than it has historically; is not a threat to its neighbors or the rest of us; and that through a few good internal examples and a modicum of representative government has hope and mechanisms for improving itself.

This is an approach that will have to be adapted to suit each region. And in southern Iraq, it seems clear, it is time for the Iraqis to succeed or fail on their own.

Cheney Slams Iraq Plan Advocated By Dems (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, February 21, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday harshly criticized Democrats' attempts to thwart President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying their approach would "validate the al-Qaida strategy." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi fired back that Cheney was questioning critics' patriotism.

"I hope the president will repudiate and distance himself from the vice president's remarks," Pelosi said. She said she tried to complain about Cheney to President Bush but could not reach him.

"You cannot say as the president of the United States, 'I welcome disagreement in a time of war,' and then have the vice president of the United States go out of the country and mischaracterize a position of the speaker of the House and in a manner that says that person in that position of authority is acting against the national security of our country," the speaker said.

The quarrel began in Tokyo, where Cheney used an interview to criticize Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., over their plan to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the Iraq war to make it difficult or impossible to send 21,500 extra troops to Iraq.

"I think if we were to do what Speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all we will do is validate the al-Qaida strategy," the vice president told ABC News. "The al-Qaida strategy is to break the will of the American people ... try to persuade us to throw in the towel and come home, and then they win because we quit."

In the interview, Cheney also said Britain's plans to withdraw about 1,600 troops from Iraq — while the United States adds more troops — was a positive step. "I look at it and see it is actually an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," the vice president said.

Pelosi, at a news conference in San Francisco, said Cheney's criticism of Democrats was "beneath the dignity of the debate we're engaged in and a disservice to our men and women in uniform, whom we all support."

"And you know what I'm going to do? I'm going to call the president and tell him I disapprove of what the vice president said," Pelosi said. "It has no place in our debate." Bush had previously urged her to call him when a member of his administration stepped over the line by questioning Democrats' patriotism, she said.

Later, Pelosi said she had tried to reach the president but was only able to get through to White House chief of staff Josh Bolten.

Bolten said he was certain no one was questioning her patriotism or commitment to national security, she told reporters.

"I said to him perhaps when he saw what the vice president said he might have another comment," Pelosi said. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said Cheney "was not questioning anyone's patriotism." But she said Bush and Cheney believe that Pelosi and Murtha's "position to immediately pull out our troops would be harmful to our national security and that it is the wrong strategy to pursue."

As for Cheney's assertion that the partial British pullout is a sign that things are going well in Iraq, Pelosi said: "If it's going so well, we'd like to withdraw our troops as well."

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Service Committee, said Britain's withdrawal, coupled with a Denmark's announcement to pull out its 460 troops by August, "accelerates the breakup of the coalition in Iraq."

He said the United States should reduce its forces "as a way of pressuring the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future and to reach the political settlements that are essential to end the sectarian violence and defeat the insurgency."

Administration leaders, however, said Britain's decision was good news.

"The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a news conference in Berlin, where she was in meetings on the Mideast peace process.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley, at NATO headquarters in Brussels, said the decision "reflects the progress that has been made on the ground in Basra and in the south," where British troops were stationed.

"So this is basically a good news story, an indication that progress is being made, and that events on the ground permit this kind of adjustment in forces," Hadley said. Still, he acknowledged the violence in Baghdad and said, "I'm not saying this is an unalloyed picture of progress."

Cheney Says Democrats Won't Be Able To Stop Surge (HILL)

By Chris Good

The Hill, February 22, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Wednesday he does not think Democratic congressional leaders will be able to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq.

Asked in an interview with ABC News whether Democrats had the power to stop the surge, Cheney said: "I don't think so. The question is whether or not they have the votes."

The vice president said he believes the strategy on Iraq that Democrats are pursuing is a "policy of defeat" and indicated that he views the passage of a non-binding resolution in the House last week as political posturing. However, Cheney, who is on a trip to Asia and Australia and was speaking on board the USS Kitty Hawk in Yokosuka, Japan, also said it is important that Congress debate the issue.

Some anti-war Democrats are exploring options on how they can prevent the troop surge and begin bringing soldiers home. While Democrats have maintained they support the troops serving in Iraq and would not cut off any funds if such a move could endanger the soldiers, considerations are under way whether Congress can use its constitutional power to prevent Bush's plan.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, support a plan that would place conditions on some war funds. Murtha wants to withhold funds if the Pentagon fails to meet standards of equipment, training, and time at home for newly sent troops.

Cheney asserted that, if Congress were to prevent the "surge," it would validate al Qaeda in its attempts to "break the will of the American people."

The vice president said Pelosi's plan of getting troops out of Iraq would have "devastating long-term consequences in the global war on terror.

"You can't look at Iraq in isolation," Cheney stated. "You can't quit in one place and then persuade all your allies who are helping you in all those other theaters, if you will, to continue the fight."

A Lack Of Courage In Their Convictions (WP)

By George F. Will

Indiscriminate criticism of President George W. Bush is an infectious disease. Some conservatives seem to have caught it, but congressional Democrats might be crippled by it.

Consider some conservatives' reflexive rejection of the administration's achievement -- with China, Russia, South Korea and Japan -- of an agreement that might constrain North Korea's nuclear weapons program. Voicing the obvious with a sense of originality, critics exclaim that North Korea is a serial liar. And, echoing the equally reflexive disparagement of the agreement by some liberals, these conservatives say it is not significantly different from President Bill Clinton's 1994 agreement, which failed.

The new agreement might not bring Pyongyang to heel. It is, however, unlike that of 1994, in three particulars.

First, China was infuriated by North Korea's October nuclear test, which fizzled but expressed defiance of China. So now China seems amenable to serious pressure on its mendicant neighbor, which is substantially dependent on China for food and energy.

Second, the new agreement, like the 1994 pact, is an attempt to modify behavior using bribery. But under the 1994 agreement, North Korea got the bribe -- energy assistance -- before being required to change its behavior. Under the new agreement, North Korea will receive just 5 percent of promised oil -- 50,000 of 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil -- before it must fulfill, in 60 days, the first of the many commitments it has made.

Third, the administration believes it found, in Banco Delta Asia, a lever that moved Pyongyang. The Macau bank was pressured into freezing 52 accounts holding $24 million -- yes, million, not billion -- of North Korean assets because Pyongyang has been using them for illicit purposes. If Pyongyang flinched from being deprived of $24 million -- less than Americans spend on archery equipment in a month -- Pyongyang's low pain threshold suggests how fragile, and hence perhaps how containable, that regime is.

Regarding Iraq, the Democratic-controlled Congress could do what Democrats say a Democratic president would do: withdraw U.S. forces. A president could simply order that; Congress could defund military operations in Iraq. Congressional Democrats are, however, afraid to do that because they lack the courage of their (professed) conviction that Iraq would be made tranquil by withdrawal of U.S. forces.

So they aim to hamstring the president with restrictions on the use of the military. The restrictions ostensibly are concerned with preparedness but actually are designed to prevent deployments to Iraq.

Last Saturday, Senate Republicans blocked a vote on a resolution disapproving the president's policy because Democrats would not permit a vote on a resolution stating that the Senate will not cut off funds for troops in the field. That resolution would have committed the Senate to not taking the path that many Democrats already are tiptoeing down.

Suppose Democrats write their restrictions on the use of forces into legislation that funds the war. And suppose the president signs the legislation but ignores the restrictions, calling them unconstitutional usurpations of his powers as commander in chief. What could Democrats do? Cross First Street NE and ask the Supreme Court to compel the president to acquiesce in congressional micromanagement of a war? The court probably would refuse to get involved on the grounds that this is a "political question."

The court has held that some constitutional controversies should be settled by the government's political -- meaning elected -- branches. In 1962, the court said that a case involves a political question when there is:

" . . . textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question."

In that welter of criteria there are reasons that the court will not rescue congressional Democrats from facing the logic of their posturing. They lack the will to exercise their clearly constitutional power to defund the war. And they lack the power to achieve that end by usurping the commander in chief's powers to conduct a war.

They can spend this year fecklessly and cynically enacting restrictions that do not restrict. Or they can legislate decisive failure of the Iraq operation -- withdrawal -- thereby acquiring conspicuous complicity in a defeat that might be inevitable anyway. A Hobson's choice? No, Nancy Pelosi's and Harry Reid's.

Cheney Visits An Australia Roiled By Guantánamo, Iraq (CSM)

By Nick Squires

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

Prime Minister Howard has been a steadfast US backer, but his opinion poll rating took a hit ahead of Cheney's arrival.

Dick Cheney, perhaps the most powerful vice president in United States history, arrives in Sydney Thursday for a four-day visit.

Australian Army Black Hawk helicopters have been clattering over the city as part of counterterrorism exercises, as local police described Mr. Cheney as a "high risk" dignitary.

He is the most senior American visitor to Australia since President Bush addressed the joint houses of Parliament in Canberra in 2003.

But despite Australia's status as a steadfast US ally and broad public support for the country's troop deployment in Afghanistan, Cheney will encounter public anger over Australia's participation in the Iraq war and growing disquiet over the fate of the country's lone Guantánamo Bay detainee, David Hicks.

Cheney will be greeted Thursday by a big rally outside Sydney's Town Hall, organized by the Stop the War Coalition.

A Newspoll survey this week found 68 percent of respondents now believe it was not worth sending Australian troops to Iraq, and only 30 percent agreed with the government's view that they should remain "as long as necessary." More than a quarter of people interviewed wanted the soldiers brought home immediately.

Cheney's visit comes at an awkward time for Prime Minister John Howard, who has been in power for more than a decade but this week slumped to his lowest opinion-poll rating in six years.

Cozying up to the US is dangerous at a time when the Australian public is recoiling from the situation in Iraq, even though it may support the broader objectives of the war on terror.

Mr. Howard has so far ruled out reducing Australia's 1,450-strong force in and around Iraq.

But he may find that stance more difficult after British Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement Thursday that he will start withdrawing British forces from the war-ravaged country.

The Australian public is also becoming increasingly concerned over the US administration's treatment of Guantánamo detainee Mr. Hicks.

A drifter and a former kangaroo hunter from the parched state of South Australia, Hicks was captured in Afghanistan with the Taliban in 2001 and handed over to US soldiers.

He has spent the past five years detained in Guantánamo Bay without any charges being filed against him.

It's not that Australians necessarily think he's innocent – clearly he was not in Afghanistan as a backpacker.

But they feel strongly that he deserves to face his accusers and be given a fair trial.

"For Howard, there are risks to this visit because the Bush administration is unpopular in Australia," says Michael Fullilove, director of the global-issues program at the Lowy Institute, a Sydney-based think tank. "The Hicks case contributes to the sense that all is not right. Here we are, a reliable ally, and he's been in custody for five years without a trial, unlike the British prisoners, who were sent home."

Australia has been one of America's most steadfast allies for more than 60 years. Australian "diggers" fought alongside GIs in World War II, Korea, Vietnam, and the first Gulf War.

While Australia's involvement in Iraq may be deeply unpopular, that is not to say that the country has been swept by anti-Americanism.

There is broad public support for Canberra's decision to deploy troops to Afghanistan, and residual sympathy for the horror Americans experienced on 9/11.

"I think Australians take a relatively sophisticated view of the relationship – they separate their feelings for the current incumbent with their attitude toward the alliance in general," says Mr. Fullilove.

Last week, the government agreed to host a ground station for a US military satellite communications system on a remote stretch of desert coastline in Western Australia. There was barely a murmur of dissent, and the base is likely to be built without controversy.

"Even if Australians dislike the present administration, they support the alliance," says Gerard Henderson, executive director of the conservative Sydney Institute think tank.

With its small population, isolation, vast coastline, and position on the edge of Asia, Australia has always looked to a more powerful guarantor. First it was the British Empire and then, after 1942 and the fall of Singapore, the US.

But tough questions are now being asked about the government's apparently unconditional support for the Bush administration.

"We think it is time for Howard to say enough's enough to the man who more than anyone is responsible for creating the Iraq disaster on the basis of distorted intelligence and inflated dreams of remaking the Middle East," declared The Sydney Morning Herald in an editorial Thursday.

There will be a protest Friday outside the five-star Shangri-La Hotel, where Cheney will give a speech on US-Australian relations.

On Saturday he will hold talks with Howard on the Bush administration's decision to send a new "surge" of 21,000 combat troops to Iraq.

Cheney will also meet the new leader of the opposition Labor party, Kevin Rudd, who has pledged to withdraw Australia's 550 combat forces from Iraq should he win the next federal election, expected later this year. Another 900 sailors, airmen, and diplomatic protection detachments would remain in the region.

With criticism of the Iraq war mounting, Cheney may be grateful to get out of Washington for a few days. He arrived in Japan Tuesday for a quick visit to thank the country for contributing troops to both Iraq and Afghanistan, and was due to stop by the US Pacific Island of Guam on his way to Australia.

But his reception in Australia may provide scant comfort. "Cheney is unpopular here. He's perceived as a rather dour and private man," says Mr. Henderson. "And of course he's associated with Bush, who's never been popular here .... I doubt whether John Howard phoned up Cheney and said 'Now is a great time for you to visit.' But Howard is tribal – he stands by his mates."

Iraq Insurgents Use Chlorine In Bomb Attacks (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Ahmad Fadam

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 — A truck bomb that combined explosives with chlorine gas blew up in southern Baghdad on Wednesday, and officials said it might represent a new and deadly tactic by insurgents against Iraqi civilians.

It was at least the third truck bomb in a month to employ chlorine, a greenish gas also used in World War I, which burns the skin and can be fatal after only a few concentrated breaths. The bomb killed at least two people and wounded 32 others, many of them sent to hospitals coughing and wheezing, police and medical officials said.

Iraqi and American officials said the use of chlorine seemed aimed at bringing a new level of fear and havoc to Iraq as a new security plan for Baghdad takes shape.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, an American military spokesman, said the attacks highlighted the fluidity of insurgent tactics in Iraq, dominated by militant groups that often notice and repeat attacks that attract the most attention and cause the most suffering.

Insurgents have shifted tactics to focus on helicopters, and on Wednesday one group forced down an American Black Hawk helicopter, the eighth such incident since Jan. 20. Roadside bombs have been adapted to punch through heavily armored Humvees. Attacks on Americans also now include coordinated assaults from multiple locations, with a mix of weapons and in at least one case, counterfeit American uniforms and vehicles.

"The enemy is adaptive," Colonel Garver said. "The enemy wants to win."

The Black Hawk attacked on Wednesday was forced into a "hard landing" after taking fire from heavy machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, the United States military said. There were no injuries. A Sunni insurgent group, the Mujahedeen Army, claimed responsibility for the attack in an Internet posting, according to the SITE Institute, which tracks postings by insurgent groups.

The bombing involving chlorine gas on Wednesday followed an explosion on Tuesday north of Baghdad of a tanker filled with chlorine that had been rigged to explode, killing nine people and wounding 148, including 42 women and 52 children. At least one other attack with chlorine took place on Jan. 28, according to the American military's statements. Sixteen people were killed in that attack, in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, when a dump truck with explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Ramadi.

The attacks seem to have been poorly executed, burning the chemical agent rather than dispersing it, but more sophisticated weapons involving chlorine could injure hundreds and cause mass panic.

Though it is widely used in water purification and sewage treatment, chlorine is dangerous because it reacts with water in moist tissue, such as eyes and the respiratory tract, to create acid, which essentially burns tissue. A few breaths of air containing chlorine at a thousand parts per million can be lethal.

Nine people were killed and 250 injured in 2005 after a train crash in South Carolina in which 60 tons of liquefied chlorine was released — about six times more than what is contained in a home heating fuel truck like the one used in the attack on Tuesday.

Exposures at far lower concentrations, down to two parts per million, cause coughing, shortness of breath, chest pain, burning in the throat, nose and eyes, nausea and swelling of the lungs.

A few hours after the attack, American Humvees and a military vehicle with a nozzle that appeared to be testing the air encircled the scene. Soldiers were not wearing masks, but officials at Yarmouk hospital said they had determined through interviews and tests that chlorine was used in the attack.

Brig. Qasim Atta, an Iraqi government spokesman for the new Baghdad security plan, described chlorine attacks as a "filthy way" to harm vulnerable Iraqis.

Colonel Garver said that the chemical attacks could soon appear again. "It's no surprise that anti-Iraqi forces or terrorists or whoever is doing this are trying to replicate this kind of attack," he said. "They perceive that it's working."

The attacks on Tuesday and Wednesday also indicated that the Baghdad security plan had pushed the violence beyond the city's central neighborhoods, the focus of the new plan.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a United States military spokesman in Baghdad, said that the "belt around Baghdad" had experienced an increase in attacks as Iraqi and American forces concentrated on neighborhoods within. At a briefing in the Green Zone, he said that top commanders were considering assigning at least one brigade to the ring around the city, and perhaps another to Diyala Province, which has been the site of vicious battles between Sunni insurgents and American and Iraqi troops.

The witnesses to the helicopter crash, also in Diyala, said that three helicopters, including a double-rotor Chinook, were flying at tree level when gunmen began firing antiaircraft machine guns from an area near an oil pipeline. A resident who would give his name only as Ali said the back of one helicopter burst into flames, leading the aircraft to turn sideways and plunge to the ground. Two other witnesses said they saw fire coming from the helicopter as it crashed around 1 p.m.

Violence broke out on Wednesday in the southern Shiite holy city of Najaf, when a suicide car bomber detonated as Iraqi security forces checked the car for weapons at a checkpoint into the center of city. The explosion occurred about a half a mile from the Imam Ali mosque, one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines, and killed at least 11 people, the police said. Another 34 were wounded.

The American military also said a soldier had been killed by gunfire in a northern neighborhood of Baghdad and a marine had died from combat in Anbar Province, where American troops were battling Sunni insurgents. Both died Tuesday.

Meanwhile, despite the increased military effort, 20 bodies were found Wednesday in the capital, an Interior Ministry official said. In addition to the chlorine attack, four bombs ripped through areas of the city, killing at least six people, while mortar shells rained down on a Sunni neighborhood of western Baghdad, leaving three people dead.

The deadliest attack came about 5:30 p.m., when an abandoned car exploded in Sadr City, the largest Shiite area of the capital, killing at least four people, witnesses said.

Fatma al-Saiedi, 35, who was wounded in the explosion, said the attacks were a result of the new plan, which has replaced the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia, with what she and some other residents say are incompetent Iraqi policemen and soldiers.

"We trusted the Mahdi Army," she said. "The Americans have arrested so many of them, and now this happens — every day, another car bomb. We expect there to be more of them."

Another Chlorine Gas Bomb Attack In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

For a second consecutive day, a crude chemical weapon is used to target civilians, killing two.

Rape allegations amid Iraq car bombings

BAGHDAD — For the second time in two days, suspected Sunni Arab insurgents Wednesday targeted civilians with a crude chemical weapon: a bomb attached to chlorine gas canisters that killed two people, sickened 25 and injured eight others.

The attack was the third in a month involving a combination of explosive devices and chlorine. Though all three attacks were apparently botched, they hint at an ominous new tactic being cultivated by insurgents to subvert a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad.

Violence around the country left at least 40 other Iraqis dead. An American soldier was reported killed in a small-arms fire attack a day earlier in Baghdad, and a U.S. Black Hawk helicopter was forced to make a hard landing Wednesday north of the capital amid reports of ground fire, the military said.

The chlorine gas attack took place on the road leading to Baghdad's airport. A car filled with chlorine gas cylinders exploded near a fuel station in a religiously mixed neighborhood.

The tactic was used the day before in Taji, north of Baghdad, when insurgents detonated a truck holding two chlorine gas tanks. Six people were killed, and scores more suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes.

A suicide bomber also plowed a dump truck filled with explosives and a chlorine tank into the base of a rapid-reaction force near Ramadi on Jan. 28, killing 16 people. "There are no indications of any casualties caused by the release of chlorine gas," the U.S. military said at the time.

The use of chlorine gas weapons in warfare dates back at least to World War I, when Germans first used them in April 1915 to dislodge French soldiers from trenches. The weapons caused far more injuries than deaths.

Chlorine can burn the eyes, nose and throat and cause dizziness, nausea and vomiting. In higher doses — a few breaths at a concentration of one part per thousand — it can damage enough lung tissue to be fatal.

Chemists said that exploding high-pressure canisters are at best a crude way to disperse the green gas. Some would burn off, and the rest of the gas, which is heavier than air, would be unlikely to spread much beyond the blast zone.

Stephen Bradforth, a chemistry professor at USC, suggested that the most serious damage could be psychological.

An explosion "would launch a cloud of gas that is colored and highly corrosive and would lead to panic and more injuries," he said. "It's the chemical equivalent of a nail bomb."

DOJ_NMG_0135015

The U.S. Black Hawk helicopter went down near Taji. "Indications are now — again, it's preliminary, but the indications are now that it was brought down by small-arms fire and … rocket-propelled grenades," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said on CNN.

The military said another helicopter landed and rescued the nine people aboard the Black Hawk. At least eight helicopters have crashed, been shot down or forced to make unplanned landings in just more than a month.

In Web postings, insurgents have announced plans to target U.S. aircraft in another new front to undermine the security effort. Helicopters have been increasingly used by American troops as a means of avoiding deadly roadside bomb explosions, but officials have said insurgents are finding new ways to target them.

The bodies of at least 20 unidentified men were found dumped throughout Baghdad, police said Wednesday. All were killed by gunfire. A late-afternoon car bomb explosion at a market in the Sadr City district of the capital killed three Iraqis and injured 30.

Several roadside bomb attacks in southern Baghdad killed at least three Iraqis and injured two.

Violence also erupted in the country's predominantly Shiite south, where U.S. and British-led forces have begun handing control over to Iraqi authorities.

In Najaf, home to influential Shiite Muslim seminaries and the most revered Shiite shrine in Iraq, a suicide bomber driving a Chevrolet Caprice detonated his explosives at a police checkpoint as officers were inspecting his vehicle. The blast spread wreckage, body parts and blood over 30 yards. At least 11 people were killed, including four policemen, and 37 were injured in the bombing, a Najaf hospital official said.

"My car was behind the car that exploded," said Ridha Mayoof, a 40-year-old taxi driver recovering at the hospital from shrapnel wounds. "I saw a huge flame coming out of the car in front of me. Bodies and parts of the car were flying."

In the southern city of Samawah, gunmen ambushed and killed Mohammed Hanoon, the deputy chairman of the provincial council, as he was leaving a mosque after morning prayers. Hanoon was the second member of the council assassinated in two months. A suspected former member of the late former President Saddam Hussein's intelligence services was shot dead in Kut, also in the south.

Authorities found an unidentified body in a drainage canal near Iskandariya, about 50 miles south of Baghdad.

Three Die In Attack On Chlorine Truck (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 -- A tank truck carrying chlorine exploded in western Baghdad on Wednesday, killing three people and wounding at least 25 in the second such attack in as many days, according to a spokesman for Iraq's Interior Ministry.

Brig. Gen. Sadoun Abdul Karim said that several people exposed to the fumes were taken to hospitals and that the explosion set vehicles and shops on fire.

The chlorine attacks appear to be among deadly tactics adopted by insurgents in recent weeks as the U.S. military and the Iraqi government launch a security plan that will include the deployment of thousands of soldiers to outposts in Baghdad. Insurgents have also displayed new prowess in shooting down U.S. helicopters.

The attack came on a day when the political scandal over the reported rape of a Sunni woman by Iraqi police officers escalated, with the Iraqi prime minister's office releasing what it said was a portion of the woman's medical record.

The medical file, e-mailed to reporters by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office, includes a highlighted handwritten note with the notation "no vaginal lacerations or obvious injury."

In a simple diagram of the front of the patient's body, there are numerous marks indicating bruises around her inner thighs and groin. There is also a mark indicating a bruise on her head. The woman said she hit her head against the wall as three uniformed police officers raped her Sunday.

The medical record was attached to a news release that said the woman was going to be sued for making up the story.

Maliki said Monday that the rape allegation would be thoroughly investigated by a committee. Hours later, however, he said the investigation concluded that the woman had fabricated the story, and he announced that the accused police officers would be honored.

Maliki, who leads a government dominated by Shiites, did not identify the officers or say why the accolades were justified.

It is unclear how Maliki's office obtained the medical record, but the disclosure of its contents was apparently intended to bolster the conclusion that her story was made up -- and thus defuse a particularly sensitive example of the country's sectarian strife.

The woman has been championed by Sunni politicians, and at least one insurgent group has vowed to carry out attacks against Iraqi security forces in her name. Arab news stations have repeatedly aired a tearful interview in which the woman describes the alleged sexual assault in graphic terms -- a highly unusual move in a country where sex is seldom discussed publicly.

A U.S. military spokesman said Wednesday that he could not immediately confirm the accuracy of the information in the woman's medical record. Military officials have acknowledged that the woman was treated Sunday at the U.S. military-run Ibn Sina Hospital in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone. But they have not disclosed what kind of treatment she received or whether specific tests for rape were administered.

"I don't know how they got it," Capt. John Fleming said about the medical record. "Our policy is we do not release that stuff."

Another U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said during a news conference Wednesday that the woman was discharged Monday and was provided with a copy of her medical record.

Maliki also announced Wednesday the dismissal of Sunni official Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie, who ran the Sunni Endowment, a government agency that oversees Sunni mosques. Samaraie had called for an international investigation of the woman's allegations, and he said many women have been raped by the country's security forces, which are predominantly Shiite.

Violence continued in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq on Wednesday. Bombs exploded in Baghdad, Najaf and Kirkuk, killing at least 15 people, according to police in those regions.

A Black Hawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad by rocket-propelled grenades and small arms fire, according to the military. The military said in a statement that none of the nine soldiers aboard suffered serious injuries.

Also on Wednesday, the military disclosed the death of an American soldier killed in northern Baghdad on Tuesday. In addition, the military disclosed the death of a Marine killed Tuesday in Anbar province, in western Iraq. The names were not released.

Caldwell said the first week of the security plan brought a "significant" decrease in sectarian killings, but he noted that the body count remains high because of car bombs and suicide bombers. "The thing we have not been able to bring under control is the number of vehicle-borne IEDs, and in the last few days, the suicide vests," he said, referring to improvised explosive devices. "We think the tactics have slightly switched."

"The effects of the operation will not be seen in days or weeks but over the course of months," he said.

Chopper Shot Down; All Aboard Evacuated (WT/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

The Washington Times/AP, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A U.S. helicopter was shot down and crashed north of Baghdad yesterday, the military said after initially stating that the chopper made a "hard landing." All aboard were safely evacuated by a second helicopter.

At least seven U.S. helicopters have crashed or been forced down under hostile fire since Jan. 20. Military officials have said that militants are increasingly targeting helicopters amid the buildup of U.S. troops in Baghdad, firing simultaneously with an assortment of weapons from different directions.

The military also has detected another deadly insurgent tactic in recent weeks -- the spreading of toxic chlorine gas by combining it with explosives.

In Washington, two Pentagon officials said the tactic has been used at least three times since Jan. 28, when a truck carrying explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Anbar province west of Baghdad. More than a dozen people were reported killed.

On Tuesday, a tanker filled with chlorine exploded and noxious plumes covered homes and schools north of Baghdad. Nine persons were killed and 150 wounded, said one of the officials. A day later, a pickup truck exploded near a diesel-fuel station in southwestern Baghdad, the official said.

A third defense official said the United States has been concerned about militants' ability to acquire weapons like chlorine bombs. But so far, the official said, bomb makers in Iraq haven't been able to disperse a chemical such as chlorine in an effective way.

All three officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

In the latest violence, a suicide car bomber struck a police checkpoint in the Shi'ite city of Najaf, killing 13 persons in the spiritual heartland of the militia factions led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The blast hit while streets were filled with morning shoppers. At least seven of the victims were police and the rest civilians, authorities said. It was the first large-scale bombing in months in the city, which is heavily guarded by police and Sheik al-Sadr's powerful Mahdi's Army militia.

On Aug. 10, a suicide attack near the Imam Ali mosque in the city killed at least 35 persons and wounded more than 100.

A car bomb in the western Baghdad district of Bayya killed at least two and injured 31, police said. Later, a car bomb in the neighborhood killed at least three persons.

Elsewhere in Iraq, a U.S. Marine was killed Tuesday in fighting in volatile Anbar province, the military said.

Meanwhile political tremors grew stronger in Iraq following claims that a Sunni woman was raped while in custody of the Shi'ite-dominated police -- a case that threatens to escalate the sectarian friction that drives many of the bombings and attacks across the country.

Iraq Insurgents Again Use 'Dirty' Attack (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents exploded a truck carrying chlorine gas canisters Wednesday -- the second such "dirty" chemical attack in two days -- while a U.S. official said ground fire apparently forced the downing of a Black Hawk helicopter. All nine aboard the aircraft were rescued.

The attacks offer a sweeping narrative on evolving tactics by Sunni insurgents who have proved remarkably adaptable.

Military officials worry extremists may have recently gained more access to firepower such as shoulder-fired anti-aircraft rockets and heavy machine guns -- and more expertise to use them. The Black Hawk would be at least the eighth U.S. helicopter to crash or be taken down by hostile fire in the past month.

The gas cloud in Baghdad, meanwhile, suggests possible new and coordinated strategies by bombers trying to unleash toxic -- and potentially deadly -- materials. "Terrorists are using dirty means," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, an Iraqi military spokesman.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, said initial reports indicated the chopper was brought down by "small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades" north of Baghdad, but gave no further details. All nine aboard were taken away on a rescue helicopter, he said.

In Baghdad, a pickup truck carrying chlorine gas cylinders was blown apart, killing at least five people and sending more than 55 to hospitals gasping for breath and rubbing stinging eyes, police said.

On Tuesday, a bomb planted on a chlorine tanker left more than 150 villagers stricken north of the capital. More than 60 were still under medical care on Wednesday. Chlorine causes respiratory trouble and skin irritation in low levels and possible death with heavy exposure.

In Washington, two Pentagon officials said the tactic has been used at least three times since Jan. 28, when a truck carrying explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Anbar province. More than a dozen people were reported killed.

A third Pentagon official said the United States has been concerned about Iraqi militants' ability to get weapons like chlorine bombs and use them effectively. But the official cautioned that chlorine bombs are just one threat on a long list of possible attacks that Iraqi fighters may try to carry out.

It was unclear whether the confluence of new insurgent tactics -- attacking isolated combat posts, targeting helicopters more intensely and using chlorine bombs -- was coincidental or in response to the U.S. troop increase.

W. Patrick Lang, a former official at the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the insurgents are always "seeking to achieve higher levels of effectiveness" and these new tactics are part of the normal "evolution of sophistication."

Lang said trucks filled with chlorine gas are "really quite deadly" because the gas is potent and spreads easily.

Some authorities believe militants could be trying to maximize the panic from their attacks by adding chlorine or other noxious substances.

"It is an indication of maliciousness, a desire to injure and kill innocent people in the vicinity," said Garver, who also predicted militants may begin to launch similar attacks because of the widespread mayhem caused by this week's chlorine clouds.

"If there is a particular success, we'll see copycats. ... They certainly pay attention to what they think is successful," he said.

In Najaf, meanwhile, a suicide car bomber killed at least 13 at a police checkpoint. The attack fit a pattern that's believed to drive much of Iraq's recent violence: Sunni militants seeking to provoke majority Shiites into a full-blown sectarian conflict that would leave Washington's plans in ruins.

It was the first major bombing in more than six months in Najaf, an important Shiite pilgrimage site 100 miles south of Baghdad and also the headquarters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, head of the Mahdi Army militia.

The Najaf blast hit while streets were filled with morning shoppers. At least seven of the victims were police and the rest civilians near a checkpoint -- part of the city's security cordon that includes Mahdi Army militiamen, who battled U.S. forces in the area in 2004.

More than 40 people were wounded in the blast, which sent body parts and blood over a wide boulevard. Crews stuffed limbs and bits of flesh into cardboard boxes.

In Baghdad, another Mahdi Army center was hit. A car bombing in the teeming Sadr City district killed at least three.

National Guard May Undertake Iraq Duty Early (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — The Pentagon is planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, shortening their time between deployments to meet the demands of President Bush's buildup, Defense Department officials said Wednesday.

National Guard officials told state commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio last month that while a final decision had not been made, units from their states that had done previous tours in Iraq and Afghanistan could be designated to return to Iraq next year between January and June, the officials said.

The unit from Oklahoma, a combat brigade with one battalion currently in Afghanistan, had not been scheduled to go back to Iraq until 2010, and brigades from the other three states not until 2009. Each brigade has about 3,500 soldiers.

The accelerated timetable illustrates the cascading effect that the White House plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by more than 21,000 is putting on the entire Army and in particular on Reserve forces, which officers predicted would face severe challenges in recruiting, training and equipping their forces.

It also highlights the political risks of the White House's Iraq strategy. Sending large numbers of reservists to Iraq in the middle of next year's election campaign could drive up casualties among part-time soldiers in communities where support for the administration's approach in Iraq is already tenuous, according to opinion polls.

A final decision on whether the additional Guard units will be required next year in Iraq will not be made for months, the officials said, and the full extent of the Guard role next year will depend on whether the situation in Iraq improves in the meantime.

It has been clear since Mr. Bush announced his plan last month that additional reservists could be required in Iraq, but the numbers and the identity of the specific units involved had not been previously disclosed.

Changing the reservists' schedules means abandoning previous promises that they would get several years between deployments. And the acceleration means that soldiers who usually drill just once a month and for a few weeks in the summer will have to begin intensive preparations right away.

"We're behind the power curve, and we can't piddle around," Maj. Gen. Harry M. Wyatt III, commander of the Oklahoma National Guard, said in an interview. He added that one-third of his soldiers lacked the M-4 rifles preferred by active-duty soldiers and that there were also shortfalls in night vision goggles and other equipment. If his unit is going to be sent to Iraq next year, he said, "We expect the Army to resource the Guard at the same level as active-duty units."

He also noted that one of the brigade's battalions that could deploy to Iraq next year was now in Afghanistan and was not scheduled to return until April, which would leave its soldiers with just over a year at home before having to leave for Iraq in June 2008. He said discussions were under way with top Army officials about providing necessary equipment and extra compensation for reservists in the Oklahoma Guard's 45th Brigade Combat Team if the unit was sent back to Iraq two years earlier than planned.

Capt. Christopher Heathscott, a spokesman for the Arkansas National Guard, said the state's 39th Brigade Combat Team was 600 rifles short for its 3,500 soldiers and also lacked its full arsenal of mortars and howitzers.

Of particular concern, he said, is the possibility that the prospects of going to Iraq next year could cause some Arkansas reservists not to re-enlist this year. Over the next year roughly one-third of the soldiers in the 39th will have their enlistment contracts expire or be eligible for retirement, Captain Heathscott said.

Guard and Reserve units were used most extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004, and have regularly supplied brigades throughout the fighting. The reinforcements now heading for Iraq will raise the number of combat brigades now in Iraq, only one of which is a Guard unit, to around 20 total. Thousands of additional Reserve support troops would also be required sooner, officials said.

To draw more heavily on Reserve units, the Bush administration announced in January that it was revising rules that limited call-ups of Guard members. The previous policy limited mobilization of Guard members to 24 months every five years, but prolonged and large deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan led the Pentagon to abandon that rule.

The new guidelines allow units that have already been deployed in the last five years to be called up again, but the Pentagon has said that it will try to limit the total time Guard units are mobilized to a year, instead of the current year and a half to two years.

Given that they would be in Iraq for about nine months, that would leave only three months for training before they go. In the past, six months of training has been the norm before heading to the war zone.

To make up the difference, officials said the soldiers would get more part-time training, close to home, before being mobilized. That would cut the time they have to spend away from their jobs and families, Captain Heathscott said.

Military Tells Congress Of Equipment Shortfalls (POL)

By Christian Lowe

The Politico, February 21, 2007

In a move sure to provide ammunition to congressional critics of the Iraq war, military commanders have given Congress a long list of equipment and reconstruction needs totaling nearly $36 billion, denied earlier by the administration in its $481 billion defense appropriations request for the new fiscal year.

The lists come as Democratic leaders, who control both the House and the Senate, consider a new legislative strategy to restrict President Bush's ability to prosecute the war and, eventually, force a U.S. withdrawal.

The Army and Marine Corps say they need more than 5,000 armored vehicles, another $153 million for systems that defend against the deadly improvised explosive devices in Iraq and $13 million in language translation systems.

In an annual exercise initiated by the ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee, the military service chiefs were asked to forward spending priorities for the new 2008 fiscal year that either Pentagon budget planners or White House budget officials struck from the services' original requests. Lawmakers use the list to gauge where military commanders see shortfalls and to justify additions to the appropriations.

"Given the operational demands that Operation Iraqi Freedom and the Global War on Terrorism are placing on the services, it is more important than ever that Congress be aware of these unfunded requirements in order to fulfill its constitutional duty of providing adequate resources for our Armed Forces," wrote Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., in a Jan. 17 letter to the service chiefs requesting the lists.

Last week, the chairman of the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee, Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., began to lay out his strategy to restrict funding for the president's plan to "surge'' another 21,500 combat troops into Iraq until all Army and Marine units are certified as fully manned and equipped. And the list of unfunded projects could be used by him and other war critics to dramatically demonstrate shortfalls faced by the services.

The Army's $10.3 billion list includes $2.2 billion for 2,500 special vehicles to better protect troops against roadside bomb attacks. The Marines have asked for another 2,700 of the vehicles, totaling $2.8 billion.

The lack of armored vehicles has been a heated topic of debate on Capitol Hill as lawmakers consider a $93.4 billion wartime appropriation to finish the current fiscal year, another $141 billion in wartime funding bill for fiscal 2008, as well as the regular 2008 defense appropriations bill.

Though not carrying the brunt of the combat in Iraq or Afghanistan, the Navy detailed $5.6 billion in unfunded needs. And the Air Force issued a request for a $16.9 billion.

Their lists include some items that could prove controversial, such as a Navy request for $1.7 billion for an additional amphibious ship and $720 million to buy 12 F/A-18 Hornet fighter jets.

The Air Force wants two new C-17 transport planes at more than $1 billion, and $448 million for executive jets used by military commanders and government officials.

A Retreat From Big Cities Hurts ROTC Recruiting (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

Though Army Seeks More Ethnic Officers, It Shuns Northeast

QUEENS, N.Y. -- The ROTC program at St. John's University here seems perfectly placed for an Army that's desperate for officers who are bilingual and comfortable in foreign lands. About 40 of the 120 students speak second languages, including Turkish, Korean, Mandarin, Hindi, Albanian, and Gujarati.

"I had never even heard of Gujarati until I learned I had a cadet who spoke it," says Lt. Col. Timothy Walter, who heads the program.

But instead of being hailed as a model for the Army's future, the St. John's Reserve Officer Training Corps program is a lonely outpost of diversity. In the past few decades, the Army has pulled its officer training and recruiting programs out of the Northeast and big, ethnically diverse urban centers, choosing to concentrate on campuses in the South and Midwest. 1

There is no Army ROTC program in the Detroit area, with its large middle-class Muslim population, and only one in Miami and Chicago. In New York City, which produced more than 500 military officers a year in the 1950s and early 1960s, the two remaining ROTC programs last year yielded 34 Army officers.

In contrast, Alabama, which has a student population that is about one-fourth the size of the state of New York, has 10 ROTC programs that last year produced 174 Army officers. The South generates about 40% of all Army officers, according to Pentagon statistics.

An officer's background didn't matter so much when the U.S. was focused on fighting big armies in large conventional battles. These days, though, U.S. success in places like Iraq and Afghanistan hinges on the ability of Army officers to win the trust of a suspicious and often culturally alien population. Officers must court sheiks and warlords and work closely with indigenous security forces.

At a time when the country is growing more and more diverse, the Army is struggling to build an officer corps that takes full advantage of America's multiethnic society. There are only about 1,500 Muslims in a force of about 500,000 soldiers. Arabic speakers are in critically short supply throughout the force, say senior Army officials. Even in those cities, like New York, where the Army maintains ROTC, it is undermanned and culturally out-of-synch with the people it is trying to recruit.

"We've been very shortsighted," says retired Gen. Jack Keane, who served as the Army's vice chief of staff until he retired in 2004. "We have leaders in the Army who are uncomfortable in big urban areas. They feel awkward there."

The Army's retreat from urban areas has complex roots, from antimilitary sentiment in big cities in the wake of the Vietnam War to simple economics. Urban ROTC programs have generally produced fewer cadets and are considered poorer investments than programs at large campuses in the South. Internal Army studies say the best ROTC candidates are students whose parents have served in the military and enjoy physical activity. "They may have rafted, canoed, rock climbed or sky dived," an internal Army report states. Prime candidates also have served in leadership positions at school.

ROTC, which is open to full-time college students, produces officers who are the professional and intellectual core of the Army. The program graduates about 4,000 officers a year and supplies two-thirds of the Army's officer corps. Cadets must attend classes at least twice a week and work out in the mornings three times a week. The other officers come from West Point, which produces about 900 graduates a year, and the Army's Officer Candidate School at Fort Benning, Ga. ROTC graduates typically agree to serve eight years in the military after they graduate. The time can either be spent on active duty or in the reserves.

To prepare soldiers better for dealing with local populations, the Army has added language and cultural-awareness classes. At West Point, for example, cadets in the Social Sciences Department spend three days each year in Jersey City, N.J., a city of about 250,000 that includes large numbers of Muslims, Hindus and Egyptian Coptic Christians. The West Point cadets meet with local political and religious leaders. They spend the night in a mosque, meet with the Imam there and observe evening and morning prayers. During their last trip they were treated to a homemade feast from Hindu, Egyptian and Coptic Christian communities.

"The goal is to help cadets understand how a big, diverse, ethnic population works," says Maj. Stephanie Ahern, who oversees the trip.

But when it comes to recruiting officers from Jersey City, the Army has taken a pass. It closed its only two ROTC programs in Jersey City in the mid-1990s because they weren't producing many officers.

The Army's shift South began in the late 1960s at a time when anger over the war in Vietnam was prevalent on many Northeastern campuses. At some high-profile schools, like Harvard, Yale and Columbia, disagreements between the military and school administrators drove ROTC off campus. Many small Southern schools actively courted the military by setting aside new buildings for ROTC programs.

As the Army shrunk after the Cold War, it also shuttered large numbers of bases in the Northeast and relocated troops to sprawling facilities in the South and Midwest which were far from population centers and offered big training ranges. As a result, urban students today have far less exposure to the military, making them harder and more costly to recruit and retain in ROTC programs.

"We want to produce an officer corps that is fully reflective of the rich ethnicity and cultural diversity of our country," says Maj. Gen. Montague Winfield, who oversees the Army's ROTC programs nationwide. But, he says, the Army must also focus its money and personnel on areas that are likely to produce the largest number of high-quality officers at the least cost to taxpayers.

Last year, Cadet Command, which oversees training and recruitment of ROTC officers, came up 450 officers short of its goal of producing 4,500 second lieutenants. This year, the command will get about $175 million for scholarships to bring in more cadets, twice what it received in 2001. But it won't get additional officers and sergeants to expand programs to more campuses in urban markets.

"We are in a resource-constrained environment," says Gen. Winfield.

No place shows the shortcomings and the potential of urban ROTC programs better than New York. Created after World War II, ROTC was a big presence on campuses throughout New York City. The City College of New York, for example, swelled with more than 1,500 cadets in the 1950s, making it among the largest in America. Its most famous graduate is Gen. Colin Powell.

In the early 1970s, the Army began to leave the city. From 1968 to 1974, the Army closed 43 ROTC programs in the Northeast and opened 45 new programs in the South. In the early 1990s when the Army was downsizing at the end of the Cold War, it closed 70 more programs, including its remaining programs in Manhattan and Brooklyn.

For many Army officers and senior sergeants today, New York is an alien place. Master Sgt. Darrel Jolley got his papers sending him to teach at St. John's University while he was in Iraq. The official Army order listed his assignment as "Jamaica, Queens." "I thought I was going to the island of Jamaica," he says. When he found out he was going to New York, the 43-year-old sergeant says he tried to get out of the assignment. He failed.

Driving through Brooklyn and Queens Sgt. Jolley said he was initially taken aback by the clamor and the large number of people who looked as if they recently arrived from the Middle East. "There were times when I felt like I was back in Iraq. There were people dressed in those man-dresses that they wear in Iraq. The women had veils. I know I shouldn't say this, but it made me want to look for IEDs," he says, referring to improvised explosive devices.

It wasn't just the city that felt foreign. The ROTC students were also different. Many spoke with heavy accents and struggled with their English. About half of the cadets were female, a big change from Fort Bragg in Fayetteville, N.C., where he served in all-male units. Standing before his first class, Sgt. Jolley says he felt compelled to preemptively apologize for anything he might say to offend the students.

Three years into his St. John's assignment, where he teaches courses in military science, Sgt. Jolley has formed strong bonds with his cadets. Among those with whom he has formed closest ties is Yesim Yaktubay, a 20-year-old junior who attends St. John's on a ROTC scholarship.

Ms. Yaktubay, who migrated to the U.S. at age 10 from Turkey, says she was drawn to ROTC because she needed money for school and wanted to travel. Her father works as a carpenter in Queens and her mother is a homemaker. Her parents initially tried to talk her out of joining the military, and remain troubled by the Iraq war, she says. "They are from the Middle East. They have family over there and they were worried the war would spread to Turkey," she says. Her mother "kept saying I was going to get hurt or killed," Ms. Yaktubay says. Like many of the St. John's cadets, Ms. Yaktubay says she has her doubts about the wisdom of the war but "I support our troops."

As one of a handful of Muslims in the St. John's program, Ms. Yaktubay says she frequently finds herself answering Sgt. Jolley and her fellow cadets' questions about Islamic culture. The questions range from mundane queries about dietary laws to more serious ones about the role of jihad in the religion.

Ms. Yaktubay says she hopes her background growing up as an immigrant and a Muslim will make her a better officer. She plans to go into military intelligence. "I think it will help me understand people better, particularly their cultural differences and their background," she says.

Initially Ms. Yaktubay had her doubts about Sgt. Jolley, a broad-shouldered infantry soldier from western Pennsylvania. "We all expected him to be meaner and really push us," she says. Although her grades are strong, Ms. Yaktubay struggled with the Army physical-fitness test. Sgt. Jolley skipped lunch and took extra time in the evenings to help her and other recruits cut their time in the 2-mile run. "He has become like a second dad to me," she says.

Jessica Jurj came to the U.S. from Romania at age 14 and attends John Jay College of Criminal Justice, part of the City University of New York system in Manhattan. She struggled with her grades her freshman and sophomore years because she was working as much as 50 hours a week to support herself.

Today she is one of the leaders of the Fordham ROTC program in the Bronx. Her teacher, Lt. Col. Randy Powell, who runs the program, recalls how several years ago, he took the unit he was leading to an exercise with the Bulgarian military. "I was unprepared for the level of poverty," he says. "Having Jurj on my staff would have been a huge help."

The two remaining New York City programs -- at St. John's and Fordham -- are both fragile. Cadets often have long commutes involving buses and trains to reach them. Ms. Jurj says she has to get up at 4 a.m. to make it from Queens to her 6 a.m. mandatory Saturday ROTC class at Fordham. On days when she sleeps late she has to pay $40 in cab fare.

Without aggressive leadership, the programs can also quickly falter. In 2000, the ROTC program at Fordham University in the Bronx was producing about five officers a year and was on the verge of being shut down. The officers, who ran the program, rarely left the Fordham campus to recruit cadets.

Today it yields about 25 officers a year. A key player in the turnaround is Maj. Mike Hoblin, a Fordham ROTC grad and native New Yorker who was assigned to the program at its low ebb. Shortly after he arrived, Maj. Hoblin began offering ROTC classes at Fordham's campus in Lincoln Center, easing the commute for students who attend colleges in Manhattan, such as Columbia and New York University. Today the Fordham program has nine cadets from NYU, up from none in 2000.

But Maj. Hoblin also looked beyond the elite campuses. He focused attention on John Jay and City College of New York, two of some 20 schools in the 200,000-student CUNY system. At the time the CUNY system was producing virtually no ROTC candidates. He started attending career days and built relationships with professors and administrators who had connections to the military. Today, about 25% of the 112 cadets attending the ROTC program based at Fordham are from CUNY schools.

Even as he was expanding the Fordham program, Maj. Hoblin says he was struck by the missed opportunities in New York, particularly on the immigrant-heavy CUNY campuses, where there is no ROTC presence. "I have always found that first-generation immigrants in New York City are eager to serve," he says.

U.S. To Investigate Iraq Rape Case (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Wednesday that it will launch its own investigation into an alleged rape that has created a furor among Iraq's Sunnis and bitterly split the country's government.

Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, ordered an investigation into allegations by a 20-year-old Sunni woman who said she was raped last week by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki cleared the three police officers Tuesday following an investigation that lasted less than a day. He announced an unspecified reward for the officers and said the rape charge was fabricated to discredit the U.S. and Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad.

Al-Maliki on Wednesday fired a leading Sunni official who had called for an international investigation.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, top spokesman for the U.S. military here, announced Petraeus' decision to look into the allegations. Caldwell said U.S. doctors originally treated the woman and kept her overnight at a U.S. military hospital.

"What I can tell you is that at a point on Sunday evening an Iraqi woman was brought to our medical facility," he said. "She was put under the care of our medical personnel there, and sometime early Monday morning she was released."

The results of the U.S. investigation will be provided to Iraqi officials after they make a decision "on how they are going to move forward" with the judicial process, Caldwell said.

Ahmed al-Samaraie, the Sunni official fired by al-Maliki, said the woman's allegations were not unique.

"Many girls are raped, but they refuse to appear in the media so as not to tarnish their reputations," he said. Al-Samaraie heads the Sunni Endowment, which cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq.

The incident has fired public sentiment in a city riven by tension between Sunnis and majority Shiites.

"Everybody is talking about her and laughing at her, on the bus, on the streets, my family and all my friends," said A'mer Ameer, 35, a Shiite in Baghdad's Karada neighborhood. In TV interviews, the accuser was too calm to be believable, he said. "I think it's a game to destroy the security plan after (Sunni extremists) see it's starting to give good results."

Sunni students in Mosul rallied to demand a new government probe.

Farooq Ihssan, 33, from Baghdad's Ameriya district, said Sunnis at his mosque were urged to protest today. "Shame on every Iraqi who says this woman is a liar," Ihssan said.

Ahmed Abdullah, 29, a Sunni from Zaiona, had doubts. "I don't believe that Iraqis will rape a woman. We don't have such a culture. We might kill, behead or do torture, but rape — I don't think so," he said.

Rape is considered not only an assault on the victim but a grave offense against her entire family and community. The allegations harkened back to the dark years of Saddam Hussein's rule, when wives and daughters were raped in front of their husbands and fathers to exact confessions from the men.

Television stations in Egypt and the Persian Gulf have reported extensively on the case since Monday.

Maliki Fires Official For Criticizing Response To Rape Account (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0135024

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired a top Sunni official on Wednesday after he criticized the government's handling of a young Sunni woman's account of being raped by members of the Shiite-dominated security forces.

Mr. Maliki, responding to criticism that his Shiite-led government was rushing to discredit the woman's account because she is Sunni, also released what he said was evidence that she was lying, including a medical report that he said had come from an American-run hospital where the woman had been treated.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief American military spokesman, said that the hospital had given only the woman a copy of the medical report and that it was unclear whether Mr. Maliki's document was genuine.

A copy of Mr. Maliki's document, obtained by The New York Times, shows it to be inconclusive. It says the subject had no vaginal tearing, but notes bruises on her thighs. In an extremely unusual broadcast on Al Jazeera on Monday night, the woman said she had been beaten with a water hose during the attack.

It was also unclear if Mr. Maliki had the authority to fire the Sunni official, Sheik Ahmad Abdul Ghafur al-Samaraei, who runs the Sunni Endowment, an organization that cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq.

Mr. Samaraei, in an interview, said Mr. Maliki might need approval from a specific government council to fire him. The article in the Constitution cited by Mr. Maliki does not seem to be clear on this point.

But Mr. Samaraei said he was not surprised.

"Maliki is fed up with me talking about all the terrible things that are happening to Iraqis, whether it is killing, kidnappings or illegal arrests," he said. He said he had met with many Sunni women who confided that they had been raped by government soldiers.

It was the third day that Sunni and Shiite leaders bitterly debated the handling of the woman's charges.

It is almost unheard of in this Islamic country for a victim of rape to publicly acknowledge the crime, much less go on television. Sectarian motivations aside, Iraqi politicians, both Sunni and Shiite, seemed to be at a loss for how to deal with the topic publicly and at the same time delicately.

In the broadcast account, the woman said that after she was taken from her home in the west Baghdad neighborhood of Al Amil on Sunday, she was raped by at least three members of the National Police.

General Caldwell said she was treated at an American-administered hospital in the Green Zone. American military officials did not elaborate, saying only that they were trying to make sense of the case themselves.

On Wednesday, Sunni and Shiite leaders called news conferences to condemn one another.

Abdul Nasir al-Janabi, a leader in the Tawafiq bloc of Sunni political parties, said the government was covering up many rapes of Iraqi women by the security forces. He threatened that Sunni parties might withdraw from the government if their concerns were not addressed.

He also sought to rally support from the broader Sunni Islamic world, calling on "the international Arab and Muslim conscience to raise its voice and condemn these indescribable crimes."

Mr. Janabi and other Sunni leaders pointed out that it was only a matter of hours before the prime minister shifted from calling for an investigation of the woman's allegations to denouncing her as a liar and criminal and praising the officers involved.

The criticisms quickly escalated from specific concerns about the woman's case to the broader security crackdown in Baghdad, which Mr. Maliki is in charge of organizing.

Mr. Janabi joined other Sunni leaders in condemning the plan as a sham meant to allow Shiite militias to go into hiding while Sunnis were harassed.

Mr. Maliki, on the other hand, found the harsh comments from Sunni leaders to be further proof that the woman's claims had been fabricated and aimed at undermining his authority and the credibility of the security plan. His office released a defiant, at times confusing, statement.

"We expected this fabricated propaganda," the statement said. "The purpose of this is to obstruct and distort the law enforcing plan."

The Maliki administration contended that the clothes of a person who had been kidnapped by Sunni militants had been found in the woman's home. The person's body, the statement said, "was found buried in another house."

The woman first came under suspicion of aiding militants, according to the document, when a police officer "saw her cooking for a large number of people while she was alone in the house." This happened again, the release said, and the woman was preparing enough food to feed "more than 10 people."

The statement twice cited American involvement to bolster the claims, including that military advisers were "present in all stages of arrest, transportation of the complainant and interrogation."

General Caldwell, the American military spokesman, did not confirm that. While acknowledging that she had been admitted to an American-run medical facility on Sunday, he refused to divulge details of her treatment or examination.

In the statement to news organizations, Mr. Maliki went beyond trying to prove that the woman had not been raped, implying that she was unmarried and having an affair.

Iraq Rape Charge Stirs Sectarian Storm (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

A Sunni woman says she was assaulted by Shiite police, but Iraq's Prime Minister says the charge is bogus.

The armored convoy of Iraqi officials rolled into a police garrison in southwest Baghdad Wednesday to investigate highly charged claims of rape by a Sunni woman against Shiite police commandos.

They brought with them Sabrin al-Janabi, the alleged victim and the center of a political firestorm that has spread across Iraq in the aftermath of these rarely public allegations. Iraq's deputy minister of interior aimed to see if he could identify the perpetrators, to calm claims that are being amplified by politicians and fueling sectarian tensions.

Indeed, Iraq is a country where perception, instead of fact, often defines wartime realities.

Even before the details of the case could be determined, Iraqis heard competing claims by the alleged Sunni victim broadcast on TV and a Shiite premier who says the charges have been fabricated to undermine the US-Iraqi security plan in Baghdad.

Interviews with officers who jailed Mrs. Janabi (a nickname used by the woman), witnesses to her brief arrest, and other sources cast doubt on the rape claims. US officers – who were apparently present in the garrison during the alleged incident, Iraqi officers claim – have so far not provided their version of events.

In the latest sign of the toll taken on Iraq's fragile unity government, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki Wednesday fired a top Sunni official, the head of the Sunni Endowment board, whose group declared the "horrific crime" to be proof that the Baghdad crackdown is a failure.

Mr. Maliki states that medical tests show the woman "had not been subjected to any sexual attack," and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her. Maliki's office Wednesday released a one-page medical report, typical of those used in US military facilities here, that appeared to prove that point. The handwritten words "no vaginal lacerations or obvious injury" are clear, though the place for the name is covered by a sticker with a number.

In a statement, the premier blamed "certain parties" for trying to "sow confusion about the security plan and tarnish the reputation of our forces," adding that the three falsely accused officers would be "rewarded."

But Janabi's claims and Maliki's handling of the case are sparking outrage among Sunnis.

"One of them put his hand on my mouth so no one outside the room could hear me," Janabi said on television. "I told them 'I did not know that an Iraqi could do this to another Iraqi.' "

Iraqi officers interviewed at the garrison and involved in the arrest in the Al Amel district dispute those claims, saying that Janabi spent only 20 minutes in the office of the garrison commander with several Iraqis asking questions. They were in the constant presence of US soldiers inside the room, says an Iraqi major who asked not to be named.

Sunni leaders have already accused the US and Shiite-led government of singling out their neighborhoods for clearance in the security plan; the rape charges fed those concerns.

Mahmoud al-Mashadani, the Sunni speaker of parliament, warned that "if you [Maliki] don't bring justice to this Muslim Iraqi woman, whom you should view as your sister or daughter, history will curse us with eternal disgrace."

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a major Sunni insurgent group, vowed on its website that they would "not sleep or be satisfied until we avenge you and every free woman who was stripped of her virtue and dignity."

The group called on its militants to "focus" their attacks against Iraqi troops, especially police commandos, in a campaign that for the next month would be called "Sabrin," after the alleged victim.

US soldiers, whom the woman claimed had helped free her from the Iraqi police commandos, have yet to confirm such a role. The woman "received care" at a US hospital in the Green Zone overnight Sunday, said a US spokesman.

"Many of the events and circumstances surrounding this alleged assault are still being pulled together ... to establish what may or may not have happened," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told a press conference Wednesday. The top US commander in Iraq has appointed a military lawyer to examine the case.

Rape is a taboo topic in Iraq, and lethal revenge, even against the female victim by male family members, is not punishable under the law.

The saga began Sunday when the woman was detained along with about 10 suspected Sunni insurgents occupying homes from which Shiite residents had been forced out. One of the Iraqis who made the arrest said the police had been tipped off by Iraqi soldiers at a nearby base that Sunni insurgents had moved into a house in Al Amel.

Four police commandos entered the house shortly after the 6 a.m. curfew, and were surprised to find Janabi sleeping there alone, according to an Iraqi 1st lieutenant who was one of the four. Janabi appeared "disturbed," and complained of problems with her kidneys and nerves to explain the presence of tablets this officer said were sedatives or painkillers.

She gave her name as Zainab, according to this officer's account, but had no identity or residence papers, which she claimed her husband had just left with. Another police commando recognized Janabi from a raid just two days before, on Friday, in which she was at another abandoned house and cooking for 10 people.

"You are like a cat, every day in a different house," the officer recalled telling Janabi. Other officers who recognized her recalled that the jacket of a kidnap victim had been found near the house where she was cooking on Friday. The body of that kidnapped person – along with four other corpses – was found in a nearby secondary school on Monday.

When asked what she was doing there, Janabi apparently told that she had "deceived" the officers the previous Friday, in explaining herself.

Janabi was not handcuffed, Iraqi officers say, but first was put in the open-backed truck of the deputy commander, and then separated from the male detainees – who were shortly released – and locked in the back of a military ambulance alone to be driven to the garrison.

"I received orders to put her in the back of the ambulance," says the driver of the vehicle, Saad. He said American troops saw Janabi as she was put in, and told him: "Transport her to the camp," indicating that they would soon meet him there.

According to the driver, Janabi was never tied and was deposited directly in the office of the Iraqi camp commander. Janabi was in that room for questioning for 20 minutes, says the Iraqi major who was present, in an interview. Americans were in the room throughout, says this officer.

"It was just question and answer. Nothing happened," the major asserts. They asked about why she had been found cooking for so many people two days earlier, on Friday, and why there were holes in the walls connecting abandoned houses – a tactic typically used for quick escapes. They told her about the significance of the jacket and the kidnap victim.

Within hours of the house raid Sunday, Shiite witnesses, who had been with the police commandos and hoped to reclaim their houses from Sunni gunmen, said that among those arrested was a "prostitute" who appeared drunk or on drugs. Some Iraqis, Shiite and Sunni alike, say they are suspicious of the woman's story.

"Maybe it's fake and they gave her some money to say this – to be an actress," suggests one older Sunni woman, who also happens to be from the large al-Janabi tribe and could not be named. "Sometimes women like these give information to the insurgents because they give them money, and make calls to the police or US troops to set them up for insurgent ambushes."

Even as Sunni and Shiite politicians struggle to take advantage of the perception gap over assault charges, ABC News on its website quoted an Iraqi government source saying that Janabi had recanted her claims, saying she was never raped, and had been paid for the television interview.

Adding more spin to the case, that source said the story was meant to "manipulate the security plan," as part of a "great effort by the bad guys to tell the world that this [plan] is not working."

Prodi Quits After Foreign Policy Defeat (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Romano Prodi resigned as prime minister of Italy on Wednesday night after a parliamentary defeat on foreign policy. His decision raised fears that Italy was returning to the days of short-lived governments and paralysis in policymaking.

Mr Prodi, 67, handed in his resignation to Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, who planned to start talks on Thursday to see who, if anyone, has enough support to form a new government.

Mr Prodi's nine-party, centre-left coalition took office in May, a month after he defeated Silvio Berlusconi, the former centre-right premier, in the closest election in modern Italian history.

The sudden crisis that overwhelmed Mr Prodi centred on his inability to persuade communists and other radical leftists in his coalition to support two cornerstones of Italian foreign and security policy. These were Mr Prodi's determination to keep Italian troops side by side with Nato forces in Afghanistan and his decision to permit the expansion of a US military base in the north-eastern city of Vicenza.

Although the radical left said it did not want to bring down Mr Prodi, the parliamentary rebellion of a handful of dissident leftwingers was sufficient to ensure that the government lost a motion by two votes in the Senate, the legislature's upper house.

Mr Prodi felt obliged to resign because the defeat signalled that his coalition was incapable of producing a majority from its own ranks to ensure that Italy met its international commitments. The options facing Italy's political classes include the formation of a new Prodi-led government; the creation of a centre-left government without him; the emergence of a centrist-dominated government including moderate opposition politicians; and a snap general election.

Pierluigi Castagnetti, a centre-left moderate and deputy speaker of parliament's lower house, said he did not want a snap election – not least because Italy's electoral law, a fully proportional representation system, needed to be changed first.

The Union of Christian Democrats, the third largest and most moderate opposition party, said it was ready to hold talks with centre-left parties.

Mr Prodi's government was the 61st in Italy since the second world war and held office for nine months – slightly less than the average government length between 1945 and 2001.

Although he started to restore order to the shaky public finances and began to open up Italy's professions and service industries to more competition, the government was always under pressure because of its one-seat majority in the Senate.

The abrupt crisis appeared to surprise many communists and radical leftists, who wanted to flag their discontent with Mr Prodi's foreign policy but without toppling their government.

Mr Berlusconi said Mr Prodi had no choice but to resign, as Massimo D'Alema, foreign minister, made clear on Tuesday the government would "go home" if it lost yesterday's vote.

Italy's Prime Minister Resigns After Foreign Policy Defeat (USAT)

By Eric J. Lyman

USA Today, February 22, 2007

ROME — Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned Wednesday when his coalition government fractured over foreign policy, including his decision to keep Italian troops alongside U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

Prodi submitted his resignation to President Giorgio Napolitano after a humiliating defeat in the Italian Senate. It was intended to boost political backing for Prodi's foreign policy.

Napolitano is likely to indicate today whether he will call elections or ask Prodi — or someone else — to form a new government. The next government will be Italy's 62nd since the end of World War II.

Prodi took power nine months ago but lacked a clear mandate after a razor-thin election victory in April over incumbent Silvio Berlusconi, a media tycoon.

The result gave Prodi's coalition a one-vote majority in the Senate, but three defections Wednesday left him with 158 senators in his corner — two short of the 160 he needed for passage of the foreign policy measure.

Italy's 1,800 troops in Afghanistan are part of the NATO peacekeeping force there. Many members of the broad center-left Prodi coalition are pacifists who oppose sending Italian troops abroad.

The constitution did not require Prodi to step down, but Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema — a two-time prime minister and a potential candidate to succeed Prodi — said before the vote that the government should step down if it failed to win enough support in the Senate.

"If Prodi would have continued, his government would have been paralyzed," said Giorgio Prestigiacomo, a political scientist at Florence's Catholic University. "Better to let a new government — whether he leads it or someone else does — start fresh."

The last time an Italian prime minister resigned was in April 2005, when Berlusconi stepped down after infighting in his coalition. He was able to form a new government within days.

It might be tougher for Prodi to follow suit. His deficit-reduction plan, featuring tax increases and cuts in public spending, has hurt his popularity ratings.

Another divisive issue has been his government's decision to support a plan to double the size of the U.S. military base in Vicenza, northern Italy. The base houses troops of the Army's 173rd Airborne Brigade.

The expansion plan, set in motion by Berlusconi's government and backed by Prodi, drew tens of thousands of protesters during the past weekend.

"Prodi's approval level (percentage) is in the mid-30s, and that makes things tough for him," said Maria Rossi, co-director of the polling firm Opinioni.

Prodi's resignation could open the door for a long-shot bid by Berlusconi or another member of the opposition to try to form a new coalition.

Prodi narrowly loses a foreign policy vote in the Senate, toppling his 9-month-old coalition.

ROME — Stung by a bruising foreign policy defeat, beleaguered Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned Wednesday, his center-left government collapsing after just nine months in power.

Prodi failed to win parliamentary endorsement of his decision to maintain Italian troops in Afghanistan, a loss attributed in part to desertions by members of his coalition who oppose continued cooperation with the U.S. military in Italy and abroad.

Chants of "Quit! Quit!" filled the Italian Senate as opposition politicians in business suits jumped up and down and pumped their fists upon realizing Prodi had lost the vote. A few hours later, he tendered his resignation to Italian President Giorgio Napolitano.

Napolitano said through a spokesman that he would begin talks today aimed at forming a new government.

Among the scenarios, he could ask Prodi to build a new government, avoiding fresh elections that neither the right nor the left appeared eager to engage in just yet.

Prodi will continue as a caretaker prime minister until a new government takes power, Napolitano's office said.

The nation was once infamous for its revolving-door governments during decades of tumultuous political infighting and scandal. Prodi's predecessor, Silvio Berlusconi, last year became the first Italian prime minister since World War II to finish a five-year term.

Berlusconi prided himself on the length of his tenure, and many Italians hoped a new era of stability had dawned. But Prodi's government was probably doomed from the start. He narrowly defeated Berlusconi's center-right coalition in hard-fought elections last year, gaining only the tiniest of majorities in the Senate, which enfeebled his mandate.

Berlusconi, who could return to office again, could barely contain his glee Wednesday. "The government has been clamorously defeated in Parliament," he said.

Prodi's resignation was a matter of "political, constitutional and ethical" duty, Berlusconi said, adding that the prime minister's handling of foreign policy proved him "incapable" and brought "international humiliation" to Italy.

The event that triggered the government crisis was not a confidence vote and did not carry a constitutional requirement that the prime minister step down. It was, instead, a Senate vote to endorse the government's general foreign policy, including maintenance of Italy's 1,800-member military mission in Afghanistan.

But Prodi and his foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, had staked their credibility on the measure. "I am asking for a strong and clear consensus," D'Alema said on the Senate floor.

The move proved to be a serious miscalculation. The measure fell short of winning Senate majority approval by two votes.

Prodi's coalition, a patchwork of nine disparate political parties, has been torn by divisions and bickering. Several leading leftists in the coalition want Italy out of Afghanistan and oppose Prodi's decision to permit the U.S. military to expand its base at Vicenza in northern Italy.

Tens of thousands of Italians, including members of three parties from the Prodi coalition, marched last week on the northern base to protest the expansion.

Prodi has said he is obliged to carry through with a promise made by Berlusconi that gave Washington permission to enlarge the base. Reneging would be seen as an "act of hostility," Prodi said.

In another move this month that embarrassed Prodi, Berlusconi's opposition bloc managed to pass a measure in the Senate approving the Vicenza expansion.

Angered over Vicenza, two Communist senators, Franco Turigliatto and Ferdinando Rossi, took Wednesday's vote as their cue to abandon Prodi. Their desertion deprived Prodi of the majority he needed, setting in motion the government's fall.

Analysts here were quick to recall that it was far-left members of his coalition that toppled Prodi's earlier government in 1998.

Prodi may yet be able to hold on to power. His allies were rallying Wednesday evening to his defense and plotting ways to reconfigure their government.

"We are ready to reconfirm our full support for the Prodi government," Dario Franceschini of the centrist Margherita (Daisy) party said, suggesting that a confidence vote could be called that would demonstrate that Prodi and his coalition still have a majority to govern.

But the opposition was equally emphatic in doubting that Prodi would continue in office.

"If he wants to go ahead [and attempt to form a government], good luck," opposition politician Pier Ferdinando Casini told state television. But, he added, "the country is paying the price."

Italian Premier Resigns After Foreign Policy Loss (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

ROME, Feb. 21 — Italy's fragile government snapped suddenly on Wednesday under the weight of its own internal divisions as well as a broader skepticism about the European role in the worldwide fight against terrorism.

Prime Minister Romano Prodi, in office just nine months, submitted his resignation Wednesday evening after his governing coalition lost a key vote on foreign policy in the Senate.

Two far-left members of his coalition abstained amid tensions over whether Italy should continue to provide troops to Afghanistan and Mr. Prodi's support of an expansion of an American military base in Vicenza, in northern Italy.

With only a razor-thin majority, the abstentions killed the measure, aimed at gaining Senate support for Italy's foreign policy, and unexpectedly, doomed the government.

"I can't in any way give my vote to this government with this foreign policy," said Fernando Rossi, a senator from the Italian Communist Party and one of the dissenters.

The vote took place the same day Britain announced a substantial reduction of its troops in southern Iraq, and a week after a European Parliamentary committee issued a strong report criticizing secret American flights in Europe of terrorism suspects.

But the government's collapse also reflected its own inherent weaknesses, possibly signaling that Italy's chronic political instability may be coming out of remission. In a nation that has had some 60 governments since World War II, Mr. Prodi has presided uneasily over a coalition of nine diverse parties, ranging from moderate Catholics to Communists.

"It's very bad," said Roberto D'Alimonte, a professor at the University of Florence and expert in electoral law. "We still have to come to terms with a working political system. We do not have a working political system."

There are many scenarios for what comes next — and one possibility, if not immediately likely, is a return to power of Silvio Berlusconi, whom Mr. Prodi defeated in elections last year.

As ministers met late into the night to discuss how to proceed, Mr. Berlusconi's supporters rallied outside the seat of government, waving banners and demanding that the government step aside.

"The country has been exposed, by a majority that isn't and by an incompetent government that has rejected parliamentary dialogue — a grave international humiliation," Mr. Berlusconi told reporters.

For Mr. Berlusconi to return, new elections would have to be held, which at the moment seems several steps in the future.

After accepting Mr. Prodi's resignation, President Giorgio Napolitano will begin to consult with political parties on Thursday and will ask one of them to try to form a government.

Many political experts believed that Mr. Prodi would be given a chance to shuffle his cabinet in a way that would satisfy the parties already in the government. Then he would call for a confidence vote in Parliament.

But many experts noted that such a government would remain weak, with the deep splits over Afghanistan and the American base unresolved.

"Something has broken," said Franco Pavoncello, the president of John Cabot University here and a political scientist. "This vote and the reaction of the government has created damage to Prodi's ability to last."

In theory, the prime minister's term lasts five years, but Mr. Berlusconi is the only prime minister to have endured that long.

While the government's weakness made it liable to fall at any moment, its collapse on Wednesday came as something of a surprise. For months the government has been bickering internally — and weathering attacks by Mr. Berlusconi and other opposition leaders — over issues ranging from the budget to a proposed law giving rights to unmarried couples.

But foreign policy remained a particular weak spot. Essentially, Mr. Prodi and his ministers have sought to walk a difficult line, echoing much of the skepticism in Europe about President Bush and the war in Iraq while maintaining Italy's traditionally strong ties with America.

The government's far-left members, however, have strongly resisted the presence of nearly 2,000 Italian troops in Afghanistan. And last weekend, tens of thousands of people rallied against the expansion of the American-staffed NATO base in Vicenza, which Mr. Prodi's government reluctantly supported.

The splits grew deeper, and on Tuesday in Spain, Italy's foreign minister, Massismo D'Alema, himself a former prime minister, called for the Senate to endorse Italy's foreign policy. If it did not, he said, the government should "go home," or step down.

In a long and impassioned speech before the vote on Wednesday, Mr. D'Alema defended his government's position on Afghanistan and the Vicenza base, in terms that he hoped would win the left's support.

"We have not supported the neoconservative politics of the American administration and we have not sent soldiers to Iraq," he told his colleagues. "There is a profound difference between the military operations in Afghanistan, approved by the United Nations, and those in Iraq."

He added that the support of expanding the base was essential to good relations with America. "To change course would be a hostile act against the United States," he said.

In the end, the government needed 160 votes but received only 158 with the two abstentions. Opposition senators roared at the result, shouting immediately: "Resign! Resign!"

Many experts said they believed that Mr. D'Alema, one of the most powerful and experienced members of the government, would resign. And as Italy's leaders search for a broader solution in the next few days, there are several alternatives to a mere shuffling of the current cabinet.

The most dramatic, and perhaps least likely, is that Mr. Napolitano could call immediate elections. But he has said he will not do so until the current electoral law, instated by Mr. Berlusconi last year, is changed. Many experts blame the law for virtually guaranteeing a thin majority in the Senate no matter who wins, and thus destabilizing the political system.

Another option is the appointment of a temporary government made up of largely centrist technocrats. The aim would be to steer Italy toward new elections, most likely engineering a change to electoral laws first.

A final possibility involves peeling off the more centrist Union of Christian Democrats, a party long allied, if uneasily, with Mr. Berlusconi. Even as the government tottered on Wednesday, one party leader, Marco Follini, seemed to raise the possibility. "The moment has arrived to put into the pipeline a different center-left," he told reporters.

But Professor D'Alimonte noted that the party did not have enough seats to allow Mr. Prodi to cast off the rebellious far-left of his own party. Simply adding on Mr. Follini's party remained a possibility, although Professor D'Alimonte noted that it also seemed a recipe for even deeper disputes since it shares little politically with the Communists who brought down the government.

How Prodi's Exit Stunts Italy (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn And Luca Di Leo

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The resignation of Prime Minister Romano Prodi risks stalling Italy's nascent process of economic overhaul just as the country is finally joining in Europe's broader recovery.

The move -- prompted by the government's defeat in a parliamentary vote on foreign policy -- also leaves in doubt whether Italian troops will remain part of the NATO coalition in Afghanistan.

President Giorgio Napolitano today will begin seeking to form a new government, which would need approval from Italy's fractious Parliament. It's unlikely Mr. Napolitano would call for early elections. But no outcome bodes well for Mr. Prodi, who must struggle to regain even a narrow political consensus.

Elected last year with a tiny majority in the Senate -- which later narrowed to a single vote -- Mr. Prodi had been walking a tightrope while trying to push through legislation that could win backing from all nine parties in his governing coalition, including two separate Communist parties.

Still, his center-left government did pass several controversial measures prying open sectors of the economy, from pharmacies to legal services, that long were buffered from competition. It also won a budget bill that improved Italy's public accounts after several consecutive years of runaway deficit spending under the previous government, led by Silvio Berlusconi.

Those measures have boosted business confidence and slightly propelled Italy's economy, which grew 2% last year after a flat 2005. But the latest crisis has crippled the governing coalition's ability to push its agenda, and made it unlikely that any serious overhaul of Italy's bloated pension system or a boost in the retirement age -- both staunchly opposed by the coalition's left-wing parties -- will be achieved anytime soon. The state pension system eats up more than 15% of Italian gross domestic product a year, the highest level in the euro zone.

The uncertainty also casts doubt on other plans, such as the government's effort to sell off its money-losing airline, Alitalia SpA, to private investors. "It will take a few days to sort out what happens next," said Giulio Sapelli, board member at Italy's largest bank by market capitalization, UniCredit SpA.

More broadly, Rome's confusion deepens the political jam afflicting some core European economies, such as those in France and Germany. France's efforts to open up its rigid labor market -- which many analysts blame for its economic sluggishness -- remain stalled since President Jacques Chirac backed down last year from a controversial labor-overhaul bill. The country is in political stasis leading up to presidential elections in April.

In Germany, the bipartisan coalition government under Chancellor Angela Merkel has struggled on most of the major challenges facing the country, including funding health care and pensions. Divisions between Ms. Merkel's conservatives and their center-left partners, the Social Democrats, have led to tortuous compromises; a recently agreed health-care overhaul, for instance, didn't solve the central problem of how to pay for rising future costs.

The move also could cause ripples in Afghanistan, where the North Atlantic Treaty Organization faces a resurgent Taliban. The catalyst of yesterday's events was a vote in Italy's Senate that was supposed to affirm the main tenets of its foreign policy, including the continued presence of 2,000 Italian troops in Afghanistan as part of the NATO mission there. The far left opposes the deployment. The government fell two votes short of the backing it sought.

The Bush administration has been lobbying NATO governments to increase their contributions to Afghanistan in advance of a feared springtime offensive by Taliban forces. President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, was in Brussels yesterday urging U.S. allies to contribute more troops. So far, European countries have been reluctant to boost their presence.

The collapse of Mr. Prodi's government after only eight months harkens back to a previous era in Italy. For the half-century following the ratification of its 1948 constitution, governments lasted less than a year on average. That often led to caretaker governments and early elections.

Sen. Mario Baldassarri, a former deputy economy minister, suggested yesterday that the best solution might be early elections. "It might be a good stimulus for Europe to have both France and Italy voting at around the same time," he said.

Prime Minister Quits On Afghanistan Vote (WT)

By John Phillips

ROME - Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned yesterday after radical, anti-American senators demanding Italy withdraw troops from Afghanistan failed to support the center-left government, setting off an unexpected political crisis.

Mr. Prodi, a former Christian Democrat and former president of the European Commission, looked grim as he formally quit during an audience with President Giorgio Napolitano hours after the government was defeated by two votes on its Afghanistan policy in the upper house, where any chance for a majority would be razor thin.

The president, who asked Mr. Prodi to carry on in a caretaker capacity, may ask the prime minister to hold a full confidence vote in both houses of parliament, perhaps after a Cabinet reshuffle, political commentators said.

Government whips had prepared for the Senate vote carefully, but at least one "sharpshooter" from the Communist Refoundation party, on the hard left of the coalition, evidently abstained, political sources said. In all, 158 senators supported the government, 136 voted against and 24 abstained. Mr. Prodi needed 160 votes to muster a majority.

Before the vote, Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema pledged that Italian troops would remain in Afghanistan, but he said Italy would increase the civilian component in its mission.

Left-wing radicals in the Prodi government had demanded an Italian-sponsored peace conference on Afghanistan and insisted that Rome reject demands by Britain and the United States to change the rules of engagement governing the Italian troops, most of whom are based in Kabul.

Mr. Prodi was known to be concerned that the Italian contingent may be ordered into combat zones and take casualties when an expected Taliban offensive starts in the spring.

Ever since its inception last year, the government has come under pressure from its anti-American left wing on a constellation of foreign policy issues, and tension between Rome and Washington has ebbed and flowed.

Mr. D'Alema, a former communist, flew into a rage recently when the U.S. ambassador and other Rome-based envoys published an open letter to Italians in a Rome daily underlining the importance of Italian troops in Afghanistan.

The government also has been under pressure from magistrates in Milan who want Mr. Prodi to press Washington for the extradition of CIA agents purportedly involved in the "extreme rendition" of an Egyptian imam, Abu Omar, who was kidnapped on a Milan street.

The Prodi government presided over the withdrawal of Italian troops from Iraq, although that had been decided by the previous government led by the conservative Silvio Berlusconi.

Mr. Prodi and Mr. D'Alema both criticized U.S. air raids in Somalia and the Bush administration plan for a troop surge in Iraq.

The government also has been under pressure over Mr. Prodi's approval of the extension of a U.S. military base at the northern city of Vicenza. Dozens of lawmakers took part in a rally against the extension at Vicenza on Saturday.

Supporters of Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party last night gathered outside the Palazzo Chigi, Mr. Prodi's office, chanting, "Prodi go home."

However, political commentators said Mr. Napolitano, himself a former communist, may want to give Mr. Prodi a second chance because his administration is only a few months old and followed a long period in office by Mr. Berlusconi.

Italian Premier Quits After Narrow Defeat Over Foreign Policy (WP)

By Sarah Delaney

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

ROME, Feb. 21 -- After just nine months at the helm of a shaky government, Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi handed in his resignation Wednesday when he lost a critical parliamentary vote over the government's foreign policy.

President Giorgio Napolitano asked Prodi to stay on as head of a caretaker government, and the day's frenetic events do not necessarily signal the end of Prodi's tenure as premier. Napolitano could ask him to try to form a new coalition after completing a round of consultations.

But Wednesday's vote did confirm the delicate nature of Prodi's disparate band of political allies, a fragility evident since the coalition's narrow victory last April.

The crisis in the center-left government opened up when a motion in the Senate to support a wide-ranging foreign policy address by Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema failed by two votes. In that speech, D'Alema called for continuation of the Italian role in NATO's Afghanistan mission and the expansion of a U.S. military base in northern Italy because refusal would be "a hostile act towards the U.S.A."

When the motion received 158 votes rather than the required 160, the side of the Senate occupied by the conservative opposition reacted with joy and members began chanting, "Resignation! Resignation!"

Senators on the other side stood silent, stunned by their apparent miscalculation.

Even though the vote was not binding as a confidence vote, D'Alema had tried to rein in the far left ahead of time by declaring that failure to reach a majority on such a crucial issue would send the government home.

The Prodi coalition eked out a 25,000-vote victory against the incumbent government led by Silvio Berlusconi in April, resulting in a comfortable margin in the lower Chamber of Deputies but a one-seat majority in the Senate. The refusal of two far-left senators to abandon their antiwar positions for the sake of political survival in Wednesday's vote assured the resolution's defeat.

Prodi's coalition includes nine parties, from Communists to Christian Democrats, and has faced problems on nearly every issue it has confronted.

The coalition showed serious cracks last weekend over a protest in Vicenza, where the United States wants to expand an Army base to allow for additional battalions of the 173rd Airborne Brigade, which is to deploy to Afghanistan. Tens of thousands participated in the peaceful protest, which was encouraged by some members of the government.

Prodi and D'Alema had nevertheless garnered support from most of the cabinet to go along with the expansion.

Major divisions have also appeared over Afghanistan, where Italy has about 1,800 troops. Some far-left members of the government oppose any Italian military involvement there and have called for those troops to be withdrawn.

Prodi has not faced pressure only from the left. A recent government move toward allowing legal recognition of cohabitating couples and homosexual unions risked alienating the coalition's Catholic component.

Napolitano, the president, has a few options: calling for votes of confidence in the Prodi government in both houses; asking someone else to try to form a government; or calling for another round of elections.

Crimes Of Politics (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0135034

HOW DOES A government prosecute people for crimes against humanity when the suspects happen to be running the government? That's the question facing Afghanistan, where men suspected of horrifying acts of rape and murder sit in parliament and hold other high offices.

The question of what to do about these suspected mass killers heated up Tuesday when the upper house of Afghanistan's parliament passed a resolution calling for amnesty for those accused of war crimes. The same resolution has already passed in the lower house and will become law if approved by President Hamid Karzai. Its success is unsurprising because many of those voting on the resolutions were previously regional warlords who might otherwise be subject to prosecution.

Following the Soviet pullout in 1989, Afghanistan was torn by years of civil war, during which warlords who had fought in the resistance movement began battling each other — and committing atrocities against civilian populations. Then, in 1996, the Taliban came to power, and it ruled until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. At the time, the United States found these disaffected warlords to be convenient allies, but now they're creating some serious governance headaches.

The ideal solution for Afghanistan would be to create a body similar to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which, starting in 1996, helped heal the wounds left by decades of apartheid rule. Those who committed human rights abuses were granted amnesty if they publicly testified about their crimes. Yet South Africa, unlike Afghanistan, didn't have to contend with entrenched politicians who control large swaths of territory with armed militias. It also had the capacity to prosecute those who refused to step forward, while Afghan courts are a work in progress.

Nonetheless, the parliament's amnesty resolution is a step backward. It's hard for the Afghan people to have much faith in their government when many remember all too well the campaigns of terror waged by some of their current leaders. Where the government has no credibility, the rule of law doesn't hold sway.

So if court trials are an impossibility, reconciliation is impractical and amnesty is self-destructive, what's left? For now at least, the status quo. Karzai's best course would be to reject the amnesty law until the country is ready to face the horrors of its recent past. The international community, especially NATO, should be doing more to help Afghanistan build the institutions and civil society necessary for it to do so.

Pelosi Seeks Tougher Oversight On Ethics (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi called for tighter ethics rules in federal agencies Wednesday after government officials approved the purchase of a $980,000 vacation home by a top Justice Department lawyer with an oil company lobbyist.

Pelosi's criticism followed an Associated Press report last week that department ethics officials did not object when Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then head of the environment division, was buying a South Carolina beach house with Donald R. Duncan, the top Washington lobbyist for ConocoPhillips.

"If in fact Ms. Wooldridge got such a pass from the ethics committee of the executive branch, then certainly the executive branch ethics process needs a look as well," Pelosi, D-Calif., said when asked about the house purchase at a San Francisco news conference.

Nine months after the purchase, Wooldridge approved an agreement that allowed ConocoPhillips an extension of pollution cleanup requirements at some of the company's refineries. The company says Duncan was not part of those negotiations.

Department officials and a lawyer for Wooldridge, who resigned from the job in January, said the department's ethics office approved the arrangement and told her she did not need to withdraw from dealings with ConocoPhillips.

The third buyer of the Kiawah Island, S.C., home was Wooldridge's companion, former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles. He is the highest-ranking Bush administration official facing possible criminal charges in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is looking into the home purchase and consent decrees, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said in a letter Friday to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Conyers had asked for an explanation and documents related to the purchase after the AP report. The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee also is monitoring the case.

`Pink Rhinoceros' Not That Hard To See (CHIT)

By John Kass

Chicago Tribune, February 22, 2007

Seeking to overturn former Gov. George Ryan's corruption convictions, lawyer Gene Schaerr on Tuesday told a federal appellate court panel that "a pink rhinoceros" hung over the trial, making a fair jury verdict impossible, perhaps because the lone pro-Ryan holdout juror was bounced for failing to disclose her criminal record.

I thought that was why there were alternate jurors--if one or two are excused for cause, you've got a few on the B Team.

But the pink rhinoceros bit is so nice, I'll steal it and remind you of another pink rhinoceros.

Ed McNally is the pink rhinoceros of the U.S. Department of Justice.

He continues to work in the criminal division--though he had a whopping conflict of interest in the Ryan case--even as the Bush Department of Justice fires other prosecutors who actually hunt down political corruption.

"I'm aware of the allegations [against McNally]," Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales told me when he appeared before the Tribune's editorial board a while ago.

"They're very serious allegations," Gonzales said. "And the matter is being reviewed internally. I can say that."

That was six months ago, on Aug. 14, 2006.

Recently, seven U.S. attorneys of other districts were forced to resign, even though most received positive Justice Department job evaluations prior to their dismissals. Included among those let go are Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted the phenomenally corrupt and vulgar Republican U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

So they're gone. And Republican McNally is still very much employed.

Last year, McNally was the acting United States attorney for the Southern District of Illinois when he testified as a sympathetic defense witness for Ryan. Jurors were told that McNally left private practice to become a federal prosecutor after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Prior to becoming a federal prosecutor, McNally was a lawyer and partner with the firm Altheimer & Gray. That firm later went bankrupt, costing partners hundreds of thousands of dollars apiece.

I've always wondered just how Ryan's former lawyer got himself named acting U.S. attorney in time to rip into the prosecution's case. Perhaps it was merely a coincidence. Or perhaps it involves Illinois Combine magic.

Unfortunately, or fortunately, McNally forgot to mention something. As a partner in Altheimer & Gray, he owed money to the firm's creditors. The law firm that handled the bankruptcy was Winston & Strawn.

That's the same Winston & Strawn that was run by former Gov. Jim Thompson, the same firm that handled George Ryan's free legal defense, which is estimated to have been worth about $20 million.

Altheimer & Gray partners who did not pay up in the bankruptcy deal risked being sued by Winston & Strawn. Five former Altheimer partners did not participate in the bankruptcy plan by the firm. Four of these were sued by Winston & Strawn. Only one partner wasn't sued: Ed McNally.

When the conflict was revealed, federal prosecutors got angry and Winston & Strawn defense attorneys howled that they knew nothing about it. All the lawyers took great umbrage, as lawyers often do.

The whole thing was allowed to slide, almost like snails off a rock in the garden at midnight, leaving a slimy trail, the kind that nobody wants to follow, except this was bigger, with pink rhinoceros droppings steaming on the ground.

In the seven months since Gonzales said the allegations against McNally were serious, consider:

Chicago U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald--no friend of the bi-partisan political combine of insiders who run things in this state--got stuck spending his time on the Scooter Libby-CIA leak case in Washington, rather than spending it hunting Republican and Democratic public corruption in Illinois.

Sun-Times columnist Mark Brown revealed in a fine column that Rodger Heaton, the new U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, had dinner in Springfield with two of the combine's cleanup hitters: Republicans Big Bill Cellini and Big Bob Kjellander, who haven't been indicted but are listed as Individual A and Individual K in the state pension fund scandal case.

That's just what a pink rhinoceros would do--publicly feed with Cellini and Kjellander, tell a few jokes and everybody in town gets the message.

Such creatures might be rare in other states, but in Illinois, we've got a surplus of rare wild things, of political weasels and pink rhinoceroses.

And for all the bleating and wailing you'll hear and read by Ryan mouthpieces about justice and fairness, remember the one they won't mention, the pink rhinoceros named Ed McNally.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Court Reverses Conviction Of Ex-Trading Specialist (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 22, 2007

In a blow to the office of Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia, a federal judge has taken the rare step of reversing a jury verdict convicting a former New York Stock Exchange trading specialist of securities fraud in a scheme known as "interpositioning."

Southern District Judge Denny Chin, in United States v. Finnerty, 05 cr. 393, agreed Wednesday to enter a judgment of acquittal, setting aside the Oct. 26, 2006, verdict.

Chin held that while federal prosecutors proved that defendant David Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, they failed to prove fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of the securities laws.

"I hold that the government did not ... establish that Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived," he said in a 37-page opinion.

In describing interpositioning, the judge said that instead of matching pending buy and sell orders, the specialists repeatedly trade for their company's proprietary account, making a profit from the slight differences in pricing.

Southern District prosecutors have had a difficult time proving criminal charges against Finnerty and 14 other floor specialist traders whom they accused of using their inside positions to earn an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their companies.

Before Wednesday's ruling, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District had already dropped charges against seven of the defendants. Besides Finnerty, two former traders (Michael Stern and Michael Hayward of Van der Moolen Specialists USA) were convicted, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large. (NYLJ, Aug. 10, 2006)

"The government [in these cases] provided no real evidence that customers were deceived," said Jacob Zamansky, a plaintiffs attorney at Zamansky & Associates who specializes in securities litigation but did not represent any of the defendants in the interpositioning cases. "This almost looks like a victimless crime."

Finnerty was employed by Fleet Specialist beginning around 1996. From September 2000 until April 2003, he brought together buyers and sellers of General Electric stock, among others.

"Indeed, Finnerty was so successful ... that he would, on occasion, be interviewed by CNBC about the market, and was featured in newspaper articles about the NYSE," Judge Chin said in his decision.

That career came to a screeching halt in 2005, when Finnerty, 40, was indicted on charges that he engaged in a scheme that involved positioning his company between buyers and sellers in order to make money for Fleet Specialist, which in turn increased his bonuses.

The government said Finnerty's actions resulted in his cheating investors of $4.5 million, but attorneys for Finnerty said the government failed to demonstrate this harm.

"They ... provided no evidence that [Finnerty's actions] resulted in the loss of one penny to public customers," Frederick P. Hafetz, a partner at New York's Hafetz & Necheles who represented Finnerty, said during closing arguments in the case in October. (NYLJ, Oct. 26, 2006)

In his decision Wednesday, Judge Chin said prosecutors adequately demonstrated that Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, but failed to prove that customers expected one thing and got something different as a result of his actions.

"Without evidence of what the customers expected, no rational juror could conclude that the ... trades had a tendency to deceive or the power to mislead," Chin said. "A juror would only be able to reach that conclusion by speculating -- impermissibly -- as to what customers expected."

The judge said that if the judgment of acquittal is later vacated or reversed on appeal by the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, a new trial would be granted.

He took prosecutors to task for their repeated reference during the trial to 26,300 instances of interpositioning. He said this number was "unduly prejudicial" and "clearly and significantly overstated."

"I am confident that the Government did not inflate the numbers intentionally, but it appears that the Government failed to account for numerous circumstances when Finnerty was not executing the trades himself -- he was not on the floor or he was at his post or he was negotiating with the crowd or otherwise engaged in non-trading activity," Chin said.

Hafetz said Wednesday that these "inflated numbers" prevented his client from receiving a fair trial.

He added that Chin's decision "is a vindication" of Finnerty.

Finnerty was fired by Fleet Specialist, now Banc of America Specialist, in 2003. The company itself has never admitted any wrongdoing. However, its former president and chief supervisory specialist was fined $125,000 by the stock exchange.

In addition to Hafetz, Finnerty was represented by Tracy E. Sivitz, an associate at the firm.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Lauren Goldberg and Anirudh Bansal prosecuted the case. A spokesperson for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

JUDGE: FEDS FAILED (NYPOST)

By Roddy Boyd

The New York Post, February 22, 2007

A federal judge yesterday took the very rare step of throwing out a jury's conviction of former New York Stock Exchange specialist David Finnerty, citing a lack of evidence to support a guilty finding.

In granting Finnerty's motion to set aside the verdict, Judge Denny Chin wrote that federal prosecutors failed to establish that "Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived."

The ruling is a stinging rebuke for prosecutors, who have had little success in winning convictions in their high-profile and wide-ranging campaign against corrupt trading practices at the Big Board.

The April 2005 indictments filed against 15 specialists shook up Wall Street.

However, the pursuant collapse of many of the cases that prosecutors filed has stunned the legal world.

The Southern District's prosecutors, who generally achieve conviction rates of between 80 and 90 percent, managed to win just two partial convictions and two plea deals.

The partial convictions - of two partners at Van Der Moolen Specialists USA - are currently on appeal.

Seven specialists saw charges against them dropped and two were acquitted. Another defendant remains at large.

In October, Finnerty, who had worked for Fleet Specialists, was convicted of fraud for abusing his market-making position to profit at customer expense. He was facing 20 years in prison.

Though it is rare for a judge to set aside a conviction, Chin had expressed his concern about the verdict in October.

Chin framed his problems with the jury's verdict in a series of open-ended questions in his opinion.

"Did customers even know that a specialist could trade for his proprietary account?" Chin wrote.

"Did customers assume that the specialist was providing services without charge?"

Coming back to prosecutors' allegations that Finnerty illegally inter-positioned about 26,300 trades, Chin said, "This number is clearly and significantly overstated."

A spokeswoman for the Southern District of New York said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

U.S. Judge Voids Guilty Verdict Of Big Board Specialist In G.E. (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

A judge took the unusual step yesterday of reversing a jury verdict, finding that the evidence did not support the conviction of a former New York Stock Exchange supervisor who once oversaw trading in General Electric stock.

The supervisor, David A. Finnerty, had been convicted of securities fraud in October by a jury in United States District Court in Manhattan.

Judge Denny Chin said he was reversing the verdict and ordering an acquittal because prosecutors had failed to prove that Mr. Finnerty engaged in fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of securities laws.

The ruling was the latest blow to the pursuit of federal criminal charges against 15 New York Stock Exchange floor supervisors accused of using their positions to make an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their firms.

Prosecutors had already dropped charges against seven defendants. Two others were convicted in addition to Mr. Finnerty, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large.

Judge Chin said that if his order of acquittal were later reversed by an appeals court, he would grant a request for a new trial.

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, Yusill Scribner, had no comment on the reversal.

Prosecutors said the specialists had violated rules requiring them to match buyers and sellers at the best possible prices, and were not permitted to buy or sell a stock with their own firm's money unless only one party was seeking the transaction.

Specialists run the open-outcry auctions on the floor of the exchange, matching buy and sell orders for the stocks they oversee. They also use their firms' money to buy shares when no one else wants to buy, as well as sell shares from their own inventory when no one wants to sell.

Mr. Finnerty worked for Fleet Specialists, overseeing all trading in the stock of G.E. from 2000 to 2003 before he was charged with three counts of securities fraud. He faced more than 20 years in prison for the conviction.

U.S. Won't Seek To Restore Fraud Conviction Of Ex-Westar Officials (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 22, 2007

The government will not try to reinstate the fraud convictions of two former Westar Energy executives, prosecutors said yesterday.

The United States attorney's office in Topeka, Kan., said it would not ask an appeals court in Denver to reconsider its decision in January to reverse the convictions of the executives, David C. Wittig and Douglas T. Lake. The appeals court said that evidence at the trial did not justify the guilty verdicts.

Mr. Wittig, the former chief executive, and Mr. Lake, a former vice president, were accused of looting Westar, a public utility based in Topeka. They were convicted in 2005 of money laundering and wire fraud.

"We had until Feb. 20 to notify the 10th Circuit whether we wanted to ask for a rehearing," a government spokesman, Jim Cross, said, referring to the federal appeals court in Denver. "We have allowed that deadline to pass."

The court said prosecutors could not retry the wire fraud and money laundering counts, but could retry some lesser claims. Mr. Cross said that prosecutors had not decided on a retrial.

The remaining charges "have to do with personal use of a corporate plane," said Mr. Wittig's lawyer, Steven Alan Reiss, of Weil, Gotshal & Manges in New York.

"Right now, we're hopeful the government will reach the right decision and decide that twice was enough and not proceed any further," Mr. Reiss said. The first trial on the charges ended in a hung jury in 2004.

Mr. Lake's lawyer, Seth Waxman, did not immediately return a call for comment.

The executives did not tell shareholders that they would have been the main beneficiaries of a plan to spin off Westar's utility business and pursue a merger with Public Service Company of New Mexico, prosecutors said. Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake would have shared as much as $90 million, prosecutors said at the trial.

Software Firm To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Veritas Software agreed to pay $30 million to resolve civil fraud charges connected to an improper advertising deal it signed with AOL during the Internet boom's waning days.

A Securities and Exchange Commission complaint accused Veritas and AOL of Dulles of simultaneously wiring payments to each other as part of an improper, unwritten "round-trip" agreement. Both companies used the deal to inflate revenue, the complaint said. For Veritas, the transaction added 2 cents per share to its fourth-quarter and annual earnings in 2000, allowing it to beat Wall Street expectations.

Court papers filed in the District late Tuesday also accused Veritas of engaging in a series of accounting maneuvers to smooth its financial results into "museum quality" reports from 2000 through 2002. Among other things, the company used "wish lists" prepared by employees in its finance and operations unit to build cushions of expenses to make its earnings appear steadier.

Veritas, which was acquired nearly two years ago by Symantec and is a wholly owned subsidiary, neither admitted nor denied the allegations. It has restated its financials twice: once to reverse $20 million it had booked as part of the AOL deal and again to correct problems with its profit-smoothing practices.

In a statement, a spokeswoman for Symantec said the company had set aside the settlement funds in reserve. The spokeswoman also pointed out that Symantec, one of the nation's largest providers of data security software, is not named in the complaint.

The case is a leftover from an era when technology companies struggled to meet the expectations of analysts and investors. AOL, which was then known as America Online and has since been absorbed by Time Warner, paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges about its financial dealings.

Action on Veritas stalled for nearly two years, however, in part because the five-member SEC, which must approve recommendations from agency enforcement staff, had been stuck over how to proceed in the case.

Ultimately, SEC commissioners agreed to approve the settlement after intense deliberations. In a news release, the agency took pains to note that the $30 million penalty had been negotiated before the SEC issued a policy directive last year concerning when regulators may impose fines on companies.

That directive is designed to take into account such factors as whether shareholders benefited from fraudulent accounting in determining if companies must shell out money to pay regulatory fines. Panel members including Republican Commissioner Paul S. Atkins have expressed concern that investors should not be penalized twice.

Securities officials said they continue to probe problems at Veritas.

"The fraud was planned and implemented at the highest levels of the company," SEC associate enforcement director Scott W. Friestad said in an interview. "Former management lied to the auditors and misled investors by withholding material information about the company's financial results. As our investigation continues, we will be turning our attention to those responsible for the misconduct."

EDITORIAL: Fannie's Pay (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

At a truly private company, withholding more than $40 million in bonuses tied to fraudulent earnings would be a no-brainer. But Fannie Mae is neither a normal business nor exactly private, even if its shares are in private hands. So this week's announcement that current and former top executives at the mortgage giant wouldn't be receiving $44.4 million in Fannie Mae shares has to count as progress.

Daniel Mudd, the current CEO, will lose $4.1 million, while Franklin Raines, the former CEO ousted over the $6 billion accounting scandal, will have to forgo $11.4 million. This comes on top of the news last year that Ofheo, Fannie Mae's federal regulator, would seek to claw back about $100 million in performance bonuses that had already been paid out. That case is pending.

The optimistic view of yesterday's news is that Fannie, chastened by the accounting fraud and a newly invigorated regulator under Ofheo Director James Lockhart is beginning to act more like an ordinary company and less like the local bully in Washington.

On the other hand, Fannie's friends got more powerful with the Democratic takeover of Congress. The Bush Administration has been trying to negotiate a compromise with Barney Frank & Co. to reform oversight of Fannie and its sibling Freddie Mac, but it remains to be seen how much power a new regulator will have in any bill that could pass a Democratic Congress.

Amazingly, nobody involved in the fraud has faced criminal charges, a fact that would have the press and the corporate scolds in Congress up in arms if a $6 billion fraud had been perpetrated at any company other than Fannie or Fred. Still, not paying real bonuses tied to fake earnings is better than nothing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Fate Now Rests In The Hands Of The Jury (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

A federal jury ended its first day of deliberations yesterday in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby after the presiding judge urged jurors to rely on their "life experiences" in deciding whether the vice president's former chief of staff lied to investigators -- or made an honest mistake -- about his role in a CIA leak.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton's instructions to the jury of eight women and four men reinforced the issue of the fallibility of human memory that has been central to one of Washington's most celebrated trials in years.

Prosecutors allege that Libby, then Vice President Cheney's top aide, lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury to obscure the fact that, in the spring and summer of 2003, he aggressively sought out and shared with reporters information about Valerie Plame, an undercover CIA officer. Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was emerging then as a harsh, early critic of President Bush and the Iraq war.

The only person accused in the three-year CIA leak investigation, Libby, 56, is charged with five felonies: two counts of making false statements to FBI agents, two counts of perjury and one count of obstructing justice. He is not charged with the leak itself. If convicted of all charges, he would face a potential prison term of 1 1/2 to three years under federal sentencing guidelines, prosecutors outside the case have said.

Libby's attorneys contend that Libby did not intentionally lie, but inaccurately remembered his conversations about Wilson and Plame with administration colleagues and Washington journalists.

The trial has delved deeply into a volatile period inside the White House shortly after the war began, when the administration was vulnerable to political attack because no proof had turned up of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction that Bush had cited to justify the war.

Evidence and 14 days of testimony have shown that Cheney, Libby and other top administration officials sought to discredit Wilson, who was sent by the CIA to Africa in 2002 and concluded that there was no basis for reports that Iraq had tried to buy nuclear materials there. Prosecutors have asserted that Libby told reporters and a White House press secretary about Plame as part of the campaign to tarnish her husband by suggesting that the CIA chose him for the mission because of nepotism.

Before the jurors began deliberations late yesterday morning, Walton provided them guidelines for sifting through the prosecution and defense's contradictory depictions of Libby's memory and the memories of other witnesses.

The judge instructed them to use their "common-sense experience" to assess such factors as how long people can be expected to retain clear memories, the nature of the person or event they were asked to recall, the circumstances that existed at the time and their impressions of the "memory capacity" of the people whose memories were questioned.

"Making an honest statement that turns out to be inaccurate or wrong . . . does not rise to the level of criminal conduct," Walton said. On the other hand, the judge emphasized that the jury should consider inconsistencies the prosecution cited in Libby's account of events.

The jurors have been largely attentive during weeks of complex testimony. Many have taken notes and, under a practice that Walton allows, some have questioned virtually all 19 witnesses at the end of each one's testimony.

At the outset of the trial, potential jurors were screened during lengthy questioning by both sides. Defense attorneys filtered out District residents who said they have negative opinions of the Bush administration or the war. The result is a jury that is relatively apolitical. Many of the jurors are highly educated.

Although most District residents are African American, the jury includes six white women, four white men and two black women.

Under rules Walton set yesterday, the jury will deliberate every weekday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Jury Has CIA Leak Case To Decide Former Cheney Aide's Fate On Perjury, Obstruction Charges (AP)

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Jurors reached no verdict in their first 4 1/2 hours of deliberation on whether Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief aide obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic.

The eight women and four men on the jury heard 14 days of testimony about I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a day of closing arguments and more than an hour of instructions Wednesday from U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton before beginning their discussions. After 4 1/2 hours of deliberation, the jurors went home until Thursday.

The jurors include a former Washington Post reporter, an economist, a retired math teacher, a former museum curator, a law firm accountant, a Web architect and several retired or current federal workers. There are 10 whites and two blacks, unusual in a city where blacks outnumber whites more than 2-to-1.

Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff and national security adviser, faces five felony counts that carry a combined top penalty of 30 years in prison. If convicted, Libby probably would be sentenced to far less under federal guidelines.

The trial provided behind-the-scenes details of the interaction between top reporters and government officials and of Cheney's efforts to rebut criticism of him and the administration.

The investigation began with the public identification of CIA operative Valerie Plame on July 14, 2003, eight days after her husband, ex-Ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly accused the Bush administration of distorting intelligence to push the nation into war with Iraq.

Months later, Libby told the FBI and a grand jury that he first learned that Plame worked for the CIA from Cheney on June 11. But he said that amid the press of war issues and other national security concerns, he forgot that and was surprised to learn it from NBC television newsman Tim Russert on July 10 or 11. Thereafter, he said he told reporters he had heard the information only from journalists and could not confirm it.

Russert testified he and Libby never discussed Plame. Judith Miller, who had been a reporter with The New York Times, testified Libby told her about Plame's CIA job before the Russert conversation. Matt Cooper, then of Time magazine, testified Libby confirmed her employment for him. Six government officials testified they either told Libby about Plame's job or discussed it with him between June 11 and July 10 or 11.

Walton explained to the jurors that they must weigh the truth of several statements by Libby in the various counts.

On the obstruction count, Walton said they could find Libby guilty should they unanimously decide any one, or more, of three Libby statements were lies: that Russert asked Libby if Plame worked at CIA and said all the reporters knew it; that Libby was surprised to learn the Plame information from Russert; or that Libby told Cooper he had heard it from reporters but did not know it was true.

On one count of lying to the FBI, jurors could find Libby guilty if they found either or both of his statements about the Russert call were lies, Walton explained. The other count of lying to the FBI hinges on Libby's statement about the Cooper call.

On two counts of perjury, jurors would have to weigh various Libby statements to the grand jury about how he learned about Plame's job and whom he told, including four separate statements in one count, Walton said.

Prosecutors argued that Libby concocted lies to make his discussions of Plame with reporters appear to be innocent gossip so that he would not risk losing his job for giving them classified information without authorization.

The defense argued that Libby had an innocent lapse of memory, and his lawyer attempted to show that government witnesses also had memory flaws.

Libby Perjury Hearing Casts Cloud Over Cheney (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

As a Washington jury starts its deliberations on Thursday on whether Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former chief of staff of Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, is guilty of perjury and obstruction of justice, he is not the only one whose reputation has come under suspicion.

"There is a cloud over the vice-president," Patrick Fitz-gerald, special prosecutor, told the jury on Tuesday. "He sent Libby off to the meeting with Judy [Judith Miller, a New York Times reporter] where Plame was discussed. That cloud is something that we just can't pretend isn't there."

Despite this encroaching shadow over the vice-president, the hearings have failed to ignite as the political show-trial over Iraq that many anti-war critics had hoped for. Indeed, the complexity and frequent triviality of the trial has put off all but the most seasoned Beltway observers.

If the defence fails, Mr Libby faces up to 30 years in prison and the ignominy of becoming the highest serving Bush administration official to face jail. But unlike Mr Cheney and the president's chief political adviser, Karl Rove, who have also been named in connection with the case, he is not a well-known figure, and any public relations damage will be limited.

The case goes back to a New York Times article from July 6 2003 by Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador. The piece, "What I didn't find in Africa", described how he found no evidence in Niger that Iraq was seeking uranium for weapons of mass destruction. The Niger claim was a critical part of the case for war in President George W. Bush's State of the Union speech in 2003 and the White House and the vice-president's office, furious at Mr Wilson's article, determined to rebut the man who had challenged their credibility.

Mr Cheney's scribbled question on a copy of the New York Times article was the most controversial part of the rebuttal. "Did his wife send him on a junket?" Mr Cheney had written. Mr Wilson's wife was Valerie Plame, a CIA agent, and, in rebutting the New York Times article, administration officials – including Mr Rove, the former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer and Mr Libby – mentioned her to reporters.

When Ms Plame's identity made it into print on July 14 2003 the publication was seen as having breached a law banning the naming of covert US agents.

No official was charged with the underlying leak, but Mr Libby's current perjury charges stem from testimony he made before a grand jury and the FBI during the investigation. As a result, instead of being about the leak, the trial has been about the alleged cover-up and has descended into titillating revelations about the Washington media.

Those attending discovered how Ms Miller kept some notes in a plastic bag under her desk and how an adviser to Mr Cheney sought to exploit the dislike that Tim Russert, host of NBC's Meet the Press, felt for a rival talk-show host. The jury enjoyed a voyeuristic masterclass in how Bob Woodward, the veteran investigative journalist, entices his sources to open up, hearing Mr Woodward's taped interview with former deputy secretary of state Richard Armitage, who then told him about Ms Plame.

The defence's argument has been that Mr Libby was made a scapegoat by the White House to protect Mr Rove from prosecution. They have argued he merely forgot how he found out about Ms Plame, amid the pressure of national security matters, turning the trial into a "he said, she said" case. On Tuesday his counsel melodramatically shed tears at the close of final statements and turned away to dab them as he returned to Mr Libby's side.

Even if Mr Libby is convicted, questions will remain about Mr Cheney's role in directing his aide to rebut Mr Wilson, and his intervention to force Mr Fleischer to make a public statement exonerating Mr Libby.

But an acquittal would also carry risks for Mr Fitz-gerald. It could lead to criticism that he prosecuted what turned out to be a trivial case. It could also underline that he failed to prosecute anyone for the initial crime he was appointed to investigate: who it was who leaked the name of Ms Plame.

Jury In Libby Case Begins Deliberations (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — The jury deciding the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. began deliberating late Wednesday morning.

The jury, eight women and four men, heard nearly a month of evidence and testimony, capped Wednesday with an hourlong set of instructions from Judge Reggie B. Walton.

The jurors will resume work Thursday morning.

Mr. Libby faces five felony counts on charges that he lied to a grand jury and to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who were investigating the leak in 2003 of the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative, Valerie Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed publicly in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert Novak just days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, criticizing the Bush administration.

After complaints that Bush loyalists had leaked Ms. Wilson's name to punish her husband for his criticism, a special prosecutor was named to investigate how her identity had been disclosed.

The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, did not charge anybody with illegally disclosing Ms. Wilson's name, but he brought a case of perjury, obstruction of justice and false statements against Mr. Libby, who was chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney and had been assigned to counter Mr. Wilson's assertions.

Jurors Begin Deliberations In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the Lewis "Scooter" Libby trial began deliberations today in a case that could bring the former vice presidential aide up to 30 years in prison if convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Federal Judge Reggie Walton delivered about an hour of legal instructions to the jury today after they heard more than six hours of closing arguments Tuesday.

The summations were starkly different, as the defense sought to portray Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, as forgetful while the prosecutors called him a liar.

"Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration," a tearful Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, told jurors in his closing arguments.

If during deliberations a juror says, "'He's a Republican, he works for Cheney, let's do him,'" that juror must be discouraged, Wells said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued that the Bush administration's attempts to discredit an Iraq war critic, and Libby's role in it, are at the heart of the case against him. "There's a cloud over the White House as to what happened here," Fitzgerald said. "Don't you think the American people deserve to know?"

Libby, 56, is charged with lying when he told investigators and later grand jurors in 2003 and 2004 how he learned that Valerie Plame, wife of administration critic Joseph Wilson, worked at the CIA. Libby said he learned the information from Cheney, forgot, then heard it a month later from NBC newsman Tim Russert.

Russert testified in Libby's trial and to the grand jury that he didn't tell Libby about Plame.

Libby also faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice based on a conversation about Plame with Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine Washington correspondent.

Only the shaky memories of two reporters with credibility problems held together the case against Libby, Wells said.

"It's what I mean by 'he said, she said,' " Wells said. "They want you to make a choice beyond a reasonable doubt that (would leave) my client's life destroyed."

Fitzgerald countered that Libby concocted the Russert story and lied about his conversation with Cooper to sidetrack an investigation into who leaked Plame's identity to reporters.

In February 2002, the CIA sent Wilson, a former ambassador, to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

No one was indicted for leaking information about Wilson's wife despite an investigation that lasted over two years.

Libby, Fitzgerald said, feared being fired or prosecuted for leaking confidential information. By sourcing the story back to reporters, he said, Libby believed his role would remain secret.

"He made a gamble that he's going to tell them a story about the rumors and hope it goes away," Fitzgerald said. "He threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

The prosecution used a large interactive screen to rebut Libby's version of events. Peter Zeidenberg, a Fitzgerald assistant, posted in succession the names of eight people who spoke with Libby about Plame between June 11, 2003, and about July 10, when Libby said Russert told him about Plame.

"Ladies and gentlemen, that's not forgetting," Zeidenberg said. "That's lying."

Wells directed jurors away from those witnesses, whom he called "background evidence." Jurors must focus, he said, on the Russert and Cooper conversations at the core of the charges.

"This is just about different recollections of conversations with different reporters," Wells said.

It's "crazy," Wells said, to believe Libby invented that Russert told him about Plame. Libby, he said, didn't know Russert and believed investigators would likely call the newsman to verify the account. Russert's network, NBC, was hostile to the White House, Wells argued.

Politics Meets Intelligence At Trial (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As jurors began deliberating the fate of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, one outcome of his perjury trial seemed clear: The case has added fuel to calls for a broader examination of how intelligence was used in political arguments in the past six years.

Moreover, some current and former administration officials say, the trial's airing of the use of intelligence -- especially over the Iraq war -- threatens to further undermine confidence in American claims on other sensitive matters. That could be a particular problem in the U.S. campaign to convince the world to curb Iran's nuclear program.

The Libby trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress. Senate and House Democrats are pursuing new inquiries after a recent Defense Department Inspector General's report criticized the pre-war Pentagon intelligence program run by former Defense Undersecretary Douglas J. Feith.

Already, the Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. Yesterday, a jury of eight women and four men began weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

In any case, the trial has provided congressional intelligence officials with extensive information on how the vice president's office functioned semi-autonomously in pushing foreign-policy initiatives. These officials said the information could prove helpful in continuing investigations into how public statements made by the president and vice president differed from the underlying intelligence provided by the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

Richard Ben-Veniste, former Democratic counsel to the Senate Whitewater Committee and head of the Watergate special prosecutor's office, says the trial has served "to reveal the inner workings of the vice president's office, and particularly the willingness to declassify information to assist in the damage control effort that appeared to be entirely political in nature."

Meanwhile, the Pentagon report said that as Mr. Feith assembled his intelligence reports -- highlighting, in particular, alleged links between Iraq and al Qaeda terrorists -- his office briefed four key officials, Mr. Libby among them. The report said the Pentagon office presented its findings to the White House as a conclusive intelligence assessment, though the CIA strongly opposed those findings.

Mr. Feith has complained bitterly that the report, and the congressional response to it, distorts what was a legitimate effort to raise questions about intelligence conclusions, not to distort them.

The latest controversies come as the administration faces challenges from foreign governments and U.S. lawmakers skeptical of its recent claims that Tehran is supplying Shiite militias in Iraq with munitions and arms. Critics accuse the White House of mimicking the tactics used in building the case for war against Iraq in 2002 and 2003.

Administration officials voice exasperation over the response, saying U.S. intelligence agencies have developed extensive evidence of Iran's involvement in Iraq. They also say that changes in the intelligence community since the Iraq war have significantly improved U.S. intelligence.

"It's frustrating for the entire process," says one intelligence official working on Iran. "The whole message is being challenged."

Scooter Libby And Reputation (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135046

"There used to be a time when big cases were investigated a different way in this country. Maybe something's gone horribly wrong."

-- Federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, 2006

The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is the closest version of a Red Queen trial this country has had in a long time. One says that knowing it might start a stampede from past defendants laying claim to the most upside-down prosecution.

Lewis G. Carroll's account of the Knave' s trial before the Red Queen and White Rabbit is famous for the Queen's dictum, "Sentence first, verdict afterward." But read the full transcript of the mock trial and one will see that the real subject is not justice, but the humiliation of the defendant.

The trial of Scooter Libby in Washington, the national capital of illogic, has been exemplary. In December 2003, the prosecutor purports a crime has been committed by revealing a "covert" CIA agent's identity to the press -- despite knowing then what the outside world learned nearly three years later -- that the revealer of the agent was a State Department official, Richard Armitage. With the "whodunnit" solved on day one, the prosecution follows the Red Queen's script by taking the nation on a useless, joyless ride through the opaque looking-glass of Washington journalism.

The testimony of three of the world's most sophisticated journalists -- Judith Miller, Matthew Cooper and Tim Russert -- was the trial's closest thing to the White Rabbit reading nonsense verse to the jury: "For this must ever be a secret, kept from all the rest, between yourself and me."

The Libby case went to the jury yesterday. After the verdict, all the characters in this satire on Beltway mores will go back to doing what they did before, except for one -- Scooter Libby.

If found guilty, Mr. Libby goes to prison. He is ruined. If acquitted, he loses only that which he built daily the past 35 years of private and public life -- his reputation. This, too, is ruin.

Purified justice notwithstanding, something here has gone "horribly wrong."

As is increasingly true of politics, American justice today has come to look more like mortal combat, the videogame. Notions of proportionality have eroded. Crimes that are minor crimes, civil offenses or mere hardball politics like the Plame case must be elevated to a capital offense. Eliot Spitzer's pursuit of AIG founder Hank Greenberg rose to a bonfire of never-proven criminal charges that put the torch to the company and Mr. Greenberg before burning down to its current ash of alleged civil offenses against him.

Under the constant stare of the media Cyclops, prosecutors can't back down and justice in 21st-century America degrades to swamp justice. Exhibit A: the Duke lacrosse-team prosecution. Judge Lewis Kaplan, in the federal government's recent KPMG prosecution, sat in appalled disbelief as federal prosecutors attempted to reduce 18 defendants to rubble.

It was ever thus that big cases produce drama that's hard to resist. Not least is the spectacle of a once-in-a-lifetime defendant, a Scooter Libby, virtually bankrupting himself to avoid guilt. Labor Secretary Ray Donovan's 1987 remark on acquittal will explain why unto eternity: "Which office do I go to to get my reputation back?"

No dramas will be written, though, about the aftermath for such a defendant. But maybe one should. Consider the case of Salim Lewis.

Thirty years ago on Wall Street, Salim "Sandy" Lewis was a household name. His father Salim co-built Bear Stearns, and he in turn made his reputation in the high-stakes corporate-merger cycle of the 1980s. He worked without legal or disciplinary taint until he was 49. In 1986 a federal prosecutor named Rudolph Giuliani indicted him for securities violations.

His accuser was Boyd Jeffries, the criminal acolyte of famed financial criminal Ivan Boesky. The case itself was arcane. Outraged at a short-selling practice legal at the time, Mr. Lewis urged Jeffries to engage in a stock transaction to thwart the short sellers. A subsequent court called what he did "an act of market vigilantism, in which Mr. Lewis in no way personally profited." And indeed the short-selling practice he attacked was later outlawed. Still, his own act was illegal.

Rudy Giuliani indicted him on 22 counts. He pleaded guilty to three, facing 15 years. Judge Mary Johnson Lowe reduced it to three years probation, an act of now-antique proportionality. The SEC got an injunction banning Mr. Lewis for life from the securities business; this was the core of a reputation the court record had shown steeped in good works. He sought to restore it.

In 2001, he received a pardon from President Clinton (later called "a bona fide pardon on the merits" by a federal judge). The SEC bar order remained. He again sought relief in court, and this past summer Judge William Conner of the Southern District (aka Wall Street) lifted the lifetime bar, saying "we cannot ignore the inequity inherent in the injunction." It took only 20 years.

Nor does innocence guard reputation. Back then prosecutor Giuliani flamboyantly arrested Richard Wigton (30 blameless years with Kidder, Peabody) and a youthful arbitrager named Timothy Tabor. They were handcuffed. Two years later, the charges against both were dropped. No matter. Both had been led through the media bonfire. They were ruined.

Some of this reputational destruction can be explained as random events -- having the bad luck to draw a politically ambitious prosecutor (Messrs. Giuliani and Spitzer) or the fanaticism inherent to special prosecutors. But something more harsh and bitter is in the water now.

Incredibly, Scooter Libby and Ray Donovan had the same lawyer, Ted Wells. So did Sandy Lewis then and KPMG today, Stanley Arkin. Mr. Arkin thinks it's worse now.

"We use the word 'criminal' very promiscuously" today, he told me. Legal standards and ethics require a neutral review up to the decision to indict, but too often, Mr. Arkin says, "You do not have neutral review. We get a poor quality of magisterial review in this country."

It is a travesty that the Valerie Plame bump-and-run case brought Lewis Libby to the edge of this cliff. Primary blame belongs to the Bush Justice Department's abdication of responsibility. So now a former Manhattan prosecutor is running for president. Electoral vagaries willing, one can think of no one better qualified to restore the meaning of "criminal" to its proper intent.

Guard Sentenced In Prison Sex Scandal (AP)

A former federal prison guard was sentenced Wednesday to a year of home detention and three years probation for his role in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a deadly gun battle last summer.

E. Lavon Spence, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud in October, was sentenced by Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle in federal court.

Prison time "would affect the recovery" of Spence from his November stroke at the age of 40, Hinkle said.

A Justice Department special agent was killed and a prison officer was wounded in June when they came to arrest the six guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. One of the guards, Ralph Hill, was also killed in the gunfight Hill started.

Three of the guards have already been sentenced to a year in prison, with two also receiving three years of probation after their release. A fourth guard was sentenced to a year of probation.

A telephone message left at the office of Spence's attorney was not immediately returned.

Former DOD Civilian Guilty Of Taking Bribe (S&S)

By Charlie Coon, Stars and Stripes

Stars and Stripes, February 22, 2007

A former employee of U.S. Special Operations Command Europe in Stuttgart, Germany, pleaded guilty on Friday to accepting bribes in return for steering work to a Romania- and Iraq-based contractor.

Steven Merkes, who worked as a logistical planner, faces up to two years in prison and $250,000 in fines for performing acts for Philip Bloom in return for $24,000 in cash and future employment, according to a Justice Department news release.

Sentencing for Merkes is scheduled for June 1.

Bloom, one of the ringleaders in a wide-ranging scheme to defraud the former Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq, was sentenced Friday to 46 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for committing bribery and money-laundering and conspiring to defraud.

Both cases were tried in U.S. District Court in Washington.

According to the Justice Department, Merkes worked at the special operations command, or SOCEUR, as an airman until January 2005, and afterward as a Defense Department civilian employee.

DOJ_NMG_0135048

In both positions, Merkes' official duties consisted of planning military exercises for special operations forces in the European theater, according to the Justice Department.

The U.S. European Command, which is headquartered in Stuttgart and oversees SOCEUR, had little to say about Merkes' conviction.

"Mr. Merkes worked here, but he left in early 2006," according to a statement by the U.S. European Command public affairs office. "We know of no illegal activity while he was here.

"We have no knowledge of the allegations or the investigation being conducted by Department of Justice."

Bloom, 67, of Bucharest, Romania, was at the center of a scandal that resulted in the arrests of at least four servicemembers and three civilians. One of the civilians, Robert Stein, was sentenced Jan. 29 to nine years in prison for charges including weapons possession.

Stein, a former comptroller with the Coalition Provisional Authority, was convicted of, among other crimes, stealing money from the Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq that was funneled to Bloom for the purchase of assault rifles, silencers and grenade launchers, for personal use in the United States, according to the Justice Department.

Bloom has cooperated with the investigation.

Others charged in the case include Col. Curtis Whiteford, Lt. Cols. Debra Harrison, Michael Wheeler and Bruce D. Hopfengardner, and civilians Michael Morris and William Driver.

Lessons Lurking In Fumo's '80 Case? (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 22, 2007

The case was federal, and one of the defendants was State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo. But the year was 1980, and that was another era in Philadelphia politics and in FBI corruption probes.

Fumo was 37 and serving his first term in Harrisburg as the successor to another local political legend - State Sen. Henry "Buddy" Cianfrani, who had been sent to federal prison.

Though the 1980 case is more than a quarter-century old, it shows that Fumo, the powerful Philadelphia Democrat charged Feb. 6 in a blistering federal indictment, has been down this road before - and won.

Though a jury found Fumo guilty, along with former city Democratic Party chief Peter J. Camiel and former State Sen. Thomas M. Nolan, a judge overturned the verdict and acquitted all three - a giant victory for political figures who faced possible prison sentences.

Now, just as military strategists study old wars, lawyers who specialize in federal criminal cases say they expect both sides of United States of America v. Fumo to study the pages of the 1980 trial - especially Fumo's testimony.

"It's relevant and important to both prosecution and defense to examine that," said veteran defense lawyer Nicholas J. Nastasi, who represented Camiel in the posttrial litigation of the 1980 case.

The old case offers insight about how Fumo, as a defendant, conducted himself on the witness stand. It lays out how some of the city's top defense lawyers fought at trial, and on appeal. And, lawyers familiar with both cases said, the 1980 charges have some elements in common with the new indictment.

"It's not an entirely different type of alleged crime," said Center City lawyer Jack Meyerson, who prosecuted the 1980 case when he was an assistant U.S. attorney. Like the current case, he said, the earlier one involved allegations of "abuse of the payroll of the state Senate and using public money for political purposes in Philadelphia."

In the new indictment, Fumo, now 63, is accused of using taxpayer and charity money for political and personal purposes, including using Senate funds to hire a private investigator to tail ex-girlfriends and dig up dirt on political rivals. He also is charged with obstructing justice.

In the 1980 case, Fumo, Camiel and Nolan were accused of scheming to put Democratic Party workers in "no-show" jobs on the state payroll even though they did little or no work for the legislature. The charges - of mail fraud - focused on letters from Fumo and Camiel to Nolan requesting jobs for the no-show workers.

Fumo was on the witness stand for a day.

He testified that he knew some workers on the legislature's payroll were working at Democratic City Committee headquarters, or in his ward office - but that he didn't believe this was wrong.

"Am I correct in that every one of them worked every day wherever they were?" asked Fumo's lawyer, Ronald F. Kidd.

"Yes," Fumo answered.

Kidd: "... You didn't think that was a crime?"

Fumo: "No, not at all."

A few days later, the jurors began deliberating - and came back with three convictions.

Visibly shaken, Fumo said he was "crushed" by the verdict. "I feel just utter despair," he told reporters as he left the U.S. Courthouse at Sixth and Market Streets on a rainy October day in 1980.

Fumo later recalled the difficult days that followed. "That was the lowest point in my life," he said in a 1985 Inquirer interview. "It was like going to my own funeral. People were coming around - it was like what I would do when a close friend died - they were coming over paying respects. I didn't want to see anybody for a couple of days."

Months later, U.S. District Judge Clifford Scott Green tossed out the jury verdicts, ruling that prosecutors had failed to prove the three were involved in the specific, single scheme alleged in the indictment.

His decision was upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, a ruling that remains a guide for prosecutors.

Mark B. Sheppard, one of Fumo's current defense lawyers, declined to comment on the 1980 case and would not say if the defense team planned to review it.

Nastasi said the new charges were much broader than the 1980 mail-fraud case - and that could mean a more pressing challenge for the defense this time. "It seems there's a lot more for the defense to do in this case to achieve an acquittal," he said.

And he said there's another important difference.

"The biggest distinction between the cases is that in the Camiel case, there was no charge, nor was there any evidence, to show that any accused person benefited personally in any way," said Nastasi.

Fumo also was successful in another criminal case.

Those charges were filed in March 1973, when Arlen Specter was Philadelphia's district attorney. The man who later rose to become Pennsylvania's senior U.S. senator charged Fumo and several other poll watchers with conspiring to violate election law in the 1972 presidential election.

The allegation was that a judge had illegally allowed the men to interfere with poll watchers loyal to Sen. George S. McGovern - whose presidential bid was so unpopular that Cianfrani loyalists feared it would hurt the state senator's reelection chances.

The charges brought by Specter, a Republican, were dropped in 1974 by his successor, F. Emmett Fitzpatrick Jr., a Democrat.

Center City lawyer William A. DeStefano, who represented some witnesses called before the grand jury in the current Fumo case, said the senator's successful fight against two previous criminal cases could bode well: "He's been through this twice before and came out of them both successfully."

Lawyer Peter F. Vaira, who was U.S. attorney then, said that if the 1980 federal case is any guide, Fumo and his current legal team will fight like tigers.

"They put up a good fight there, and they'll do it here," Vaira said. "There's no question about that."

'Bandido' Software Pirate Arraigned In U.S. On 2 Charges (INFOWEEK)

By Sharon Gaudin, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, February 22, 2007

The purported leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie faces 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine related to charges of copyright infringement.

A man, U.S. authorities describe as the leader of one of the oldest and most renowned Internet software piracy groups, was arraigned in U.S. District Court on Tuesday.

Hew Raymond Griffiths, 44, a British national living in Bateau Bay, Australia, is being charged with one count of conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement. If convicted on both counts, Griffiths faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Griffiths, known by the screen nickname "Bandido," was extradited from Australia in what the Department of Justice says is one of the first ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense. He had been held in Australia for three years while he fought the extradition.

"Griffiths claimed to be beyond the reach of U.S. law, and today, we have proven otherwise," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a written statement. "This extradition represents the Department of Justice's commitment to protect intellectual property rights from those who violate our laws from the other side of the globe."

The indictment, which was returned in March 2003, charges Griffiths with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws as the leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie. The group was known as one of the oldest security-conscious piracy groups on the Internet. DrinkOrDie was founded in Russia in 1993, according to the DOJ, and expanded internationally throughout the '90s.

The group was dismantled by the team effort of the DOJ and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement as part of Operation Buccaneer in December 2001. More than 70 raids reportedly were conducted in the U.S., as well as in the United Kingdom, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Australia. Operation Buccaneer so far has resulted in 30 felony convictions and 10 convictions of foreign nationals overseas, according to the DOJ.

Prior to its dismantling, DrinkOrDie was estimated to have caused the illegal reproduction and distribution of more than $50 million worth of pirated software, movies, games, and music, reports the DOJ in a written release.

"Counterfeiting and piracy of intellectual property are global parasites estimated to rob the legitimate world economy of more than $400 billion annually," said Assistant Secretary Julie Myers, in a written statement.

The government contends that Griffiths was a leader in the underground Internet piracy community, also known as the warez scene. He held leadership roles in several other well-known warez groups, including Razor1911 and RiSC.

Griffiths allegedly oversaw all the illegal operations of DrinkOrDie, which specialized in cracking software and distributing the cracked versions over the Internet, according to the DOJ's statement. Once cracked, these software versions could be copied and used without limitation. The group allegedly used encryption and an array of other sophisticated technological security measures to hide their activities from law enforcement.

Software piracy has become a huge expense for many U.S. businesses. Copyright protection actually has become a boom business. The International Intellectual Property Alliance reported in January that industries that depend on copyright protection laws for their economic survival accounted for $819 billion of the 2006 U.S. economy.

Cold Case: Keeping Snowmobilers Off Straight And Narrow (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

HOLLAND, N.Y. -- Railroad policeman Matthew Galas eased his cruiser behind a snowbank near a Norfolk Southern Corp. train line. He'd seen what he was looking for: fresh snowmobile tracks on the right of way. Lawbreakers had been there that morning.

He settled in to await his prey. An hour later, a snowmobile slid to a stop at the edge of the woods. Its driver nosed toward the train track, as if about to follow alongside it through railroad property. Then he spotted Mr. Galas, and disappeared back into the snowy forest.

"I thought we had a taker," said Mr. Galas. After waiting a half-hour more, he figured the word of his presence was out. Clad in a black snowsuit emblazoned "POLICE," he jumped on the railroad force's own snowmobile outfitted with red flashing lights and inspected the illegal trail, which at one point came within inches of the railroad track.

Mr. Galas once ticketed a man whose snowmobile was demolished after it had gotten caught in a snow-covered track. The driver dismounted shortly before a freight train smashed into his snowmobile -- as well as a second snowmobile that was trying to tow his off the track. Another time, Mr. Galas says he was dragged perhaps 100 feet across the snow at 2 a.m. by a snowmobiler he stopped for trespassing and suspected of being under the influence. When the snowmobiler decided to run for it, his vehicle's handlebars caught on Mr. Galas's jacket and gun belt.

"Some of them are out as long as the bars are open," notes the 33-year-old, who has worked for eight years for Norfolk Southern. "And they are open until 4 a.m. in Erie County."

After a slow start this year, winter has hit the Northeast with a vengeance. Where Mr. Galas works, in the Buffalo suburbs, that has meant frigid temperatures, heavy snowfall and an escalation of the annual fight between railroad police and the area's legions of snowmobile fanatics. So far this month, Mr. Galas has issued warnings to eight snowmobilers on the right of way in Holland, just one of many freight lines crisscrossing the area. Police have given out tickets that can carry fines of $100.

Snowmobiling is important to the region's economy and culture. The state government provides funds to local snowmobile clubs to groom and mark their trails. Local shops, gas stations, restaurants and bars rely on snowmobile business, both from tourists and locals.

Some aficionados resent the railroad getting aggressive about patrolling the right of way along its tracks, which can be as wide as 100 feet and tends to have some of the flattest, smoothest paths among the hilly and treacherous woods.

"It is like a speed trap on the highway, and I don't agree with it," says Larry Snyder, a board member of the Holland Sno-Rascals, the local snowmobile club. The club, which uses a raccoon's face as its logo, has 280 members. The town of Holland's total population is 1,261.

The club advises its members not to trespass on the railroad's private property, and certainly not to ride on the rails themselves. But it is fighting the Norfolk Southern line's recent efforts to cut off crossings that snowmobilers use to follow their trails from one side of the tracks to the other.

The railroad wants the snowmobilers away from its tracks as much as possible. Snowmobilers in northern New York and New England have crashed into railroad equipment and trains. Train companies fear snowmobiles can strike dangerous objects buried under snow on railroad property, such as long sections of rail or stacks of railroad ties. The companies also fear expensive jury awards if accident victims or their families sue.

In late January, a 24-year-old snowmobiler died when he lost control and ran into a CSX Corp. signal shed near Erie, Pa. Several years ago, an Amtrak train killed a snowmobile operator who was riding on the narrow cake of snow between the rails near Albany.

Commercial railroads have had their own police forces going back to the Civil War. Famous agents included Bat Masterson, a Wyatt Earp crony, and Allan Pinkerton, founder of the Pinkerton detective agency that chased train robbers in the Old West. Railroad cops are granted full enforcement powers by state governments, and also deal with cargo theft, vandalism and, lately, terrorism concerns. Municipal and state police also make arrests for violating railroad territory, but railroad companies say that's not enough.

In its battle with the snowmobilers, Norfolk Southern has dismantled a crossing used by a farmer with property on each side of the track, and wants to cut off more such unofficial crossings. Taking apart the farmer's crossing, made up of stones between the rails, severed a well-traveled trail. For a while, snowmobilers tried to laboriously lift their machines over the track. The railroad then piled up brush and dug six-foot-deep ditches on each side to stop them.

"Most of the railroads you can deal with, but it just happens Norfolk Southern is the biggest pain and that's the one we have here," says Gerald Cummins, president of the Sno-Rascals. The club has had to reroute about 20 of its 50 miles of trails away from the railroad tracks, he says, which cost more than $10,000 for culverts, labor, dirt and signs -- about half the state grant the club got last year to maintain trails.

The farmer who lost his crossing has sued the railroad, but snowmobilers don't expect to regain their access. The Sno-Rascals rerouted that trail an extra eight miles through the center of the community. But that created noise and other issues with local property owners. The reroute also bypassed two regular snowmobiler stops: The Valley, a restaurant and bar, and the Yellow Goose gas station. "It's getting so they can't get to us," says Kelly Kensy, owner of The Valley and a Sno-Rascals board member.

In nearby Attica, snowmobilers have virtually taken over an unused spur track. When Norfolk Southern agent Murray Haines went to inspect, he found they had posted a 15 mph speed limit sign next to a rusting railroad signal pole. A trail-grooming rake was parked nearby. Snowmobilers used to traveling along the spur include a Byron town justice, Daniel DiMatteo, who also is an attorney for two snowmobile clubs. He said the previous owner of the spur, Conrail, was more permissive.

Mr. Haines said the railroad would try to get snowmobilers to reroute their trail. For the moment, he walked through a company parking lot next to an active track, noting a dozen snowmobiles parked there. He took down their vehicle ID numbers, and asked their owners to move on.

KLAS-TV, February 22, 2007

Federal authorities are moving forward with a conspiracy investigation targeting several of the valley's best-known doctors and lawyer. FBI agents began the probe back in 2003.

Federal prosecutors turned up the heat in front of a grand jury putting some of the most successful doctors and lawyers in Las Vegas in the crosshairs of this investigation. They reportedly called themselves the "Medical Mafia."

The FBI suspects them of conspiring to rip off patients, clients, and insurance companies for tens of millions of dollars. Testimony before a federal grand jury began Tuesday, Feb. 20 and prosecutors paraded more witnesses into the federal building Wednesday, Feb. 21 in preparation for possible indictments. The Channel 8 I-Team was the only news crew on the scene.

Click here to read 'Federal Grand Jury Issues Subpoenas in Insurance Scam,' which contains names of interest to investigators.

The people who've been gliding in and out of the federal building since Tuesday are not rich or famous. They are the alleged victims of the millionaire lawyers and doctors who are suspected of rigging the system to line their own pockets.

FBI agents have reportedly gathered so much information about more than a dozen attorneys and physicians that they weren't sure which cases and charges to pursue. Knowledgeable sources say prosecutors have narrowed their focus to concentrate on cases involving conspiracy.

For example, Cheyenne High School teacher Melodie Simon was paralyzed following two surgeries by two doctors. FBI agents believe the doctors and their two lawyers met with alleged medical fixer Howard Awand and agreed to go after the aenesthesiologist. Agents have been told that Attorney Robert Eglet advised his partner not to worry about a defense expert witness. Sure enough, that witness didn't show for the trial.

The FBI has long suspected that Awand facilitated kickbacks to doctors -- sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars per case -- money taken from settlements or jury awards in injury cases like Melodie Simon's. Simon declined to comment on her case except to say there are about 20 others just like it.

Peggy Lopez won a multimillion-dollar verdict against Sears, Roebuck and Company after her hand was crushed in an accident. Once again, the FBI thinks her doctors and lawyers divyed up the spoils with the help of Awand.

In a wedding ceremony video obtained by the I-Team, Awand makes an inside joke to Attorney Robert Vannah, who is also said to be a possible target. "It will be worth at least four and a half million dollars."

That video, which also shows Robert Eglet and his wife Tracy, another possible target, is now believed to be in the hands of federal prosecutors. Subpoenas for financial records were sent out in November 2005. Since then, some of the attorneys who were served have said they are being targeted because of their success against the insurance industry.

Sources close to the case say prosecutors now have a paper trail to show the flow of money from the lawyers to the doctors, even though records were post dated. And, the I-Team has learned, some of those professionals who were once targets of the probe are now cooperating with prosecutors and are telling the grand jury just how the alleged scheme worked and, more pointedly, who was involved.

At one point in the investigation, the government planned to go after cases in which medical bills were jacked up through the use of unnecessary surgeries. Since experts can disagree on just what is unnecessary, prosecutors are now focusing on what they consider obvious conspiracies.

Grand jury testimony is often a precursor to indictments. However, as a matter of policy, the U.S. Attorney's office will not comment on anything that is before a grand jury.

Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Elderly Clients (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 22, 2007

A federal grand jury indicted an Andover financial adviser yesterday on charges he bilked senior citizens in Connecticut and Massachusetts out of nearly $2 million and spent the money on lavish trips to Las Vegas and $5,000-a-day visits to strip clubs.

John A. Baldo, 38, was charged with six counts of mail fraud, five counts of wire fraud, and one count of violating the Investment Advisers Act, the office of US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said.

Baldo was arrested Jan. 25 as he got off a flight from Boston to Las Vegas. He was released on bond, pending formal charges, which were disclosed yesterday. A phone call to Glen P. Randall, Baldo's attorney, was not immediately returned.

Baldo allegedly cheated several elderly people in Massachusetts and Connecticut and spent their millions on luxury cars, jewels, gifts for exotic dancers, and frequent gambling trips to Las Vegas.

Baldo claimed to be a certified financial adviser and beginning in late 2005 talked his victims into liquidating their assets to put the money into an annuity account he said would guarantee them generous income, prosecutors said.

An 88-year-old man in Storrs, Conn., gave Baldo $1.6 million, and his 85-year-old brother, who also lives in Connecticut, gave him $200,000, according to the indictment. Prosecutors say he also stole $200,000 from a 63-year-old Rockport woman.

FBI agent Melissa Valera said in a court filing that Baldo spent about $300,000 for three luxury cars and almost that amount gambling.

He was a regular customer at the Cabaret Lounge in Peabody, where he was known for giving dancers $100 bills and spending about $5,000 a day, Valera's affidavit said.

Customer Data Breach Began In 2005, TJX Says (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Retail giant TJX, whose stores include discount clothing chains T.J. Maxx and Marshalls, said yesterday that a computer-security breach stretched back 10 months earlier than the company originally thought, compromising credit and debit card data, drivers' license numbers, and names and addresses.

The announcement underscores a trend of security breaches involving sensitive credit card data and reflects failures to properly secure computer systems, to notify customers when breaches occur and to update laws for the cyber-crime age, lawmakers and analysts said.

TJX said that while it first thought the intrusion took place from May 2006 to January 2007, it now thinks its computer system was also hacked in July 2005 and on "various subsequent dates" that year. The company, which reported the intrusion in January -- a month after it said it discovered the breach -- has not said how many customers may have been affected or how many customers it has notified.

"We don't have a number for you there. Our work is not finished," spokeswoman Sherry Lang said yesterday. More than 50 computer experts are helping TJX investigate the breaches, she said.

Banks that issued the credit cards have not said how much they have had to cover in fraud-related losses.

More than 30 states have laws that require companies to notify customers as soon as possible when a breach has occurred, though most of the statutes let companies delay notification while law enforcement agencies investigate. A bipartisan group of senators has reintroduced legislation that would mandate customer notification and require companies that maintain personal information to establish internal policies to protect it.

"Americans live in a world where their most sensitive personal information can be accessed and sold to the highest bidder, with just a few keystrokes on a computer, yet our privacy laws haven't kept pace," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said in a statement when the legislation was reintroduced this month.

The credit card industry has set up rules for data protection called the Payment Card Industry Data Security Standard. They include encrypting transmission of cardholder data, regularly testing security systems and processes, and restricting access to data to those with a "need to know."

But most large retailers have not complied with the standard, and noncompliance is about 80 percent among smaller retailers, said Avivah Litan, an analyst with Gartner, an information technology research firm.

Litan said the retailers are not solely to blame. "It's a collective problem with collective responsibility," she said. "Certainly the retailers have to tighten up their systems, but the banks have to strengthen cardholder authentication so even if the data is stolen, it's useless."

Security breaches are difficult to quantify accurately. The Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit research and advocacy group in San Diego, said more than 100 million records of U.S. residents have been exposed by security breaches since February 2005.

The privacy group and the nonprofit Identity Theft Resource Center, also in San Diego, found that the majority of breaches they have tracked in the past few years occurred in government, the military and universities.

One of the biggest breaches occurred in 2005, when 40 million credit card numbers, along with name and account information, were exposed by hackers who broke into CardSystems Solutions, a credit card processing center that handled transfers of payments between the banks that issue credit cards and the merchants' banks.

Retailers often keep more data than necessary to process transactions, Litan said. They also keep information longer than necessary, she said.

"The CEOs and senior managers of most retailers that are storing data, like TJX, have no idea they're storing that data," Litan said. "It's basically a legacy of old systems programming." Many retailer systems were built in the 1970s and '80s, before there were hackers.

Many banks are frustrated because they are "left having to pay for the mistakes of retailers," to cover reissuing cards and any losses due to fraud, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for the American Bankers Association.

"Retailers are not protecting the data," she said. "It's not a question of notification. It's a responsibility to protect the data."

The bankers typically do not know the scope of retailer breaches because of confidentiality agreements between the retailers and the issuing card companies, such as Visa and MasterCard.

In Massachusetts, where TJX is headquartered, the Massachusetts Bankers Association stopped surveying its members in connection with the TJX breach after more than 30 banks were alerted by Visa and Master Card that their cards had been compromised by the TJX intrusion, association spokesman Bruce Spitzer said.

TJX operates more than 2,400 stores in the United States, Canada and Europe. They accept Visa, MasterCard, American Express and Discover credit cards.

The company reported yesterday that same-store sales in the fourth quarter rose 5 percent from the comparable quarter a year earlier. The quarter ended Jan. 27, 10 days after the breach was disclosed.

TJX, which is being sued by customers and banks, also reported that it spent $5 million in the fourth quarter to cover costs of the investigation, enhance computer security and communicate with customers.

Fourth-quarter profit fell 29 percent, to $205.5 million. Sales rose 9 percent, to $5.1 billion. For the full fiscal year, TJX profit rose 7 percent, to $738 million. Sales rose 9 percent, to $17.4 billion.

The Trial Of The Sensory (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A sexual harassment case that exposed the private lives of UCLA psychiatrists goes to the jury for its analysis.

For those who suspect that psychiatrists are at least as crazy as the rest of us, the sexual harassment trial that went to a jury Wednesday in Los Angeles County Superior Court has provided no end of material.

DOJ_NMG_0135055

Jurors listened to two weeks of testimony, including psychiatrists testifying about their sex lives under code names and accounts of them allegedly attending porn parties and having oral sex in cars. Now the jury must decide who is telling the truth.

Dr. David Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleges that he had an affair with his supervisor and that after he broke it off and rumors of it began to circulate, he lost a coveted post as chief resident, and his reputation was ruined. He sued the supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA.

Krell says there was no affair. Her lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy. The jury will consider both claims at the same time.

UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair — university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country.

Testimony was so explicit that Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names, a decision she acknowledged was unusual but necessary to protect their reputations.

At times, the witness box seemed more like a psychoanalytic couch — and not just because witnesses often faced not only a judge, jury and lawyers but also at least two psychiatrists.

Testimony and court papers included Martorano's depiction of himself zipping around Malibu on dates in a two-seater, as well as an internal UCLA report that said that people who worked with him said he "frequently spent his downtime … talking about his sexual conduct." Jurors also heard his personal psychiatrist's assessment that he was "addicted" to having women fall in love with him.

Narcissistic traits

At one point, UCLA's lawyer, Alan Zuckerman, asked Martorano, a former opera singer and the son of a psychiatrist, if he thought he had a narcissistic personality disorder. As Zuckerman later told the jury, narcissists have a grandiose sense of self, lack empathy for others and take advantage of them.

Martorano replied that he would never call himself narcissistic but that "there are traits of narcissism that I possess."

In his closing argument, Zuckerman went point by point through the nine attributes of narcissistic personality disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders and explained how each attribute fit Martorano. He then accused the doctor of filing the lawsuit because his narcissistic personality couldn't handle that Krell would not admit that she had slept with him.

In response, Martorano's lawyer, Robert Scott, said that "some lawyers want to become psychiatrists." Later, he referred to Krell's lawyer, Donald Garrard, as Dr. Garrard.

Garrard, meanwhile, enthusiastically endorsed the diagnoses of Martorano as a raging narcissist, offering several examples of his own.

Then he turned to evolutionary psychology in his attempt to impugn Martorano's testimony, saying that it wasn't believable that Martorano couldn't recall details of sex he allegedly had with Krell. "The genes we come with are programmed for little else," he said as the judge and members of the jury and gallery burst into laughter.

He also argued that jurors should not believe Martorano's claim that Krell had performed oral sex on him parked in an Audi in front of her apartment, because a 35-year-old physician would obviously choose to go to her apartment rather than stay in the car.

Garrard urged jurors to punish Martorano for acting like "a 14-year-old boy" by awarding Krell punitive damages.

Martorano's attorney, however, argued that the evidence that Martorano and Krell had an affair was hard to dispute. He pointed to dozens of phone calls, social events they attended together and testimony that they watched a movie about a porn star titled "The Fluffer."

Then, when rumors of the affair emerged, he said, Krell created a hostile work environment for Martorano by criticizing him excessively and by spreading rumors that he was a liar, a misogynist and manic depressive. And he was denied the job of chief resident. Then, Scott said, UCLA tried to "sweep it all under the rug" to protect itself.

Other lawsuits

This is not the only sexual harassment claim facing UCLA's medical school and its psychiatry department.

Krell has also filed a separate sexual harassment suit against UCLA, alleging that she was subjected to an onslaught of sexual comments and sexually degrading and demeaning behavior and gestures from Andrew Leuchter, another psychiatrist at UCLA.

She also alleged that department administrators retaliated against her when she complained. UCLA denies the allegations. The case is to go to trial next fall.

The university recently lost an appeal of a third, unrelated sexual harassment and discrimination case in which a female psychiatrist was awarded $2.9 million.

Martorano now runs a psychiatric practice out of his home in Malibu, where one of the things he specializes in, according to his website, is couples therapy. But that has not been trouble-free.

He and his new wife are embroiled in a legal dispute with a neighbor.

His next-door neighbor recently accused him of killing his dog and videotaping his children. In a countersuit, Martorano denied the allegations and accused his neighbor of telling his patients he was a dog-killer and child molester.

O'Malley Seeks End To Md. Executions (WP)

By John Wagner And Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Gov. Martin O'Malley urged Maryland lawmakers yesterday to repeal the state's death penalty, saying the punishment is "inherently unjust," does not serve as a deterrent to murder and saps resources that could be better spent on law enforcement.

Stepping forcefully into a debate taking place in Annapolis and across the nation, O'Malley (D) suggested that Maryland and other states will inevitably execute innocent people. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978.

"Can the death penalty ever be justified as public policy when it inherently necessitates the occasional taking of a wrongly convicted, innocent life?" O'Malley said during the first of two appearances yesterday before legislative committees. "Is any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family . . . in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murderers?"

O'Malley's testimony, captured by more than a dozen television cameras in a packed Senate hearing room, opened a long afternoon of debate over legislation that would replace Maryland's death penalty with life in prison without parole.

The issue, one of the most divisive facing the General Assembly this year, drew pleas from people on both sides of the issue during separate hearings conducted by House and Senate panels. But far more people turned out to support repeal, with nearly 30 people signing up to testify in favor of the bill in the Senate.

Baltimore County State's Attorney Scott D. Shellenberger (D), one of a handful of capital punishment supporters who appeared, told the panel that it was unnecessary to repeal the death penalty because so few executions are carried out in Maryland. There are six prisoners on the state's death row.

"Why repeal a statute that prosecutors need to use when you have all the checks and balances in place?" he said. "You can't look at the death penalty in a vacuum. It's merely a justifiable homicide in order to protect others."

The issue gained attention in Maryland in December with a court ruling that effectively halted executions until the state issues new regulations on lethal injection. O'Malley has declined to say whether his administration will issue those regulations if the death penalty is not repealed during the 90-day legislative session.

Even some supporters of repeal acknowledged they have an uphill battle, particularly in the Senate, where the legislation could face a filibuster if it reaches the floor.

Some of the most emotional testimony yesterday came from Kirk Bloodsworth of Dorchester County, who served eight years in prison, two of them on death row, for rape and murder charges that were later dismissed based on DNA evidence.

Bloodsworth told the Senate panel that the state should not "have blood on its hands" for one innocent man who might be wrongly convicted.

"The bottom line is simple: If it can happen to an honorably discharged Marine Corps veteran, it can happen to anybody," Bloodsworth said, his voice cracking and tears running down his face.

DOJ_NMG_0135057

Others testifying in favor of a repeal included Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) and former attorney general J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), who is O'Malley's father-in-law.

Among those testifying against repeal was Phyllis Bricker of Baltimore, whose mother and father were murdered in their Baltimore home in 1983.

Bricker said her parents' killer, John Booth, is one of the six men who sit on death row. "Three separate juries . . . sentenced this man to death," Bricker told the House committee. "Now you, the senators and delegates, have been asked to act as judge and jury . . . without ever having heard one word of courtroom testimony."

Sitting governors rarely testify on legislation that is not part of a formal administration legislative package. And O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, had urged lawmakers to focus this session on issues on which there is broad consensus.

O'Malley, a Catholic whose forehead bore ashes from an Ash Wednesday Mass, suggested that the death penalty is an affront to "individual human dignity," which he called "the universal truth that is the basis of human ethics." But most of his testimony focused on pragmatic arguments about the cost and effectiveness of capital punishment.

He said that since 1990, the murder rate had declined by 56 percent in states without the death penalty but by only 38 percent in states that impose it.

"It would appear that the death penalty is not a deterrent, but very possibly an accelerant, to murder," O'Malley said.

He also cited estimates of the costs of prosecuting death penalty cases, suggesting Maryland could have saved $22.4 million since the death penalty resumed in 1978 if it did not impose the ultimate punishment. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978 and freed one inmate from death row.

"That $22.4 million could pay for 500 additional police officers or provide drug treatment for 10,000 of our neighbors suffering from drug addiction," O'Malley said. "Unlike the death penalty, these are investments that save lives and prevent violent crime."

Death penalty opponents have been lobbying lawmakers for weeks. Bloodsworth and others who have been exonerated after facing the death penalty have met with legislators to tell their stories. Maryland Citizens Against State Executions has led the effort, joined by the Catholic Conference and other religious organizations.

Before the hearing, supporters of repeal had a news conference with seven men who have served time on death row in various states and been exonerated.

As the House hearing got underway, Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), sponsor of the repeal bill, said lawmakers would "not cast a more important vote during our career as public servants." The death penalty, he said, "cannot be made right in this state or any other state."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Says Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Important Right In Bankruptcy (AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that a financially troubled small-business man gave up an important right under the federal bankruptcy code because he failed to disclose all of his assets as the law requires.

In a 5-4 decision, the Court said Robert Marrama of Gloucester, Mass., could not convert his bankruptcy case from one chapter of the code to another, as the law ordinarily allows.

The reason, the Court said, stemmed from his failure to disclose a Maine vacation home placed in a trust. Marrama, who operated a flooring company, listed the value of his interest in the property as zero, according to papers in the case.

After finding out about the home, the bankruptcy trustee said he would recover the real estate for the benefit of Marrama's creditors. Marrama had attempted to convert his case from a Chapter 7 liquidation to Chapter 13, which allows a debtor to keep property and pay debts over time.

Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens said honest debtors possess an absolute right to convert their cases to Chapter 13, but that nothing in the law limits a court's right to take away that right for "fraudulent conduct."

In dissent, Justice Samuel Alito said the bankruptcy code "unambiguously provides" that a debtor has a "broad right" to convert to Chapter 13. Alito said Chapter 13 contains a number of requirements that protect creditors from any bad faith by a debtor.

In Marrama's case, a bankruptcy judge denied the conversion to Chapter 13, and a bankruptcy appellate panel agreed.

Attorney Eric Brunstad, who represented a creditor in the case, Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, said that once a bankruptcy is converted from Chapter 7, the trustee is ousted, and in many instances "there really is no one to take action against a fraudulent debtor."

"The statutory safeguards in Chapter 13 are not always adequate to prevent abuse," said Brunstad.

The case is Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 05-996.

CRMC Settles Federal Fraud Case (MOULOBS)

By Lori Glenn

The Moultrie (LA) Observer, February 22, 2007

MOULTRIE — Following a U.S. Department of Justice investigation, Colquitt Regional Medical Center (CRMC) agreed to pay the federal government $475,000 to settle fraud allegations.

The federal whistleblower case, which was filed Aug. 17, 2004, remained sealed until Wednesday. It centered around a series of claims submitted for Medicaid and Medicare reimbursement by CRMC's Home Care Services office in Sylvester from 2001 to 2005.

Plaintiff Joyce Dickerson, a registered nurse and former director of the Moultrie Home Care Services office, allegedly reported to the hospital administration and the hospital authority in 2004 what she believed to be years of illegal billing. While hospital officials say the settlement was based on an "error rate," Dickerson's attorney Robert Howell of Moultrie said in actuality CRMC owes the federal government double the compromise agreement.

In the complaint, CRMC was alleged to have received payment from Medicare for services that were not reasonable and necessary, upcoded certification diagnoses so that the hospital was overpaid by Medicare and underutilized services after being paid in advance by Medicare allowing defendants to receive payment from both Medicare and patients.

During the time of the alleged fraud, defendant Colleen Grimsley of Sylvester had been director of the Sylvester office until 2004 when Dickerson assumed directorship of both offices. Grimsley would have had financial incentive to commit the alleged fraud, Howell said. Revenue was a component of the home health directors' annual review, he said.

"All she [Dickerson] really wanted to do was to bring this to the attention of the administration and make it stop, because she feared for her own license and she also feared for the organization she worked for," Howell said. "She brought it to their attention, they didn't do anything to stop it and so she felt compelled to go to the next level with it, so that's just what she did."

This investigation and the resulting settlement vindicates his client's assertions, Howell said.

"My client has been vindicated and the taxpayers, who ultimately foot the bill for this type of illegal conduct, have also been vindicated," the attorney said. "Mrs. Dickerson is an extremely courageous woman who has sacrificed much and has suffered greatly to make sure that CRMC repaid the money it over-billed and wrongfully collected from the government's Medicare program."

Durwood Dominy, chairman of Colquitt County Hospital Authority, said any inappropriate claims submitted were unintentional and that the hospital had no indication of problems during the five-year period.

"All home care services were provided under the direction of and on orders by the patients' personal physicians," he pointed out. "All nursing care plans were ordered by the personal physician and payments to Colquitt Regional for services provided were made after a Medicare intermediary signed off on them with no qualifications or audits during this five-year period."

Dominy said the hospital had measures in place to ensure that claims were properly submitted for reimbursement.

"All claims were submitted to and reviewed by an independent third party, which is the intermediary between the hospital and Medicare, and none of the claims were disapproved," he said. "There was absolutely no indication that anything was wrong."

Dominy pointed out that when allegations were first made, prior to the Justice Department's investigation, that Colquitt Regional had its compliance officer, two attorneys and then two outside consultants to review the records and none found any fraudulent practices.

The authority chairman said the reimbursement to be made by the hospital is based on claims of technical errors such as beginning home care services for patients on a physician's verbal orders instead of a signed document.

"If was just a technical error, why didn't the hospital ever offer to repay the money to the government?" Howell posed.

Fighting Faith-based Spending In Court (LAT)

By Andrew B. Coan

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A Supreme Court case could set the standard for challenging grants that break down the wall between church and state.

ANDREW B. COAN is a fellow at Stanford Law School. He clerked for the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals but did not work on the Hein opinion.

SIGNIFICANT constitutional cases don't always arrive at the ball dressed up as such. Sometimes they come in the modest trappings of an obscure technical dispute too dull to capture public attention.

On Wednesday, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in just such a case. Hein vs. Freedom From Religion Foundation is unlikely to make headlines, but it could deal a sharp blow to the wall of separation between church and state.

The plaintiffs are ordinary citizens who object to their federal tax dollars being used to fund the president's program for "faith-based and community initiatives." In particular, they claim that several conferences sponsored by the program were propaganda vehicles for religion and therefore violated the establishment clause of the 1st Amendment, which forbids government promotion of religion.

The government defendants — "Hein" is Jay F. Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives — dispute the plaintiffs' claim about the conferences. But at this stage, the Bush administration is asking the court to throw the case out on grounds that ordinary taxpayers have no legal interest in how the executive branch spends public money.

It seems like the kind of dry, legalistic dispute that only a lawyer could love. But the appearance is deceiving. If the court grants the administration's request, it will eliminate what is often the only effective mechanism for challenging financial support of religion by the executive branch. The effect would be to grant the president and his staff, as well as the vast federal bureaucracy, a license to preach.

The basis for the administration's request is the esoteric doctrine of standing, which determines who has suffered a sufficiently tangible injury to be allowed to bring suit in federal court. Ordinary taxpayers generally cannot sue to challenge the legality of government spending decisions because their contribution to any given expenditure is too small to count as tangible.

For the last 40 years, however, the Supreme Court has consistently given special treatment to taxpayer suits that challenge government spending in support of religion. The justification is simple and compelling. Government spending in support of religion generally does not inflict tangible injury on anyone, so if taxpayers don't have legal standing, no one does. In terms of government spending, the establishment clause would be rendered merely advisory.

That, of course, is how the Bush administration prefers its constitutional constraints.

To be sure, the administration does not advocate the wholesale abolition of taxpayer standing in establishment clause cases. It would allow taxpayers to challenge specific congressional spending programs, but not executive branch spending from general funds. This is hardly a consolation, as the Court of Appeals recognized in rejecting the administration's argument.

Suppose, as the lower court suggested, the secretary of Homeland Security used general executive funds to build a mosque and hire an imam in the belief that such visible support for Islam would reduce the risk of Islamist terrorist attacks against the United States. Would this traducing of the establishment clause not allow taxpayers to sue?

If one accepts the administration's view, it would not. The prospect boggles the mind. Not only would serious violations of the establishment clause go unremedied, but Congress might be encouraged to pad the executive's general funds, with an implicit understanding that the extra money would be available to fund executive branch programs promoting religion.

These results would be deeply inconsistent with the core purpose of the establishment clause: to ensure that no taxpayer is forced to contribute to government support of religion.

Unfortunately, the Supreme Court rarely takes a case to affirm the decision from below. That, together with the recent shoring up of the court's conservative majority, strongly suggest that the administration's position will prevail, despite the threat it poses to the separation of church and state. If it does, everyone at the ball will take notice. But by that time, the party will be over.

EDITORIAL Reining In Juries (LAT)

The Supreme Court rightly puts some limits on the awarding of outlandish punitive damages.

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT went further this week — though not far enough — in reining in juries in civil cases that award outlandish punitive damages. By a disappointingly narrow 5-4 vote, the justices overturned a jury's decision that Philip Morris should pay $79.5 million to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. The value of her actual damages was only $821,000.

The justices could — and should — have ruled clearly that the $79.5-million award violated previous rulings that punitive damages may not be "grossly excessive" and should bear a reasonable relation to the harm actually experienced by the plaintiff. But in returning the case to the Oregon courts, the court did impose a sensible rule that should make it harder for juries to sock deep-pocket and easily demonized defendants.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen G. Breyer faulted the Oregon Supreme Court for allowing the jury to calculate punitive damages based not only on Philip Morris' "reprehensible" conduct in minimizing the health risks of smoking but also on the effect of its marketing on smokers not connected to the case.

The lawyer for Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of cancer, told the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been." The result was a punitive damage award nearly 100 times larger than the actual damages. Breyer said that basing damages on supposed harm to "strangers to the litigation" violated Philip Morris' due process rights. The court is rightly applying the brake to the notion that private litigation can serve as a substitute for the regulatory power of the state.

Whatever one thinks of litigation against tobacco companies — and we think it's a blunt weapon to wield against a legal product whose health risks are well known — Breyer has brought some clarity to a confused area of the law. The issue of whether and how juries can take into account possible harm to "strangers" to a lawsuit has bedeviled state as well as federal courts. It figures, for instance, in a different Philip Morris case before the California Supreme Court in which a smoker was awarded $28 billion in punitive damages, later reduced to $28 million — although her actual damages were estimated at $850,000.

In cases like this, juries often are confronted with a brainteaser. In deciding to award punitive damages, they're supposed to consider whether the conduct of the defendant is "reprehensible," and one definition of reprehensible conduct is to act in a way that puts many people at risk (such as leaking toxic material into a water supply).

But without proper guidance, jurors can leap to the conclusion that damages should reflect the harm experienced by everyone who might have tasted tainted water — or smoked a cigarette. Though it could have gone further, this week's decision should make such leaps less likely.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

U.S. To Step Up Rights Enforcement (UPI)

UPI, February 22, 2007

With the Executive Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention as his audience, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the launch of the First Freedom Project, a Justice Department effort to fight religious discrimination. "Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles," Gonzales told Executive Committee members Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0135061

The First Freedom Project will be spearheaded by the Justice Department's civil-rights division and will build on the department's efforts to strengthen and preserve religious liberty throughout the nation, according to Gonzales, who sought the meeting with SBC leaders, Associated Baptist Press reported Wednesday.

"Throughout our history, nothing has defined us a nation more than our respect for religious freedom," Gonzales said. "It is not confined to members of one church or the followers of one set of beliefs. Through this initiative, the Justice Department continues its vigorous efforts to enforce protections against religious discrimination."

The attorney general stressed that religious liberty is "a universal right and applies to people of all faiths."

Later, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because "this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom." He noted the "timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience."

Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms.

The First Freedom Project will initiate a program of public education to make certain that people know their rights, Gonzales said. "People do not understand fully what their rights are," he explained.

The First Freedom Project will sponsor a series of regional training seminars for leaders interested in religious liberty. The first one will be March 29 in Kansas City, Mo., followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., April 25 and Seattle, Wash., May 10. Other dates and locations will be announced later.

The First Freedom Project also has launched a web site, www.firstfreedom.gov, which will provide information on laws that are enforced and details on how to file a complaint.

Another initiative, called the First Freedoms Project but unrelated to Gonzales' initiative, is a partnership between three Baptist organizations — the Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, Associated Baptist Press, and the Baptists Today newspaper — to emphasize the Christian commitment to First Amendment principles, particularly religious liberty and freedom of the press (www.firstfreedoms.com).

Prior to Gonzales' remarks, the Justice Department also released its "Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-06."

The 43-page booklet, which is available on the First Freedom website, illustrated how the Justice Department has increased the enforcement of laws against religious discrimination and protecting religious freedom.

For example, the report noted that religious discrimination cases in education increased from one case reviewed and no investigations between 1995-2000, during the Clinton administration, to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations during the past six years of the Bush administration.

The report summarizes the Justice Department's accomplishments during the Bush administration in protecting religious liberty through the enforcement of civil-rights laws.

According to the report, the department has filed a lawsuit to protect the right of a Muslim student to wear a head scarf while attending public school and defended the right of religious groups to meet in public facilities on an equal basis with secular groups.

The report also noted that the department has defended the right of senior adults to pray, sing religious songs, and hold Bible studies at a community senior center.

"In each of those cases, we argued that citizens should not be forced to check their religion at the door," Gonzales told Executive Committee members.

"But this is only the beginning," Gonzales wrote in the introductory page of the report. "Preserving religious liberty requires an ongoing commitment to protecting this most basic freedom for people of all faiths."

At the conclusion of his address, Gonzales asked the Executive Committee to help spread the word of what the Justice Department is doing to preserve religious liberty and to help educate Southern Baptists about religious-liberty laws.

Man Who Helped Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 27 Months (AP)

CLEVELAND - A man accused of serving as a lookout in a scheme to use mercury to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced to two years and three months in federal prison, the Justice Department said.

Joseph Kuzlik of Cleveland, who is white, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to interfere with the housing rights of an interracial family because of their race and to making false statements to federal investigators.

Prosecutors said Kuzlik was the lookout while an accomplice spread mercury around an interracial couple's house in February 2005.

"The abusive and serious nature of this offense is obvious to anyone with a modicum of decency and morality. I cannot imagine the terror that was inflicted on these victims," said U.S. District Judge Patricia Gaughan, who handed down the sentence Wednesday. "A message must be sent loud and clear that this behavior will not be tolerated and will result in a punishment at the high end of the guideline range."

David Fredericy, 50, of Cleveland, who also is white, was sentenced last month to 33 months in prison. He had admitted he spread the mercury to try to scare black families from his neighborhood.

Fredericy said he and Kuzlik wanted to drive black residents out of their Slavic Village neighborhood. The two would yell racial slurs and threaten black neighbors, Fredericy's plea agreement said.

The neighbors touched the liquid mercury, which can be toxic, and brought it into their home on their shoes. The house had to be evacuated and an environmental cleanup was ordered. No one was injured.

Kuzlik also was ordered to three years of supervised release and to pay $23,000 restitution to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and $767 to the Ohio EPA for cleanup. He also must make payments to individual victims.

Rhode Island Steps Toward Recognizing Same-Sex Marriage (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 21 — The Rhode Island attorney general said Wednesday that same-sex marriages performed in Massachusetts, the sole state where they are legal, should be recognized in Rhode Island.

Responding to a request for a legal opinion from the commissioner of the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education, Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch said the state prohibited discrimination based on sexual orientation and did not explicitly prohibit same-sex marriage.

“Rhode Island will recognize same-sex marriages lawfully performed in Massachusetts as marriages in Rhode Island,” the seven-page opinion said.

Mr. Lynch said his interpretation permitted recognition of the marriages, although he acknowledged that it was just an opinion and did not have the force of law.

“This is about Rhode Island citizens who entered into a valid, legally recognized same-sex marriage and returned here to live and work,” Mr. Lynch, a Democrat, said in an interview. “There is no way, no law, no constitutional provision and, in my estimation, no right to allow the denial of basic human rights.”

A spokesman for Gov. Donald L. Carcieri, a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said Mr. Carcieri and his legal counsel were studying the opinion.

The request from the board, which oversees the state’s three public colleges, went to Mr. Lynch on Feb. 1 after three employees who had same-sex marriages in Massachusetts asked that their personnel files be changed to reflect that they were married, said Steven Maurano, a spokesman for the board. Mr. Maurano said the board would abide by the attorney general’s opinion.

“We asked for the opinion,” he said. “So now that we have the opinion it’s probably incumbent for us to follow it.”

Mr. Lynch said businesses and state agencies could choose whether to abide by the opinion.

“Perhaps litigation will flow from it,” he added.

Bills to allow and to bar same-sex marriage, as well as one to create civil unions, were filed this year in the General Assembly. Previous bills on the subject died.

DOJ_NMG_0135063

In September, a judge in Massachusetts ruled that Rhode Island couples could marry in Massachusetts because Rhode Island did not have a law barring same-sex marriage.

At the time, Mr. Lynch said that the ruling did "not mean that Rhode Island will recognize a same-sex marriage performed in Massachusetts."

Mr. Lynch said Wednesday that the statement applied because a Massachusetts judge could not determine the course of Rhode Island law.

Michele Granda, a staff lawyer with Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, who argued the Massachusetts suit for two Rhode Island women, applauded Mr. Lynch's opinion, saying that it "brings peace of mind to married couples and clear direction to their employers."

Nativity Scene Is Too Religious For New York City Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

The US Supreme Court has declined to enter the fracas over what some conservatives are calling the war on Christmas.

Without elaboration, the court issued a one-line order on Tuesday refusing to take up a potentially important church-state case concerning the use of religious symbols in public school holiday displays.

At issue in Skoros v. City of New York was whether the city's public school system is impermissibly promoting Judaism and Islam while conveying a message of disapproval of Christianity. School rules allow the Jewish menorah and the Muslim star and crescent in multireligious holiday displays but not nativity scenes depicting the birth of Jesus.

The case had been relisted on the high court's private conference calendar seven times in recent months, raising expectations that the justices were taking a close look at the issue.

"We are obviously disappointed," says Brian Rooney of the Thomas More Law Center in Ann Arbor, Mich., which was urging the court to take up the case. "What this says is the [war on Christmas] is ongoing. It is going to continue festering state by state, county by county, and city by city."

While the policy, written with the help of city lawyers, bars nativity scenes, it allows depictions of Christmas trees to represent the Christian celebration of Christmas.

"We are not celebrating the birth of an evergreen tree," Mr. Rooney says. "We are celebrating a historic religious figure's birth that is recognized by the nation and every state in the Union."

The city says its policy treats all religions consistently by excluding "depictions of deities, religious texts, or scenes of worship such as a Christian nativity scene," says Leonard Koerner, a lawyer for the school district, in his brief to the court. "As the Christian nativity scene explicitly depicts the Christian deity [the baby Jesus] as the center of a scene of worship, it falls on the wrong side of the line."

Andrea Skoros, the mother of two sons attending public elementary schools in New York, took exception to what she saw as a slight to the Christian faith. She filed a lawsuit in 2002 claiming the school policy "impermissibly promoted and endorsed the religions of Judaism and Islam, conveyed the impermissible message of disapproval of Christianity, and coerced students to accept the Jewish and Islamic religions."

The suit said the school policy violated the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which bars government from favoring one religion over any other.

Mrs. Skoros, a Roman Catholic, said the school policy was infringing upon her right to control the religious upbringing and education of her children.

A federal judge disagreed and upheld the school policy. A divided appeals court panel affirmed that decision.

In asking the Supreme Court to take up the issue, Skoros's lawyer, Robert Muise of the Thomas More Law Center, said the school policy disfavors Christianity. "Why is the menorah – a symbol of a miracle that is central to the Jewish faith – any more or less religious than a simple scene of the nativity, which is a historic event?" he asks in his brief.

Mr. Muise urged the court to use the case to add clarity and certainty to its Establishment Clause jurisprudence. He said the justices should jettison their so-called endorsement test in favor of a more workable constitutional standard.

New York City's school policy says in part: "Holiday displays shall not appear to promote or celebrate any single religion or holiday." It says such symbols must be displayed together to reflect the diversity of beliefs and customs among city residents.

There are more than 1 million children in the city's school system. They speak 140 different primary languages, including Spanish, Chinese, Russian, Urdu, Bengali, Haitian-Creole, Arabic, Korean, Albanian, French, Punjabi, and Polish.

"The primary purpose of all displays shall be to promote the goal of fostering understanding and respect for the rights of all individuals regarding their beliefs, values, and customs," the city policy says.

At the same time the policy seeks to avoid the promotion or endorsement of any particular religious faith. "Display of the crèche, as a representation of the birth of a figure central to the Christian religion, and others worshiping Jesus Christ as the son of God, is not permitted by [city] guidelines," Mr. Koerner writes.

Not all Christians identify Jesus as God.

Death Of The Chief (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

Oct. 10, 1942, was up to then the best day of my life. I had talked my father, University of Illinois Class of '22, into taking me at age 11 along with him to homecoming weekend. On a golden autumn afternoon, lowly Illinois upset Minnesota, the Midwest football powerhouse. And, for the first time, I was privileged to watch Chief Illiniwek proudly dance down the field to Indian war music.

The last time I watched the Chief was Sept. 16, 2006. It will be the last time I ever see this 81-year-old symbol of my alma mater. The board of trustees last week eliminated Chief Illiniwek, bowing to years of pressure from Native American activists, the National Collegiate Athletic Association and liberal politicians.

This is a melancholy moment for me and many other Illinois alumni and university officials, including President B. Joseph White. The university has been forced to yield to blackmail. The death of the Chief epitomizes some unsavory aspects of contemporary American public life: political correctness, hypocrisy and bureaucratic tyranny.

Only a small minority of Native Americans is shown by polls to oppose Indian nicknames in sports. The campaign against them gained momentum only when the NCAA, which can hardly cope with policing athlete misconduct and illegal payments in college sports, crusaded against dozens of colleges in the name of political correctness. The NCAA, under President Myles Brand, labeled Chief Illiniwek one of the "hostile and abusive racial/ethnic/national origin mascots."

But the Chief is no mascot (the university calls him a symbol). The big-headed depiction of the father of this country at George Washington University, the turtle representing the University of Maryland and the Demon Deacon for Wake Forest are mascots. Such college mascots are comical figures who engage in sham battles with each other and go into the stands to hug children. Chief Illiniwek did not. He was always austere and dignified.

The accusation that Illinois and other schools degrade Native Americans is absurd. These schools picked Indian symbols in admiration of their valor, ferociousness and indomitable spirit in the face of overwhelming odds. Native Americans were honored in naming states. Illinois is Algonquin for "tribe of superior men." Indiana means the "land of the Indians."

The NCAA originally demanded that the University of Illinois not only dump the Chief but also drop the Fighting Illini nickname. Would Brand next demand that the states of Illinois and Indiana change their names (sticky for the NCAA, which is headquartered in Indianapolis)? The NCAA backed away from its ban on the Fighting Illini, but not on Chief Illiniwek.

That may seem irrational, but it is less so than NCAA approval of Florida State University's use of the Seminole nickname and Chief Osceola (no less dignified than Chief Illiniwek) riding his horse at football games to the sound of Indian war chants. Florida State passed the Brand test because of approval from the Seminole Tribe of Florida, which receives scholarship aid from the university. The University of Illinois cannot make such an arrangement because the original Illini were wiped out in inter-tribal wars in the 1760s.

Stanford led the capitulation to political correctness, changing from the Indians to the Cardinal in 1972. Other schools -- such as the University of North Dakota, trying to remain the Fighting Sioux -- have fought a losing battle. The NCAA was disingenuous when it claimed, in declaring victory over the Chief last Friday, that it "never mandated" that colleges "change their mascots." In fact, it rejected Illinois sponsorship of an NCAA event and was ready to prevent Illinois from hosting a National Invitational Tournament basketball game. Such sanctions threatened Illinois's recruiting of non-revenue-sports athletes.

Chief Illiniwek finally was done in by politicians jumping on the NCAA's political correctness bandwagon. Illinois State Senate President Emil Jones Jr., no friend of the university, warned that trustees might not be confirmed unless they dumped the Chief, and university officials feared their appropriations coming under attack.

While I can understand dumping the Chief, I don't like it. I could react by withdrawing from my long-range commitments to support the University of Illinois, but I won't. That would put me in the same class as the petty bureaucrats and politicians who killed Chief Illiniwek.

EMI Sounds Out Suitors After Move By Warner (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

EMI is in talks with several private equity groups including One Equity Partners, the US group affiliated with JPMorgan Chase, to sound out potential alternatives to Warner Music's $6bn approach for the British music group.

People familiar with the discussions cautioned that no firm offers appeared imminent, as Warner and would-be private equity suitors are demanding the right to conduct extensive due diligence on EMI's operations after it issued two profit warnings in quick succession since the start of the year.

EMI's board is still examining a possible securitisation of its publishing asset which remains its first choice unless a compelling offer is made.

The development comes less than three months after EMI's talks with Permira collapsed after the UK-based private equity group conducted due diligence, and four weeks after Warner's approach, which was disclosed only on Tuesday.

EMI, which would not comment on the discussions, rejected the January 24 approach from its closest rival, which is understood to have been pitched at an indicative price close to 300p.

Warner would not comment, but it is understood to have cut its valuation of EMI sharply since the latter's second profit warning.

Warner said yesterday any offer it made would be all in cash.

The US-listed group is understood to have decided against offering a stock alternative for financial reasons and because of the greater disclosure requirements offering shares would impose on its own investors.

Several EMI shareholders welcomed the prospect of an all-cash bid. "It is an ex-growth business," said one. "And we do not want Warner's shares."

Warner's statement came as EMI wrote to Warner, expressing doubts that the US group had significantly improved the chances of a deal being cleared by regulators.

Warner announced on Tuesday that it had secured the unexpected backing of Impala, an alliance of independent music companies which had opposed previous deals in the sector.

However, EMI's official response to Warner's approach argued it still saw significant regulatory risks.

The uncertainty hanging over further consolidation in the industry is set to continue for at least four to five months, with the European Commission expected to announce next week that it will launch an in-depth probe into the 2004 merger that created Sony BMG.

Meanwhile, the antitrust watchdog has until March 1 to clear the deal or conduct a more detailed probe lasting 90 working days.

The Commission cleared the deal in 2004 but its ruling was overturned by Europe's Court of First Instance last July.

Should the Commission find that the tie-up undermined competition, it could ask the merger group to break itself up again or demand that Sony BMG sell assets or change its behaviour.

Either outcome could cast a pall over the chances of an EMI-Warner deal being cleared.

DOJ_NMG_0135066

Shares in EMI yesterday closed up 1¼p at 241¼p. Shares in Warner were up 82 cents at $19.97 at lunchtime in New York.

EU Penalizes Elevator Makers With Its Largest Antitrust Fine (WSJ)

By Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission Wednesday fined four elevator and escalator makers a total of €992 million ($1.3 billion) for fixing prices, Europe's largest-ever antitrust penalty.

ThyssenKrupp AG was fined €479.7 million, United Technologies Corp.'s Otis unit was fined €224.9 million, Schindler Holding AG was hit with a €143.7 million penalty and Kone was fined €142.1 million. The sum of these fines, which topped a €750 million penalty levied last month against makers of power-grid components, reflects the commission's expanded powers to crack down on corporate cartels.

Under new antitrust guidelines established last year, the commission can levy larger fines and apply an automatic 50% increase for repeat cartel offenders. Since ThyssenKrupp had a previous cartel punishment -- a €3.2 million fine in 1998 for fixing stainless-steel prices -- its elevator penalty included this increase, bringing its fine close to the record €497 million Microsoft Corp. paid in 2004 for breaking monopoly laws.

The commission launched its investigation into the elevator business in January 2004. Its probe showed that the four companies fixed prices and rigged bids in Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Luxembourg between 1995 and 2004.

The commission said Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV, a division of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., participated in the Dutch cartel and it fined the company €1.8 million.

"It is outrageous that the construction and maintenance costs of buildings, including hospitals, have been artificially bloated by these cartels. The national management of these companies knew what they were doing was wrong, but they tried to conceal their action and went ahead anyway," the commission's top antitrust official, Neelie Kroes, said in a statement.

In all four countries, high-ranking managers held regular meetings related to the cartel. The commission found evidence that the companies knew their behavior was illegal. The managers were careful to avoid detection, meeting in rural areas or abroad and using prepaid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking. The commission said none of the companies contested these facts or other evidence unearthed in the investigation.

None of the companies qualified for the full immunity usually given to whistle-blowers. Kone's penalty was reduced by about €138 million because it was the first to disclose the cartels in Belgium and Luxembourg and provided key evidence in the German investigation. Otis' penalty was reduced by over €208 million because it disclosed the Dutch cartel and cooperated with investigations in the other countries.

Kone of Finland and ThyssenKrupp of Germany both said they will examine the commission's decision before deciding whether to appeal. Spokesmen for Switzerland's Schindler and the German unit of U.S.-based Otis declined to comment.

A key question in this case will be whether the companies' customers decide to sue. Over the past few years, the commission has encouraged private damages claims to further deter cartel offenders. "Companies have the option of seeking damages" or renegotiating their contracts, said the commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd.

Brussels Imposes €992m Fine On Lift Cartel (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday slapped a record €992m fine on ThyssenKrupp and four other lift manufacturers, in the latest sign that the Brussels watchdog is drastically ramping up the financial pain for companies that violate competition rules.

It was the highest penalty imposed by the European Commission, topping a previous record set only last month. Brussels hopes that the recent increase in antitrust fines will deter companies from abusing the law and encourage people involved in cartels to blow the whistle on co-conspirators in exchange for immunity.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner and the -official behind Brussels' get-tough approach, said the lift and escalator cartel had behaved "outrageously", while her spokesman said taxpayers, public authorities and other customers had been "ripped off big time" by the cartel.

ThyssenKrupp, the German engineering group, received the toughest penalty, €479.7m ($630m, £322.5m). Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, was fined €224.9m, Schindler of Switzerland was given a €143.7m penalty and Finland's Kone was ordered to pay €142.1m. Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined €1.8m.

Ms Kroes said: "The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators. For these companies the memory of this fine should last just as long."

The Commission said the lifts installed in its own headquarters as well as at the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg were covered by the cartel. It urged customers of the companies involved in the agreement to renegotiate their contracts, and said they might have the right to sue for damages.

John Pheasant, a competition law specialist and partner at law firm Hogan & Hartson, said yesterday's fines were part of a wider trend. "In terms of fines, the Commission is now the toughest authority in the world. The trend towards higher fines started a few years back, but recently there has been a distinct acceleration."

The Commission last year passed new fining guidelines that will allow Brussels to further increase the financial pain on abusive companies in all new cases. Officials have argued that the new rules will mean that more companies will be hit with the maximum penalty - a fine equivalent to 10 per cent of their annual global turnover.

The lift cartel operated in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between at least 1995 and 2004. According to the Commission, the groups co-ordinated their bids to ensure that a designated group would win specific contracts.

"[To agree on bids] theyusually met in bars and restaurants, they travelled to the countryside or even abroad, and they used pre-paid mobile cards to avoid tracking," the Commission said.

ThyssenKrupp, United Technologies, Schindler and Kone said they were studying the Commission ruling, with Schindler adding it was "very surprised" by the high fines. United Technologies said Otis would appeal against the decision.

Europeans Slap $1.3 Billion Price-fixing Fine On 5 Elevator Makers, Including Otis (USAT/AP)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BRUSSELS — European Union regulators on Wednesday fined United Technologies' (UTX) Otis unit and four other elevator makers $1.3 billion for operating a cartel for the installation and maintenance of elevators and escalators in Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said the fines represent the "largest ever" for price fixing in the European Union, and EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said the costs of buildings and hospitals were "artificially bloated by these cartels."

"The result of this cartel is that taxpayers, public authorities and property developers have been ripped off big time," Todd told reporters. "The companies ensured that by rigging the bids and sharing the markets that the prices paid for the installation and the maintenance were way above what they would have been if there had been a competitive market."

Fined were United Technologies of Hartford, Conn., corporate parent of Otis Elevator; German conglomerate ThyssenKrupp; Finland's Kone; Switzerland's Schindler Holding and subsidiaries of Japan's Mitsubishi Elevator Europe.

George David, chairman and chief executive of United Technologies, said in a statement that company officials are "disappointed by the conduct revealed through the Commission's and UTC's own investigations."

Otis was fined 225 million euros ($295.8 million).

"UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind," he said. "The nine local Otis employees who violated our code of ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide."

Otis and United Technologies disclosed the investigation in 2004 and have cooperated with the European Commission, David said. Otis and UTC have received full or partial reductions in penalties for its cooperation and the outcome will have "no material impact" on UTC's financial condition or Otis' competitive position.

United Technologies is waiting for the full text of the decision and will review it before reporting on its impact on its 2007 earnings guidance. In addition, David said Otis will appeal the decision to a European court.

ThyssenKrupp was given the largest fine, just over 479 million euros ($630 million), because the company was labeled a "repeat offender" by EU regulators, Todd said.

ThyssenKrupp, based in Frankfurt, Germany, said it will review the fine and then decide whether to appeal.

Schindler was fined 144 million euros ($189.3 million), Kone 142 million euros ($187 million) and Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined 1.8 million euros ($2.37 million).

The European Commission said the cartel had worked to rig bids for procurement contracts, fix prices and share markets "between at least 1995 and 2004." It said the companies "did not contest the facts" found by EU regulators, adding none of the accused requested a hearing to answer the allegations.

But Schindler said the company was "very surprised at the size of the fine," because it claimed the EU had found "no evidence of pan-European collusion among companies in the European elevator industry." It said in a statement that it had not yet decided whether it would appeal.

Kone also said it will "examine the commission's decision and decide on potential action."

Wednesday's fine tops a 750 million euros ($978 million) fine imposed last month against 10 companies for running a cartel to fix prices for heavy equipment used by power utilities, reflecting stepped-up action by Kroes against price fixing.

She has vowed a crackdown under new antitrust guidelines agreed to last year that allow EU regulators to come down harder on repeat offenders like ThyssenKrupp, which faces an automatic 50% increase for repeated price-fixing activities.

The German company had already received a previous cartel fine, worth 3.2 million euros ($4.2 million) in 1998 for fixing stainless steel prices. Wednesday's punishment brings ThyssenKrupp close to the 479 million euros fine paid by U.S. software giant Microsoft (MSFT) for breaking European monopoly laws.

EU regulators found evidence from "numerous documents and corporate statements" to prove the companies allocated tenders and contracts for the sale, installation and maintenance of elevators "with the aim of freezing market shares and fixing prices," the commission said.

"Projects that were rigged included lifts and escalators for hospitals, railway stations, shopping centers and commercial buildings," it said, adding such acts were decided upon between managing and service directors during regular meetings between cartel members.

"There is evidence that the companies were aware that their behavior was illegal and they took care to avoid detection," the commission said, adding that the meetings usually took place in bars and restaurants or in locations outside cities to avoid suspicion.

EU officials said they even used prepaid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking.

"The national management of these companies know what they were doing was wrong, but they tried to conceal their action and went ahead anyway," Kroes said in a statement. "The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators."

The EU conducted surprise raids against the companies in January 2004 after EU regulators were tipped off.

EU Fines Otis, Four Other Elevator Makers For Cartel (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, February 22, 2007

Feb. 21 (Bloomberg) -- European antitrust authorities fined Otis Elevator Co. and ThyssenKrupp AG, the world's two largest elevator makers, and three competitors a record 992.3 million euros ($1.3 billion) for price-fixing.

The European Commission penalized ThyssenKrupp 479.7 million euros, the biggest fine against a company for a cartel, and levied 224.9 million euros on Otis, a unit of United Technologies Corp. It also fined Schindler Holding AG 143.7 million euros, Kone Oyj 142.1 million euros and Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV 1.8 million euros for fixing prices of elevators and escalators.

``It is outrageous that the construction and maintenance costs of buildings, including hospitals, have been artificially bloated by these cartels," Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement today.

The penalty is the highest imposed by the Brussels-based commission for a cartel, surpassing a 790.5 million-euro fine imposed on eight companies for fixing vitamin prices in 2001. Otis, Schindler, ThyssenKrupp and Kone control about 75 percent of the global elevator and escalator market, which has annual sales of 30 billion euros, said Christian Obst, an analyst at HVB in Munich who has a ``hold" rating on ThyssenKrupp shares.

United Technologies in Hartford, Connecticut, said the company plans to appeal today's fines to the European Court of First Instance. Germany's ThyssenKrupp, Hergiswil, Switzerland- based Schindler and Helsinki-based Kone said they are considering whether to appeal.

Highest in History

Kroes has made fighting cartels a priority for her five- year term. On Jan. 24, she fined Siemens AG, Areva SA and eight other companies that make electricity network gear 750 million euros. The commission fined seven cartels a total of 1.84 billion euros last year, an annual record.

``Today we see the commission really going forward and really emphasizing its commitment not only to penalizing participants in cartels but also sending a very clear deterrent message to companies that might be tempted to get involved in those types of activities," John Pheasant, a partner at Hogan & Hartson LLP, said in an interview.

The commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, said the companies set prices in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004. The companies rigged contract bids, allocated projects to each other and shared confidential information, the regulator said.

`Ripped Off'

The companies ``were aware that their behavior was illegal and they took care to avoid detection; they usually met in bars and restaurants, they traveled to the countryside or even abroad and they used pre-paid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking," the commission said.

``The result of this cartel is that taxpayers, public authorities and property developers have been ripped off, big time," Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, told reporters in Brussels. ``Its effects will be felt for the next 20 to 50 years."

ThyssenKrupp's fine was raised by 50 percent because it was a repeat offender, the regulator said. The Dusseldorf, Germany- based company said in a statement that its lawyers ``will review the fine notice and then decide whether to appeal."

Shares of United Technologies fell 55 cents, or 0.8 percent, to $67.58 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. ThyssenKrupp closed down 42 cents, or 1.1 percent, at 38.96 euros in Frankfurt. Kone fell 8 cents, or 0.2 percent, to 45.81 euros. Schindler rose 3.4 Swiss francs, or 4.3 percent, to 82 francs.

Firings

United Technologies Chief Executive Officer George David said the company has disciplined employees for the cartel and has been cooperating with the commission. The company, which holds an investor meeting in New York on Feb. 28, is waiting to receive the full decision to study how the fine may affect profit forecasts for 2007, it said in a statement.

``We are disappointed by the conduct revealed through the commission's and UTC's own investigations," David said in the statement. ``UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind. The nine local Otis employees who violated our Code of Ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed, and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide."

Under United Technologies' strict ethics policy, 913 employees have been dismissed in the past five years. So far this year, 27 have been terminated, according to spokesman Peter Murphy. Violations of the policy can include everything from inappropriate use of confidential company information to environmental, health and safety breaches.

``Schindler is very surprised at the size of the fine since the European Commission found no evidence of pan-European collusion among companies in the European elevator industry," the company said in a statement.

Herman Van De Pasch, senior managing director at Mitsubishi Elevator Europe in Veenendaal, The Netherlands, said he was ``disappointed" by the fine.

``I had expected a very low fine because of our small role," Van De Pasch said in a telephone interview.

Otis To Appeal Against EU Elevator Cartel Fine (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

The US parent company of elevator maker Otis said Wednesday it would appeal against a record EU antitrust fine imposed against a lift cartel.

United Technologies Corp. (UTC) said it had "cooperated fully" with the European Union's executive commission during the investigation into the market-rigging cartel.

"Otis will appeal the commission's decision to the European Court of the First Instance," a UTC statement said.

"We are disappointed by the conduct revealed through the commission's and UTC's own investigations," UTC chief executive George David said.

"UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind," he said, noting that nine Otis employees in Europe had been "quickly identified and dismissed" for violating the company's code of ethics.

The statement added: "The outcome of the case will have no material impact on UTC's financial condition and no material impact on Otis' competitive position."

The European Commission ruled that the companies ran a cartel for the installation and maintenance of lifts and escalators in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and The Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004.

The combined fine came to a record 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars).

ThyssenKrupp was handed the heaviest fine ever imposed by EU regulators on a single company in a cartel case because it was a repeat offender. The German group was fined 480 million euros.

Otis was given a fine of 225 million euros for its role, followed by Schindler with a penalty of 144 million euros and Kone with 142 million euros.

Patent Held By Genentech Is Revoked By Government (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Patent and Trademark Office has decided to revoke a fundamental patent held by Genentech, the biotechnology company, that was at the center of a recent Supreme Court decision.

The patent office's decision could cost Genentech hundreds of millions of dollars in royalties over the next decade but would save a like amount for rivals that are paying the royalties, including MedImmune, Abbott Laboratories, Johnson & Johnson and ImClone Systems.

In a statement yesterday, Genentech said it would appeal the decision through the patent office and, if necessary, the courts. The company said the patent would remain "valid and enforceable" through the appeals process.

The decision is the latest in a long controversy, and even mystery, surrounding the patent. The patent was awarded in 2001 even though the inventions on which it was based were made in the early 1980s. If not revoked, the patent, often called the Cabilly II patent after the lead inventor, Shmuel Cabilly, would expire in 2018.

Last month the Supreme Court ruled that MedImmune could challenge the patent even though it had licensed the rights to use it. Lawyers said the decision would have a big impact on how patent licensing deals are structured.

The patent covers techniques for making monoclonal antibodies, which are the basis for many of the biggest selling products made by the biotechnology industry. Genentech shares revenue from the patent with its research partner at the time, the City of Hope, a medical center in Duarte, Calif.

Genentech said that in 2006 it earned 6 cents a share, equivalent to $105 million in pretax income, from the patent, after subtracting what it paid to City of Hope. That was less than 3 percent of its adjusted earnings per share of $2.23.

A Genentech spokesman said the biggest royalties come from Humira by Abbott, Remicade by Johnson & Johnson, Synagis by MedImmune and Erbitux by ImClone.

An analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, Geoffrey C. Porges, wrote in a note yesterday that the impact of the decision "is greater for the companies paying royalties on Cabilly than it is for Genentech." Genentech, based in South San Francisco, Calif., is enjoying booming sales of its drugs for cancer and eye disease.

In moving to revoke the Cabilly II patent, the patent office said other patents had predated it, including the original Cabilly I patent, which expired last year.

The office had issued a preliminary ruling to revoke the patent in 2005, saying it represented double patenting of the same invention and would inappropriately extend Genentech's patent protection by 12 years.

The re-examination of the patent was requested by a Chicago lawyer, Liza V. Mueller. She has not revealed whom or which company she represents, though it is presumably one of the companies that pay royalties to Genentech.

MedImmune filed a lawsuit against Genentech in federal court in Los Angeles in 2003, challenging the patent. It also said Genentech had violated antitrust laws by colluding with Celltech, a British company and unit of UCB, to extend patent protection.

Genentech denied all of those accusations.

Both Genentech and Celltech were awarded patents covering similar antibody technology in 1989. Genentech then added some claims from the Celltech patent to a second patent application that it had previously filed on the same work. That forced the patent office to decide whether Genentech or Celltech was the first inventor.

In 1998, the patent office ruled in favor of Celltech. Genentech then took its case to Federal District Court in Northern California.

In 2001, however, Genentech and Celltech reached a settlement, agreeing that Genentech was the rightful inventor. The reason given was that Genentech had discovered an early draft of its patent application that predated Celltech's application.

The court ordered the patent office to grant a new patent to Genentech. The new patent, Cabilly II, would extend to 2018, even though both the original Cabilly and the Celltech patents would have expired in 2006.

MedImmune raised questions about whether Celltech was also profiting by giving up its soon-to-expire patent in favor of Genentech's new one. The terms of the settlement between Genentech and Celltech have never been made public.

According to a brief filed by City of Hope in the recent Supreme Court case, Celltech shared in some of the royalties from the new Cabilly patent for a limited period but received less money than it would have if its own patent had remained in force.

The court in Los Angeles dismissed MedImmune's antitrust charges, saying that the settlement between Genentech and Celltech had been appropriately approved by the judge overseeing their case. It also said MedImmune could not sue to invalidate the patent since it was a licensee of the patent.

MedImmune appealed that latter decision to the Supreme Court, which last month ruled that a party did not have to breach a patent license to challenge a patent. MedImmune's claims regarding the Cabilly II patent will now be tried in the lower courts.

MedImmune's general counsel, William C. Bertrand Jr., said the company was pleased with the decision to revoke the patent.

"We believe they adopted a lot of the arguments that we've propounded concerning this particular patent over the years," Mr. Bertrand said.

EU Approves Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Filling Stations (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

EU antitrust regulators gave their approval on Wednesday to Russian energy group Lukoil's plans to buy the filling stations of US oil giant ConocoPhillips in seven European countries.

After probing the deal for its impact on competition, the European Commission said that it had "found that the proposed transaction would not impede effective competition" in Europe.

Under the deal, the Russian oil and gas group is buying 400 filling stations from ConocoPhillips in Belgium, the Czech Republic, Finland, Luxembourg, Poland, Hungary and Slovakia.

The two companies have been close partners since ConocoPhillips bought 7.59 percent of Lukoil in 2004. The US company has since increased its stake to 20 percent.

Regulator Clears Japan Deal For Gallaher (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

European Union Approves Japan Tobacco's $14.7B Bid for Britain's Cigarette Maker Gallaher

DOJ_NMG_0135072

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union antitrust regulators on Wednesday cleared Japan Tobacco Inc.'s proposed $14.7 billion purchase of British cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC, saying the deal did not pose competition problems on the European market.

Japan Tobacco, the world's third biggest cigarette company wants to buy Gallaher to give the maker of the Mild Seven brand a bigger share in the European market.

The European Commission said the deal showed overlaps between the two companies "are generally limited," with the brands of the two positioned in different market areas. "Moreover, for all products concerned, the new entity would continue to face several strong, effective competitors with significant market shares," the commission said in a statement.

The deal would reportedly be the biggest Japanese overseas acquisition. Gallaher, which employs 12,000 people worldwide, dates back to 1857, when Tom Gallaher started a business making Irish roll tobacco in Londonderry, Northern Ireland. Its cigarette brands in Europe include Benson & Hedges, Silk Cut and Sovereign.

The company has been under pressure in a tough European market, particularly from additional taxation and increased competition in Spain and Austria.

Currently, JT has little presence in Western Europe, and only has operations in Russia.

The combined company would have annual global output of 600 billion cigarettes, JT said. It would remain at No. 3 behind Altria Group Inc. of the United States and Britain's British American Tobacco.

EU Approves Japan Tobacco Takeover Of Gallaher (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

EU antitrust regulators approved on Wednesday Japan Tobacco's planned purchase of British cigarette group Gallaher, which is to be the biggest-ever takeover by a Japanese company.

"After examining the operation, the (European) Commission concluded that the transaction would not significantly impede effective competition," the EU antitrust watchdog said in a statement.

Japan Tobacco unveiled plans in mid December to buy British manufacturing and wholesale company Gallaher Group for 2.25 trillion yen (18.6 billion dollars, 14.2 billion euros) including debt in Japan's biggest-ever corporate acquisition.

The deal is expected to leave the JT group holding some 14 percent of the European Union market, with a 39-percent share in Britain and 45 percent in Austria.

"The Commission's examination of the proposed transaction showed that the horizontal overlaps between the activities of Gallaher and Japan Tobacco are generally limited with the brands of both companies mainly positioned in different segments," it said.

EU regulators also found that the merger would not leave the combined company with crushing market share as it would face "several strong, effective competitors."

Japan Tobacco sells brands including Mild Seven, Camel and Winston in about 120 countries and the takeover will give it extra muscle to take on world number one Philip Morris Cos. Inc. of the United States.

Gallaher owns Benson and Hedges, Silk Cut, Mayfair and Sovereign and also makes and sells cigars, "roll-your-own" and "make-your-own" tobacco, pipe tobacco and "snus", a type of oral snuff used in Sweden and Norway.

Steel Mill Sale Order Questioned (AP)

By David Dishneau, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

The United Steelworkers union and Maryland's economic development chief say they disagree with a federal order that global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's planned acquisition of Arcelor SA.

While ordering the sale of the Maryland plant, the consent decree proposed Tuesday by Justice Department would allow Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, which is used primarily for food and aerosol cans.

The United Steelworkers, which represents the mill's 2,106 production workers, said it will seek a reversal of the decision because selling Sparrows Point won't necessarily help workers or the company.

"It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," said David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee.

The Justice Department said Sparrow Point's profitability and port access would help make it a viable competitor. In contrast, the Weirton mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, according to the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers there.

Sparrows Point, with about 2,400 workers and one of the largest blast furnaces in North America, faces the prospect of its fourth owner in as many years.

David W. Edgerley, secretary of the Maryland Department of Business and Economic Development, said the state would work with Mittal to find a buyer for Sparrows Point, but he wasn't happy with the decision.

"We never like to have this kind of ruling that has an adverse effect on any Maryland business," Edgerley said.

An expert on Sparrow Point's 120-year history said the order could be good for the mill and the domestic steel industry.

Mark Reutter, an Urbana, Ill., writer who chronicled Sparrows Point in his 1988 book "Making Steel," said the decision means the government has heard manufacturers' complaints about too much steel consolidation.

"The sort of unspoken aspect here is that someone in Washington is signaling displeasure over the last two years and wants more competition in the industry," Reutter said.

Illinois-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable. And industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills.

But the German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG said Wednesday it has no interest in acquiring the Maryland mill.

Mittal Sorry About Ruling (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 22, 2007

Steelmaker's CFO says order leaves no choice on Sparrows Point sale

After a day of silence, Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it was disappointed by the Justice Department's decision requiring it to divest its Sparrows Point steel mill to resolve antitrust concerns over tin plate production in the wake of its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

During a previously scheduled conference call with analysts yesterday to discuss fourth-quarter and year-end earnings, Mittal Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company had no choice but to comply with the order even though it preferred to sell its plant in Weirton, W.Va.

A tentative deal to sell Weirton to Chicago-based Esmark Inc. is off the table, Mittal said, because of the Justice Department's decision.

"We sympathize with everyone in Maryland because we feel the same disappointment," Mittal said.

The company has 90 days from Tuesday's ruling to sell Sparrows Point, but is eligible for a 60-day extension.

Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard said his company, which recently won control of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. in Wheeling, W.Va., has not heard from Mittal even though it has signaled its desire to buy Weirton and possibly Sparrows Point.

"Are we disappointed?" Bouchard said yesterday. "Yeah, but it's not the end of the world. If they say no, then it's no and we'll move on."

In yesterday's conference call, Aditya Mittal said the company wants to "improve profitability" at Weirton.

However, he said tin plate production, while profitable, will likely face some restructuring in the near future because there is excess capacity.

The government chose Sparrows Point for divestment because it would be a more viable competitor in the tin plate market than Weirton. Mittal and U.S. Steel Corp. produce more than 80 percent of the nation's tin plate, which is used for such item s as food containers, aerosol cans and paint buckets. The rest is made by Wheeling Pittsburgh.

Mittal declined to speculate how much Sparrows Point might be worth. The Baltimore County plant has the capacity to produce 3.6 million tons of steel per year, he said, and last year shipped about 3 million tons.

Unlike other Mittal plants around the world, the company does not have any major capital improvements planned for Sparrows Point over the next two years.

Mittal is building a hot-strip mill in Poland, increasing slab production in Brazil and expanding output in Ukraine, a country which offers the "lowest cost" and "highest contribution" to the company, Aditya Mittal said.

United Steelworkers spokesman Gary Hubbard said steel-worker jobs are being threatened by cheaper labor overseas. The union said Tuesday that it would work to reverse the Justice Department decision. Yesterday, Hubbard said he hopes a new buyer doesn't shrink Sparrows Point further.

"We've traveled a lot of hard trails at Sparrows Point," he said.

Sparrows Point workers hope the new owner will honor their contract, which is set to expire next year. Eddie Bartee Jr., 51, a third-generation steel worker and a trustee on USW Local 9477's executive board, said Mittal honored the union's contract when it bought International Steel Group in 2005 to form the world's largest steelmaker. ISG had bought the assets of Bethlehem Steel in 2003, two years after Bethlehem went bankrupt.

"Basically, if you come in with a good faith agreement with what we have, I think pretty much we'll be happy," said Bartee, a crane operator, who has worked at the plant for 33 years. "And then we'll face [contract negotiations] in 2008."

John Cirri, president of Local 9477, was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment.

Meanwhile, Mittal said the merger with Arcelor is on track and should be completed by July. The combined company, to be named Arcelor Mittal, will produce more than 110 million tons of steel a year.

Aditya Mittal said the company would continue to scale back production through at least March to ensure inventory is on par with supply. He said three blast furnaces across the company have been idled, and workers at Sparrows Point have been offered voluntary layoffs over the past few months. Mittal said the company realized "impressive" cost savings during the down time, and prices rose because the level of foreign imports fell off.

For last year, Arcelor Mittal reported combined earnings of nearly $8 billion, down from $8.26 billion a year earlier. The companies said they were squeezed by high raw materials costs but expect better earnings this year once synergies between the companies in marketing, purchasing and production are realized.

House Plans Hearing With Sirius Exec (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News, February 22, 2007

A proposed merger between XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio has only been officially public for a few days, but it's already stirring questions on Capitol Hill.

On February 28, the U.S. House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction over antitrust laws, plans to hold a hearing to examine potential ramifications of uniting the nation's only two satellite radio operators, a deal estimated at $5 billion. Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin is the only confirmed participant so far.

"We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry," Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the committee chairman, said in a statement. "Our members will explore how to define this new marketplace, and whether this merger will lead to increased choices and lower prices for consumers."

Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), the committee's co-chairman, said the panel plans to pay close attention to "whether satellite radio competes against terrestrial radio, the Internet, or other emerging technologies"--a consideration that is key to making an antitrust analysis.

It is ultimately up to the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to decide whether the deal merits approval. One of the questions that has been raised is whether such a merger it would amount, as critics say, to a "monopoly merger."

A few years ago, federal regulators blocked a merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV, arguing that such a union would amount to a "regulated monopoly." FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has already suggested there will be high hurdles before the companies would receive the regulators' blessing.

Verizon, Vonage Rumble Over Patents (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Verizon Communications Inc.'s patent-infringement suit against Vonage Holding Corp. opened in federal court, potentially adding to the troubles of the largest Internet telephone start-up.

The case is closely watched by the nascent Web-calling industry, with some experts saying that a ruling against Vonage could encourage more patent suits in the telecom world.

Verizon is accusing Vonage of infringing five patents, some related to features such as call forwarding, fraud detection and other technologies. Vonage denies the accusations and argues that the actual goal of the Verizon suit is to eliminate the Internet company, a growing competitor to Verizon's landline phone business.

"We are firm in our belief that we have not infringed on their patents," said Brooke Schulz, a Vonage spokeswoman. "This case is about one thing and one thing only and that's about Verizon's attempts to stifle competition."

Officials at Verizon have said the company is motivated by a straightforward desire to protect its intellectual property. The phone company filed the suit in June in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, a month after Vonage's initial public offering in May.

Pretrial talks between the two competitors failed to result in a settlement. In court yesterday, the judge selected a jury and attorneys delivered opening statements for both sides.

Verizon lawyers said the company was seeking $197 million in damages, plus royalty for any future infringement. Vonage lawyers denied any infringement and said the patents were invalid and that the company owed nothing in damages.

Vonage offers customers discount phone service by letting them plug their phones into high-speed Internet connections, bypassing more costly landline service provided by established carriers. Founded in 2001, Vonage today has 2.2 million customers.

New York-based Verizon is the second-biggest U.S. telecom operator after AT&T Inc., with nearly 30 million residential phone subscriptions. Vonage, Holmdel, N.J., reported a loss of $65 million for the fourth quarter; Verizon posted net income of $1.03 billion for the same period.

Vonage has been beset by shareholder suits after a botched initial public offering. Yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange, Vonage shares were off 11 cents to $5.37, down more than two-thirds from the IPO.

Wireless carrier Sprint Nextel Corp. also has filed a patent-infringement suit against Vonage related to methods for transmitting calls between the Internet and conventional phone networks. Vonage has said in court filings that the Sprint and Verizon patents are invalid or don't apply to its services and that some of the patents cited by Sprint are so vague that they are unenforceable.

The patent disputes have alarmed other Internet-calling start-up businesses. They fear they may be sued or forced to pay licensing fees, which could hamper the growth of the Internet-phone business.

John Rabena, a partner with Sughrue Mion who specializes in Internet patent litigation, said the suit may help expose a vulnerability of many players in Internet technology.

"They don't have patents, so when they get attacked they don't have anything to negotiate," said Mr. Rabena, who isn't involved in the Verizon-Vonage case and doesn't represent any Internet-calling start-ups.

Some fear a win for Verizon can boost the appetite for patent suits, especially since the incentive has already increased in the wake of a brawl between the maker of the BlackBerry portable email device, Research in Motion Ltd., and patent-holder NTP Inc. That suit raised the possibility of a court-ordered shutdown of BlackBerry service in the U.S. before Research in Motion agreed to a $612.5 million settlement with NTP in May.

"If there's a big damage reward and an injunction issued, it becomes more attractive...to bring these types of suits," said Marty Zoltick, a patent attorney with Rothwell, Figg, Ernst & Manbeck, a law firm specializing in intellectual-property rights. "We're going to see more of these lawsuits."

Vonage believes it could continue operating even if it loses the Verizon case. "We have technology solutions and we have workarounds that we're working with our engineers on today," Ms. Schulz said. "There's a voracious appetite for [Internet calling] and Verizon cannot stop that."

Apple, Cisco Reach Accord Over IPhone (WSJ)

By Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Apple Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. agreed to resolve a trademark dispute over the term iPhone that had threatened to put a damper on the introduction of Apple's most eagerly anticipated electronics product in years.

Under their agreement, Cisco, of San Jose, Calif., and Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., are free to use the iPhone trademark on their respective products throughout the world. Cisco will drop a lawsuit it filed against Apple in federal court in San Francisco, accusing Apple of infringing on a Cisco trademark with a forthcoming cellphone called the iPhone, due out in June.

In a joint statement, Apple and Cisco said they will explore opportunities for making their products work better together "in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications." The companies said other terms of the settlement are confidential, declining to comment further.

By reaching a deal, the two Silicon Valley icons head off a battle that potentially could have dragged on for years, and possibly led to an injunction to block Apple's use of the iPhone name.

Cisco sued Apple on January 10, the day after Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs unveiled the iPhone at the Macworld convention in San Francisco. The networking giant said Apple had tried unsuccessfully on previous occasions to get Cisco to grant rights to use the iPhone name, and was engaged in intensive discussions until right before Apple unveiled the cellphone.

Initially, Apple declared the Cisco lawsuit "silly" and said it expected to prevail in any court fight. More recently, both parties said they were attempting to resolve the dispute amicably.

Cisco has held a trademark on the iPhone name since 2000, when it acquired a company called Infogear Technology that made an Internet-connected telephone. Last spring, Cisco unveiled a new line of gadgets bearing the iPhone name that use voice over Internet protocol, or VoIP, technology to transmit phone calls over the Internet.

Apple plans to begin selling the iPhone in the U.S. along with its exclusive wireless partner AT&T Inc.'s Cingular for between $499 and $599.

Settlement Lets Apple Use 'iPhone' (NYT)

By Brad Stone

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 21 — Apple and Cisco Systems have decided that a name is not worth fighting over.

On Wednesday, the companies settled their dispute over the iPhone trademark. Six weeks ago, Cisco filed a lawsuit in federal court in San Francisco over Apple's planned use of the name for its much anticipated multimedia device, which combines the features of a mobile phone, an iPod and a BlackBerry.

Cisco claimed that it had owned the trademark since 2000 and was using it for a line of Internet-connected phones.

Wednesday night, in a short, ambiguously worded statement, the companies said they would dismiss all legal action against each other regarding the trademark and that Apple could use the name for its device, which it plans to start selling in June.

In addition, the companies said they would explore ways to make their identically named iPhone products work together "in the areas of security and consumer and enterprise communication."

Representatives for Apple and Cisco said other terms of the deal would remain confidential. It is not known if Apple made a cash payment to Cisco, but intellectual property lawyers say some sort of payment is typical in these cases. It is also unclear whether Cisco had sold Apple the name iPhone outright and had then secured permission to use it itself.

But the deal appears to give a partial victory to both sides. Apple can begin selling its phone with the name that its strong-willed chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, seemed to prefer.

Cisco can also continue to use the name, and with the promise of interoperability, it might have some of the hype and magic surrounding Apple's products rub off on its own less prominent offerings.

Hostilities broke out between the two companies last month, when Mr. Jobs announced the music phone at the annual Macworld convention in San Francisco.

Cisco, the networking company based in San Jose, Calif., was using the name to sell phones that can plug into a PC or connect with a wireless hot spot and make free calls over the Internet.

The two companies negotiated intensely over the trademark in early January. Executives had planned to make announcements concurrently at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas and at Macworld, proclaiming the links between their iPhone products.

After talks broke down and Mr. Jobs announced his iPhone anyway, Cisco filed a lawsuit, saying that Apple's use of the iPhone name constituted a "willful and malicious" violation of Cisco's intellectual property. In response, Apple called the lawsuit "silly" and noted publicly that several companies besides Cisco were using the iPhone name.

Cisco's lawsuit described covert Apple attempts to obtain the rights to the iPhone name. In September 2006, a corporation calling itself Ocean Telecom Services filed an application for the trademark based on earlier filings in Trinidad and Tobago. In its complaint, Cisco asserted that Apple was behind the efforts.

But while they flung legal accusations at each other, both companies faced significant pressure to settle. Apple's iPhone will be released in June and will be available to customers of the AT&T wireless network, which was formerly known as Cingular Wireless. If Apple had failed to settle with Cisco and subsequently lost the battle in court, it could have been liable for financial penalties for each unit that it sold.

But Cisco also faced a strong incentive to reach a deal.

"Cisco had to provide access to the trademark to Apple if it wanted to achieve the highest value for the name. There was no potential second buyer who would have equaled Apple's desire for the iPhone mark," said Alan Fisch, an intellectual-property lawyer at Kaye Scholer in Washington.

He added that Cisco also faced the reality that consumers associated the name more with Apple.

"The iPhone name has been informally synonymous with an anticipated Apple phone for years prior to the product's formal announcement," he said.

Analysts Say Apple Appears To Have Topped Cisco In IPhone Agreement (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, February 22, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Apple and Cisco Systems ended their feud over the iPhone name late Wednesday — and Apple appears to have won, tech analysts said.

The two Silicon Valley tech giants said they agreed to share rights to the name and end their legal battle over it.

Cisco — the longtime owner of the name — had earlier said it would share it with Apple as long as the electronics-maker made its iPhone compatible with other companies' products. The settlement addressed that concern, with the two companies pledging to "explore opportunities for interoperability in the areas of security, and consumer and (business) communications."

Other terms were confidential.

Since the full deal was not made public, it's hard to say for sure which company came out on top, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. But it sure looks like a "face-saving" agreement for Cisco, he says.

"It looks like Cisco caved," says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. The pledge of interoperability talks "looks like the typical promise that (Apple CEO) Steve Jobs has no intention of keeping," he says.

Cisco declined to comment beyond the official statement. Apple did not return phone calls.

The controversy over the iPhone name began last year, when Apple was developing a feature-packed cellphone. Long before it had an official name, Apple fans dubbed it the iPhone. That's because many Apple products begin with an "i", including the iPod music player and iTunes music store.

But there was a problem: Cisco, the world's largest network equipment maker, owned the iPhone trademark. It had originally been registered in 1996 by InfoGear, a networking company later acquired by Cisco. After the deal, Cisco adopted the name and introduced a line of iPhones, which it still sells today.

Cisco's iPhones are corporate office phones that place calls over an Internet connection instead of a traditional phone network. They do not compete directly with Apple's iPhone.

Lawyers from the two companies talked, but Apple broke off the discussion, Cisco said. Hours later, Apple announced its iPhone. Cisco sued in U.S. District Court.

At the time, Cisco said what it really wanted was for Apple to make the iPhone compatible with other products. Cisco advocates such standards because it sells the networking gear that connects them.

But now it appears that Apple will get the name without fully meeting Cisco's demands, Kay says.

"It looks like Cisco got shafted," he says. "Maybe there's something in the (undisclosed) terms, but I don't see how they're getting the good end of the deal."

Microsoft, AT&T Argue Software-Patent Case (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court, in the latest in a series of cases revisiting the application of patent protections in the high-tech era, heard arguments over where software fits within intellectual-property law.

In general, patents are only enforceable in the country that issues them. Thus, it is no infringement for a foreign firm to manufacture and sell a rival's U.S.-patented device abroad. To extend their monopolies overseas, U.S. companies must obtain a patent in each nation where they wish to protect their inventions. Under a special exception, though, it is an infringement to ship U.S.-made components of a patented device for assembly overseas.

AT&T Inc. holds a patent for voice-compression technology that makes it easier to transmit and store speech on personal computers and other devices. Microsoft Corp. concedes installing the technology on U.S.-built computers would infringe the patent. But it says it isn't a violation to ship a master disk of the software overseas, where it duplicates the software for installation on computers assembled in Germany, Belgium and other countries.

Microsoft argues the "component" is a physical disk containing the software, and it is free to duplicate it overseas, much as it could duplicate any other patented device overseas. AT&T contends the software itself is the component, regardless of the medium.

Lower courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, a panel that hears patent appeals, have agreed with AT&T. But the Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed the panel in decisions the justices concluded tipped too much power to patent holders. Critics, joined by the Bush administration, have argued Federal Circuit doctrine frustrates the aim of patent law by impeding innovation.

The high court has never held that software itself can be patented, and in oral arguments yesterday, the justices struggled to conceptualize what sort of product source code is. The importance could be seen in the advocates -- Microsoft and AT&T, which have reached a confidential deal whose terms depend on the case outcome. Each hired a former solicitor general to make its argument. The issue could have implications for other high-tech products that can easily be duplicated, such as bioengineered organisms.

Justice Anthony Kennedy called it "odd" that Microsoft would be the party contending that a computer disk, rather than the software, is product. "I mean, Microsoft doesn't say please buy our disc because it's the prettiest disc in the business," he said. "It says buy our program because the program means something," he said.

"But the program is nothing until made into a physical manifestation that can be read by the computer," replied former Bush Solicitor General Theodore Olson, representing Microsoft. "An idea or a principle...can't be patented. It has to be put together with a machine and made into a usable device." In this case, "the components that make the machines run that are produced abroad are not supplied from the United States."

Former Clinton Solicitor General Seth Waxman, representing AT&T, argued that the means of transmitting software code -- whether on a master disk shipped overseas and duplicated or through photons streamed through an undersea cable -- was irrelevant.

Justice David Souter said the source code might be better understood less as a product than a blueprint, which can be taken overseas and used to replicate a design. Under AT&T's view, he suggested, "any export of a blueprint," or simply sending a patent itself overseas, "would be a violation."

Court Takes On Software Patents (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

The name alone -- Microsoft v. AT&T -- conjures a galactic showdown. And the legal battle over a patent dispute that unfolded in the Supreme Court yesterday brought together elements of an epic.

Millions of dollars, at a minimum, ride on the outcome. The companies have hired two of Washington's most prominent Supreme Court gladiators, who together have argued nearly 100 cases before the high court, to present their cases. Some justices were on the edges of their seats as they absorbed a mind-bending blend of law and abstract thought, of computer-code poetry and patent-law banality.

The case even involves a "golden disk."

So what if that disk only contains Microsoft's Windows operating system?

"I hope we can continue calling it the golden disk," Justice Antonin Scalia said, when one justice blandly referred to it as the master disk. "It has a certain Scheherazade quality that really adds a lot of interest to this case."

At issue is whether Microsoft can be held liable for violating an AT&T patent on technology that condenses speech into computer code, similar to that found on Microsoft's Windows program.

Microsoft admitted it infringed the AT&T patent on computers sold domestically but contends that it is not liable for its programs installed by computer manufacturers overseas.

In 1984, Congress amended the patent law to forbid companies from shipping components of patented inventions overseas and having the parts assembled elsewhere in an attempt to skirt patent laws.

So in this case, justices are looking at whether digital software code can be considered a "component" of a patented invention and if so, whether it was "supplied" from the United States.

The case has sparked intense interest among U.S. technology firms, especially software developers, who worry they could be left increasingly vulnerable for infringing patents if the ruling goes against Microsoft.

"It would create an enormous base for damages," explained Stephen B. Maebius, a lawyer at Foley & Lardner specializing in intellectual-property rights. This could create an incentive for companies to move their research and development operations abroad, beyond the reach of U.S. courts, he said.

Even some of Microsoft's traditional competitors such as Yahoo and Amazon.com have joined to support the company's argument that overseas production should be governed by those countries' laws.

"At the time the statute was amended, global trade was far more limited and certainly did not include easily distributed computer and Internet transmissions," according to an analysts' report issued yesterday by Stifel Nicolaus, a brokerage firm specializing in technology and telecommunications.

The report quoted a lawyer for Yahoo as saying an unfavorable ruling for Microsoft could extend patent liability "to every corner of the world" where a copy of U.S.-developed software is used, including software downloaded over the Internet.

Seth P. Waxman, AT&T's lawyer and a former Clinton administration solicitor general, told justices they should uphold two lower courts' rulings in the company's favor.

Waxman said there is no dispute that Microsoft sends Windows code from the United States, via the "golden disk" or electronic transmission, to be installed in foreign computers.

"Those facts resolve this case," Waxman said. "Microsoft has 'supplied' a 'component' that when 'combined with hardware' enables the practice of AT&T's invention."

But Microsoft's lawyer, former Bush administration solicitor general Theodore B. Olson, countered that the code is copied outside the United States and installed on computers overseas. Thus, U.S. patent laws don't apply, he said.

"Those are computers that are sold abroad," Olson told the court. The components the law refers to, he said, were all manufactured overseas.

The justices wrestled with whether computer code would be patented or whether the code alone could be a component.

Waxman said code is "dynamic," in that it causes a computer to take action, while Olson said it was more like a blueprint. It can be used to produce exact copies that are not patent infringements, he said, like instructions for building a car or a mousetrap.

The court sought guidance from the current solicitor general's office, which largely supported Microsoft's position.

Assistant Solicitor General Daryl Joseffer said lower courts have interpreted U.S. patent law too broadly. And he said the government's view is that the component at issue would be the software with the code on it, not the code alone.

He compared it to a key and lock.

"A key has a series of ridges on it that enable it to open a lock," Joseffer said. "And that series of ridges can be denoted by a sequence of numbers, bigger numbers for deeper ridges. But the component is the key that actually turns the lock, not the abstract sequence of ridges on the key."

Eight justices will decide the case before July; Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is recused because he owns Microsoft stock.

9 States Sue Over Mercury Emissions (AP)

By John Flesher, AP Environmental Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - TRAVERSE CITY, Mich.-Michigan and eight other states sued the Bush administration Tuesday, saying the White House failed to adequately regulate emissions of mercury and other pollutants at cement plants.

The states contend a rule issued by the Environmental Protection Agency in December does not comply with the federal Clean Air Act.

Mercury comes from raw materials used to make cement - such as limestone, clay, sand and iron ore - and from fuels such as coal, which fires the kilns where the ingredients are baked at high temperatures.

In December, the EPA announced new limits on mercury and hydrocarbon emissions from cement kilns built after Dec. 2, 2005.

But for kilns built earlier, the agency imposes lesser requirements such as operating kilns properly to ensure complete combustion and removing kiln dust when it can no longer be recycled.

Critics say the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to limit mercury from all kilns, not just new ones.

DOJ_NMG_0135081

"I think they should have explored some of the options a bit more in detail than they did," said Vince Hellwig, air quality chief with the Michigan Department of Environmental Quality.

The lawsuit was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, where several environmental groups filed a separate action last week. The other eight states are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

EPA spokesman John Millett said the matter was under review and declined to comment further.

The agency says it has reduced mercury air emissions by 45 percent since 1990. It estimates the nation's 118 cement plants give off a combined 12,000 pounds of mercury a year, although some state regulators say the actual amount is higher. 2007-02-21T02:06:42Z

That 'Drought' In Southwest May Be Normal, Report Says (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Colorado River Basin is more prone to drought than had been thought, a panel of experts reported yesterday, and as the climate warms and the population in the region grows, pressure on water supplies will become greater.

The severe droughts the region suffered in the 1990s and early 2000s would not stand out in the record of the last few centuries, the panel said, and the future presents "a sobering prospect for elected officials and water managers." The panel said residents of the region should prepare for more frequent and more severe dry spells, and "costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-offs" in water use.

The data discussed in the report have been published before in scholarly journals and elsewhere. But Ernest T. Smerdon, a former dean of the College of Engineering and Mines at the University of Arizona, who led the panel, said its members hoped with this publication to pull the findings into a single document that ordinary people could understand.

Severe droughts will recur, Dr. Smerdon said, "and we better be prepared. That is the message." He spoke at a news conference yesterday in Las Vegas, where the report was made public.

The panel recommended an "action-oriented" study of water use patterns and demands, including drought planning, population projections and possible effects of transferring water to urban areas from agriculture, still the dominant consumer. Dialogue between policy makers and scientists who study water issues should be "a permanent fixture within the basin," it said.

The panel, organized by the National Research Council, the research arm of the National Academy of Science, noted that the water allocation agreement for the basin, the Colorado River Compact, was negotiated in 1922 based on river flow records dating to the 1890s, when gauging stations were established. The agreement assumed that the annual river flow was 16.4 million acre feet — enough to cover 16.4 million acres to a depth of one foot.

But for some time, the panel said, researchers have known that the early 20th century was unusually wet and that 15 million acre feet was a more accurate estimate of the flow. Recent studies based on tree rings put the figure lower still — as low as 13 million acre feet — and suggest that "drought episodes are a recurrent and integral feature of the region's climate."

Because trees grow more when it is wet, scientists use tree ring size as an indicator of water abundance. The report says the federal Bureau of Reclamation and other agencies requested the panel's review in the wake of the new findings.

Global warming is already making things worse, the experts said. For one thing, warmer weather means less precipitation in the form of snow, which is stored in the region's mountain snowpack. And the snowpack itself forms later and melts sooner each winter. As a result, the steady reliability of snowpack water storage is compromised. Also, warmer weather itself increases consumer, environmental and agricultural demands for water.

Rainfall patterns are difficult to predict, another panel member, Connie A. Woodhouse, a geographer at the University of Arizona, said at the news conference. But the report said it was probable that the region would experience less precipitation over all in a warmer world.

Cloud-seeding, water desalinization and improved underground water storage have yet to emerge as solutions, the report said, and even conservation, while helpful, "is no panacea," Dr. Smerdon said.

The report, which is available at www.nationalacademies.org, notes that the basin, 240,000 square miles in Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California and Mexico, has seen rapid population growth in recent decades. Until about 30 years ago, the panel wrote, growing demands for water were met through building dams and reservoirs. But today, the report says, "prospects for constructing additional large dams in the Colorado River basin have diminished."

Instead, "there is going to have to be some kind of reallocation of who gets the water," said Richard Seager, a climate expert at the Lamont Doherty Earth Observatory, who was not involved in the panel's report.

Dr. Seager, who studies the drought history of North America, said that it was "silly" to put golf courses in the region's desert areas and that hotels and other businesses were already installing water-conserving toilets and other fixtures.

But he added, referring to cattle and cotton raising, "Let's think whether it makes sense to have all this subsidized agriculture in the region, people who aren't even paying the full cost of the water they do use."

Report Warns Water Crisis Looming In Arid Southwest (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll, Usa Today

DENVER — The fast-growing states of the arid Southwest must plan for more severe droughts because of a regional warming trend that shows no signs of dissipating, says a new assessment of the Colorado River's water supply.

The report released Wednesday by the National Research Council says agriculture, which uses 80% of the West's water, is the likeliest target for shifting water supplies to growing urban areas. But the council, an agency of the National Academy of Sciences, cautions that "the availability of agricultural water is finite."

Rising population "will inevitably result in increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices" in sharing the Southwest's most precious natural resource, the report says.

The Colorado River Basin includes seven states: parts of California, the nation's biggest farm producer; Wyoming, and five of the 12 fastest-growing states: Nevada, Arizona, Colorado, Utah and New Mexico.

Until now, water needs have been met by selling or leasing water rights from farms to cities. As population growth demands more of a shrinking water supply, battles could erupt over dwindling farm land and rural landscapes drying up. Some farm production might have to shift elsewhere because of urban growth.

The report says climate reconstructions using tree-ring data and projections with computer models show extended droughts were common in the past and will be longer, more severe and more frequent in the future. "That's not a happy picture," says Ernest Smerdon, a former University of Arizona engineering dean and one of the report's authors.

"The preponderance of scientific evidence suggests that warmer future temperatures will reduce future Colorado River stream flow and water supplies," the report says. Technological measures such as water conservation, de-salting plants and underground storage can help but are not a long-term "panacea for coping" with less water and more people.

"If people think they can save enough water to meet all the future demands, our judgment (is) that it's not going to be that easy," Smerdon says. "(We) are not predicting doom. We are just saying that there are critical issues to be addressed."

The panel does not recommend specific steps except a regionwide study by federal agencies and the states of urban water use. An issue certain to arise is how much agricultural water could be shifted to cities. The report says farm water may be "the most important, and perhaps final, large reservoir of available water for urban use in the arid U.S. West."

Smerdon says the report aims "in plain language" to emphasize the need to act.

The states share the Colorado River under a compact adopted in 1922, an extraordinarily wet period of mountain snows and plentiful river flows. In drier decades since, demand has exceeded supply. A drought since 2000 has shrunk some reservoirs to 50% or less of normal.

Key Water Source Is Affected By Global Warming, Report Finds (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

Global warming will worsen drought and reduce flows on the Colorado River, a key water source for several western states, according to a report released Wednesday.

The study, prepared by a National Research Council committee, paints a sobering picture as the water needs of a rapidly expanding population test the limits of a river system strained by the effects of climate change.

"The basin is going to face increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices," said Ernest Smerdon, who chaired the panel of academicians and scientists who wrote the report. "Increasing demands are impeding the region's ability to cope with droughts and water shortages."

Such measures as conservation, desalination and water recycling would be helpful, the authors said, but wouldn't offer a panacea.

The report, which examined climate modeling and tree ring data, reaffirms a more pessimistic assessment of river hydrology that has emerged in recent years.

Scientists have concluded that the Colorado river system, which supplies water to 25 million people and several million acres of crop and ranch land, has been drier and more prone to severe drought than was the case in the early 20th century, when the river's flows were divvied among the seven basin states.

It turns out that period was unusually wet, prompting an overly generous estimate of how much water would be available to farms and cities. Ancient tree rings, which provide graphic evidence of past precipitation patterns, indicate it had been three centuries since the basin was last awash with that much water.

The most recent drought began in 2000 and has left the river's biggest reservoirs, Lake Mead and Lake Powell, roughly half empty.

"Now that is not a happy picture," Smerdon said. "What we want people to do is to be aware of these scientific facts and take them into account as they plan for development, for drought-contingency plans."

Global warming will only make matters worse, said Connie Woodhouse, a University of Arizona associate professor of geography who helped write the report. "It's going to enhance the droughts" that are part of the natural climate cycle.

Although the river's flows returned to normal in 2005 after five years of dramatic lows, they fell again last year. Federal scientists say that if they remain below average or even average, Lake Mead might never completely refill.

The study, which was sponsored by the National Academies, the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation and several water agencies, notes that temperatures have risen in the western United States over the past century and are expected to keep climbing.

"All of the models are predicting very significant warming in the future," said Smerdon, a former engineering college dean at the University of Arizona in Tucson.

The report acknowledges some uncertainty over whether climate change would alter the amount of precipitation in the basin. But as the mercury rises, water demands would increase. There would be more evaporation from croplands and reservoirs, and wild land vegetation would suck more moisture from the soil, reducing runoff.

"I think a reasonably savvy person would have to say you're going to see less water in that river," said Brad Udall, director of Western Water Assessment at the University of Colorado in Boulder, who was not a member of the report committee. "The real question is how much less. Is it 5 percent less or is it 40 percent less and by when?"

The U.S. Department of Interior, which oversees the Colorado's management, is reviewing a drought plan the states put together last year. Because California holds some of the most senior rights to the river, Arizona, Nevada and Mexico would experience cuts in deliveries before California, said Roger Patterson, assistant general manager of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California.

The river is a major source for Metropolitan, Southern California's major urban water supplier. Last year about 30 percent of the agency's water deliveries came from the Colorado, which provides about 10 percent of California's overall urban and agricultural supplies.

Most of the state's river allotment -- the biggest in the system -- goes to the Imperial Irrigation District, which distributes water to the croplands of the Imperial Valley, one of the nation's biggest lettuce producers.

Noting that farms remain the dominant water user in the Colorado basin, the report called agricultural water "the most important and perhaps final large reservoir of available water for urban use in the arid U.S. West."

But that supply is also finite, the authors emphasized, and shifting water from farm to city could have negative impacts. Transfers could hurt rural economies, lower food production and rob wildlife of leaking irrigation water that nourishes important habitat.

In Far North, Peril And Promise (WP)

Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Great Forests Hold Fateful Role in Climate Change

PINE FALLS, Manitoba -- Here on the edge of the silent and frozen northern tier of the Earth, the fate of the world's climate is buried beneath the snow and locked in the still limbs of aspen trees.

Nearly half of the carbon that exists on land is contained in the sweeping boreal forests, which gird the Earth in the northern reaches of Canada, Alaska, Scandinavia and Russia. Scientists now fear that the steady rise in the temperature of the atmosphere and the increasing human activity in those lands are releasing that carbon, a process that could trigger a vicious cycle of even more warming.

The prospect of the land itself accelerating climate change staggers scientists, as well as woodsmen such as Bob Austman, who stopped recently in a quiet stand of birch on the edge of the boreal forest to examine a jack rabbit's tracks.

"There are big forces out there," he said succinctly.

Those forces, which scientists are only starting to understand, could free vast stores of carbon and methane that have been collecting since the last ice age in the frozen tundra and northern forests. Their release would push the world's climate toward a heat spiral that would raise ocean levels, spawn fierce storms and scorch farmlands, scientists believe.

But the land is impartial. It could also be enlisted to help abate global warming, as both a storehouse for man-made carbon dioxide and a natural sponge for greenhouse gases. Policymakers are considering changes to protect and expand the forested areas that store carbon; outside the boreal forest, they are experimenting with techniques to bury man-made carbon dioxide in underground vaults and porous seams.

"The world is both victim of climate change and a possible solution to it," said Stewart Elgie, associate director of the Institute of the Environment at the University of Ottawa.

Carbon is freed from the land in numerous ways. Permafrost melting because of warmer weather exposes peat, deadwood and buried pine needles to decay, freeing the carbon they contain. Fires, raging through forests more often because of hotter and drier weather, send wood -- and its carbon -- up in smoke. Insects thriving in milder winters girdle trees and send them to rot on the forest floor. Miners and oilmen build roads that expose the earth and warm the land, and loggers cut down old forests and replace them with young ones that will take decades of growth to absorb and store the same amount of carbon.

As the released carbon rises, it adds to the belt of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere, trapping even more heat, which causes more warming. Scientists call it a "feedback loop." Others have a more ominous term: the carbon time bomb.Risk Poorly Understood

"We are taking risks with a system we don't understand that is absolutely loaded with carbon," said Steven Kallick, a Seattle-based expert on the boreal forests for the Pew Charitable Trusts. "The impact could be enormous."

Scientists acknowledge they are not certain how the carbon time bomb will explode, or when. Many of the consequences of global warming that experts once predicted would take centuries are occurring in decades, such as the melting of the world's glaciers and ice caps. But other changes might be more gradual.

"With permafrost, it may take longer for change to get moving. But it may keep moving, even if we get our emissions under control," said Antoni Lewkowicz, a professor of geography at the University of Ottawa. "It's like a big boulder. Once you get it moving, it won't stop."

Brian Amiro, head of the department of soil science at the University of Manitoba, is part of a research team involved in a project called Fluxnet. The researchers have erected more than 400 towers throughout the world, outfitted with instruments to measure the exchange of carbon between earth and air. The boreal forest, sometimes called "the lungs of the world," breathes in more carbon in years when the forests grow, and loses more carbon in years of bad forest fires, drought or insect infestation.

Lately, there has been a string of bad years. The number of forest fires in Canada doubled in the 1980s and '90s from the previous two decades, and some scientific models indicate they will double again this century, Amiro said. Logging, mining and oil exploration have carved roads deeper into the forests. Temperatures have risen faster toward the north -- by as much as five degrees since the 1950s -- than in more temperate zones.

"The environmental triggers are going to become much more significant," said Faisal Moola, director of science at the David Suzuki Foundation, a Vancouver-based environmental organization.

There are mixed views about whether the process can be stopped. The levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere -- the highest in at least 420,000 years -- mean average temperatures will continue to rise, accelerating the thawing.

But humanity's footprint could be changed. Development, mining and logging account for 25 percent of the carbon loss in forests, Elgie said. Logging releases almost twice as much carbon dioxide each year as all the passenger vehicles in Canada, he said.Credits for Preservation

Here in Pine Falls, a town of 1,400 about 80 miles northeast of Winnipeg, the giant Tembec pulp mill billows steam and smoke into the crystalline sky. The 1920s-era mill makes newsprint from spruce and pine trees, and Vince Keenan, a forester for the company, said Tembec has responded to calls for change. It has set aside 12 percent of its 2 million-acre logging forest here, and up to one-fourth of its product is now made from recycled paper. Changes in mill practices have reduced greenhouse gas emissions by nearly 50 percent since 1990, he said.

But a broader step would be to set aside vast areas of the forest now designated for mining or logging and preserve them. This could be done by setting up a system of "carbon credits," in which, for example, an industrial plant would offset its pollution by paying money to preserve land in the forest that could store an equal amount of carbon.

"Right now, the only way to make money in the boreal forest is to cut trees down," Elgie said. "If you had carbon credits, you would be able to make money by keeping the trees up and storing carbon."

That system appeals to some native Indian groups, now torn between the desire to keep their traditional lands and the need for income from logging or mining.

"Preserving the land is important to us," said Carl Smith, an elder of the Brokenhead Ojibway First Nation on the Winnipeg River near Pine Falls. "Once the land is gone, you're gone."

Smith also is president of the Manitoba Model Forest, a group set up 15 years ago to balance the competing views of how the forest here should be used. One of its goals is teaching schoolchildren about the forest, a job that falls to Bob Austman, the woodsman, whose family has lived in and on the boreal forests of Manitoba for three generations.

He sees nothing but beauty here. As he and Brian Kotak, an environmental scientist, tramped in minus-10-degree cold through a stand of birch near the Winnipeg River recently, it seemed hard to see the Earth as a potential danger.

"The dilemma," Austman said, "is that we live on a planet with 6 billion people. This land is under increasing pressure."Turning a Minus Into a Plus

South of the great swath of forest in central Canada, the wrinkles of the land smooth out, stretching toward a straight horizon. The Great Plains are frozen and still in winter. But in Weyburn, 70 miles southeast of Saskatchewan's capital, Regina, pumps bob relentlessly amid the snowy wheat fields, sucking crude oil from a mile underground like a host of mechanical mosquitoes.

What goes back into the ground here heartens some environmentalists. The giant EnCana oil and gas company, which operates more than 700 oil pumps in this field, pumps carbon dioxide deep down to drive more oil out of the porous rocks.

Almost inadvertently, the company has become the world's largest working example of carbon storage, or sequestration, a technique being hailed by international experts as one tool to reduce greenhouse gases. Darcy Cretin, operations superintendent at the EnCana plant, is slightly amused by the environmental scientists who have flocked here to see the maze of pipes, pumps, valves and sensors planted in the prairie.

"We have to keep explaining we are doing this to make more oil," he said. "The carbon sequestration is an extra."

When the oil brought up at Weyburn dwindled after 40 years of pumping, EnCana struck a deal with the Dakota Gasification Co. It owns a plant in Beulah, N.D., that converts coal to natural gas. Combustion at the gasification plant makes carbon dioxide, which was being vented into the air. EnCana offered to buy the gas, and in 1999 the U.S. company built a 200-mile pipeline into Canada. The foot-wide pipe emerges from its underground route at a chain-link fence on the edge of EnCana's property.

The company pumps the carbon dioxide under high pressure into the oil field. The gas acts as a kind of solvent, driving the oil out of porous rock. The greenhouse gas remains underground, leaving buried nearly 5,000 tons a day that would otherwise have gone into the atmosphere.

Experts believe this scheme of carbon storage could be used more widely in cases where the gas could be easily collected at a single point and moved by pipeline to a storage field. The approach would not work where the carbon dioxide could not be collected easily, such as from the tailpipes of moving cars. But nearly 40 percent of the carbon dioxide released to the air comes from big power plants or industrial areas, where the gas could be captured.

A committee of more than 100 experts from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change concluded in 2005 that carbon sequestration has "considerable potential" to help reduce greenhouse gases, and a lengthy study at Weyburn by the International Energy Agency found virtually no leakage. The British Columbia government this month announced that all its coal-fired electric plants will be required to utilize carbon sequestration to eliminate greenhouse gas emissions.

For oilmen such as Cretin, the prospect of helping reduce a greenhouse gas by pumping it underground seems a natural fit.

"This is pretty easy," he said. "It's basic stuff for us."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Is Sued Over Position On Marijuana (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 21 — Frustrated by government policy and inaction, a group of advocates for medical marijuana sued two federal health agencies on Wednesday over the assertion that smoking it has no medical benefit.

The group, Americans for Safe Access, a nonprofit organization based in Oakland, filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court, challenging the government's position that marijuana, "has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States."

In its lawsuit, the group contends that federal regulators have publicly issued "false and misleading statements" about the medical benefits of marijuana.

The lawsuit, which named the Department of Health and Human Services and the Food and Drug Administration, seeks a court order to retract and correct statements that the group called, "incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws."

A lawyer for the medical marijuana group, Joseph Elford, said the lawsuit was filed now because administrative avenues had been exhausted and because of mounting scientific and anecdotal evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Elford said a recent study by the Clinical Research Center at San Francisco General Hospital, which was approved by the F.D.A. and other federal agencies, found that smoking marijuana relieved pain and certain symptoms of H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS.

A spokeswoman for the health department said Wednesday in a telephone interview that "the agency does not comment on litigation as a general policy."

The spokeswoman, Christina Pearson, said the agency stood by its publicly stated position and pointed to an April 20, 2006, statement. In that advisory, which Ms. Pearson said was current, the federal government asserts that "there is currently sound evidence that smoked marijuana is harmful."

It goes on to say that "no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana," which is not an approved drug.

Group Sues U.S. Over Medical Marijuana Claims (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - OAKLAND, California-Armed with a new study that shows smoking marijuana eased pain in some HIV patients, medical marijuana advocates sued the U.S. government Wednesday over its claim that the drug has no accepted medical benefits.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court by Americans for Safe Access accuses the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services of engaging in "arbitrary and unlawful behavior" that prevents "sick and dying persons from seeking to obtain medicine that could provide them needed, and often lifesaving relief."

The group wants a judge to force the department and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to stop giving out information that casts doubt on the efficacy of marijuana in treating various illnesses.

"The FDA position on medical cannabis is incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws requiring the government to base policy on sound science," Joe Elford, chief counsel for the group, said in a statement.

California is one of 11 states where marijuana use is legal for people with a doctor's recommendation, but because the U.S. government does not recognize the drug's medical benefits, patients can still be arrested and prosecuted by federal authorities.

Last week, researchers from the University of California, San Francisco reported in the journal Neurology that a test involving 50 HIV patients showed that those who smoked pot experienced much less pain than those given placebos.

Americans for Safe Access said in the lawsuit that Health and Human Services has rejected its requests to retract the assertion that cannabis "has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States," a position the agency has advertised since 2000.

The Department of Health and Human Services did not immediately have a response to the lawsuit.

Medical Pot Advocates Sue Feds Over False Info (SMCT)

San Mateo County Times, February 21, 2007

Medical marijuana advocates have sued the federal Department of Health and Human Services, accusing it of lying to the nation about the drug's lack of accepted medical use despite scientific studies showing its efficacy.

The lawsuit, filed today in federal court in Oakland, comes a week after the release of a controlled, clinical University of California, San Francisco study showing HIV patients who smoked marijuana found relief from chronic foot pain.

"We are asking the courts to weigh in on the science ... and force the government to stop making false statements about medical cannabis," said Steph Sherer, executive director of Americans for Safe Access.

ASA attorney Joe Elford said the lawsuit is brought under the federal Administrative Procedure Act, which provides for judicial review and reversal of any agency action found to be arbitrary and capricious.

ASA in October 2004 had petitioned the Department of Health and Human Services and its subordinate Food and Drug Administration under the Data Quality Act, a 2000 law requiring information circulated by federal agencies to be fair, objective and meet certain quality guidelines. That law lets citizens challenge government information believed to be inaccurate or based on bad data; ASA's petition claimed the government has ignored scientific studies and medical consensus on marijuana's efficacy as medicine.

HHS denied the petition in 2005 and denied an appeal in July 2006. Those decisions are arbitrary and capricious, Elford said, and so Americans for Safe Access has been biding its time ever since to sue.

"We aimed to file this lawsuit at a time when the country was talking about the science," Sherer said, but her group doesn't think it even needs the newly released UCSF study to bolster its case; it believed the science was solid enough when it petitioned HHS in 2004.

"The federal government has had enough information in front of it for years to break the gridlock on this issue," she said. "We're suing to demand that the FDA stop holding science hostage to politics."

Sherer is one of four medical-marijuana users used as examples in the lawsuit. She suffered a neck injury in 2000 and later developed kidney problems from the ibuprofen and other painkillers she'd been prescribed. The government told her marijuana had no medical use, so she was delayed in seeking a doctor's advice to the contrary and finding relief, she says.

California voters approved medical use of marijuana by passing Proposition 215 in 1996, but federal law still bans the drug's cultivation, possession and use. Despite years of lobbying by advocates, it remains on the nation's list of most-restricted drugs -- along with substances such as heroin and LSD -- without accepted medical use. And despite a 1999 federal Institute of Medicine study urging more research, studies like UCSF's still face enormous obstacles and so remain rare.

Medical marijuana patients Angel Raich of Oakland and Diane Monson of Oroville sued federal law enforcement officials in 2002, claiming the federal government lacks authority to prosecute California's patients and providers. The U.S. Supreme Court in June 2005 ruled 6-3 to uphold federal prosecutions, finding that even marijuana grown in back yards for personal medical use can affect or contribute to the illegal interstate marijuana market and so is within Congress' constitutional reach.

But the court, in a footnote, did "acknowledge that evidence proffered by respondents in this case regarding the effective medical uses for marijuana, if found credible after trial, would cast serious doubt on the accuracy of the findings that require marijuana to be listed" among the most-restricted drugs.

Medical Pot ID Card Cost To Skyrocket (SMDJ)

San Mateo Daily Journal, February 22, 2007

State fee hikes due to a shortfall of clients for California's medical marijuana identification cards is trickling down to local programs, including San Mateo County which plans to nearly quadruple the cost by next month.

At its meeting Feb. 27, the Board of Supervisors plan to increase fees from $45 to $174. Medi-Cal beneficiaries will still receive a 50 percent discount.

The county only received word from the state Department of Health Services about the fee increase in January, said Beverly Thames, the county health department spokeswoman.

The change is effective March 1 but participants will only feel the pinch as their cards expire annually.

The ID program must be funded entirely by fees rather than taxpayer dollars at both the state and county level. The state is changing its portion of the fees collected from $13 to $142 per card. The county charges its own fee for processing and verification.

Each county participating in the ID program is setting its own fees but, coupled with the state mandate, the totals are way past $100. Other jurisdictions, such as Lake County, are mulling pulling out of the state program altogether rather than raise their prices.

The cards are theoretically used to reduce the chance a legal marijuana user is arrested. Officials believe a state-issued card is more likely to be accepted by law enforcement than a doctor's note. Medicinal marijuana users are required to have the cards but the county is required by state law to provide them.

San Mateo County only charges a minimum fee to cover its administrative costs, Thames said.

In 2006, San Mateo County issued 510 cards compared to the approximately 3,000 the state expected.

The county, like others in the state, began offering the cards after 56 percent of voters passed Proposition 215, or the Compassionate Use Act. The law protects users who have a recommendation from a licensed physician but does not give guidelines for the amount of marijuana they can have in their possession.

In anticipation of a large client base, the state used a $1 million loan for a ID database and computer system. With fewer users than the 15,000 expected, the administrative costs passed on to each user is running higher.

The statewide fee increase is opposed by the Drug Policy Alliance, Americans for Safe Access, the Marijuana Policy Project and Safe Access Now. The groups believe, according to the DPA Web site, that "medical marijuana patients are already faced with excessive health care costs, and this increase would put the ID card program out of reach for many."

The DPA argues if more than 24 of the state's 58 counties — particularly Los Angeles County — join the program, the increase in users will drop the per-card cost significantly.

Long-Term Marijuana Use May Impair Lung Function (HDN)

HealthDay News), February 22, 2007

(HealthDay News) - People who smoke marijuana for a long time face many of the same kinds of respiratory problems - such as phlegm, coughing and wheezing - as long-term cigarette smokers, say researchers at the Yale School of Medicine.

They reviewed previous studies from 1966 to 2005 that examined the association between marijuana and pulmonary function and respiratory complications. Some of the studies found a link between short-term marijuana use and relaxation and opening of the air passages.

However, other studies identified an association between long-term marijuana use and increased risk of respiratory symptoms, suggestive of obstructive lung disease. The data did not show an association between long-term marijuana smoking and airflow obstruction (emphysema), the Yale researchers said.

Their study is published in the current issue of the journal Archives of Internal Medicine.

There were several common kinds of limitations in the studies they reviewed, the Yale researchers noted. These included: inadequate control of the complicating effect of tobacco smoking; lack of standardized measures for the amount or duration of marijuana use; and lack of standardized measures of the outcomes that were evaluated.

"Despite these limitations, clinicians should advise their patients of the potential negative impact of marijuana smoking on overall lung health," study first author Dr. Jeanette M. Tetrault, ambulatory care fellow at Yale School of Medicine and the Department of Veterans Affairs Connecticut Healthcare System, said in a prepared statement.

Federal Agents Crack Down On Web Pharmacies (NBC)

NBC News, February 22, 2007

Buying prescription drugs over the Internet has become standard operating procedure for many Americans who used to visit the neighborhood pharmacy. And while many Internet pharmacies are 100-percent legitimate, hundreds of others are not and are seen by law enforcement as a a dangerous problem. Including 15 in Florida whose licenses have been suspended in recent weeks by federal authorities.

NBC's Mark Potter was on a raid of one of these alleged pill mills.

TAMPA, Fla. — At a drug store near Tampa, agents and investigators from the Drug Enforcement Agency swoop in to suspend the license of an Internet pharmacy for allegedly selling painkillers over the Web illegally. In this case, boxes and boxes of Hydrocodone.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"This is probably destined for a customer who's ordered it online somewhere across the country," says DEA Investigator Chris Grush.

Authorities say thousands of Web sites and hundreds of illegal Internet pharmacies have sprung up nationwide, cutting corners on medical exams and charging six to 10 times the normal price for prescription drugs that are widely abused.

"They hide behind their profession to push these drugs out simply to make money," says DEA Special Agent in Charge Mark Trouville.

The big concern is that many online pharmacies use doctors to write prescriptions for dangerous and addictive drugs for people they have never met. Federal agents say it's not uncommon for Internet buyers to simply fill out a brief medical questionnaire.

"We have a doctor, a situation where a doctor was sitting in front of a computer screen and writing hundreds and hundreds of prescriptions a day," says Trouville.

One man says he used illegal Internet pharmacies to fuel his addiction to Xanax and Valium.

"I used my wife's name, and I used my mother's name, and I put them all on my credit card," said the man who wished to remain anonymous.

Six years ago, 18-year-old Ryan Haight died from an overdose of drugs bought online. In 2004 his mother testified before the U.S. Senate in support of a proposed federal law tightening controls on Internet pharmacies.

DOJ_NMG_0135090

That bill never passed.

"I'm very disappointed, very disappointed this bill has not passed," says Francine Haight, who founded the organization RyansCause.org. "Kids are still dying; kids are still getting drugs on the Internet."

A difficult balance between medical standards and modern technology, as authorities fear electronic drug trafficking.

Colombians Convicted On Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

A high-ranking female member of a left-wing Colombian terrorist organization has been convicted with two others in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on drug charges.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said Nayibe Rojas Valderama, also known as "Sonia," was convicted, along with co-defendants Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo, on charges of conspiring to import cocaine into the United States and conspiring to manufacture and distribute cocaine -- knowing it would be unlawfully imported into the United States.

The convictions were handed down Tuesday by a federal jury after four days of deliberation.

Mr. McNulty said the convictions represented "a significant victory" against the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC), which he described as one of the most dangerous narcoterrorist organizations in Colombia.

Valderama has been identified by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as the finance officer of the 14th Front of FARC and is the highest-ranking member of the group to be convicted in the United States. She was extradited from Colombia to the United States in March 2005 to stand trial on the U.S. charges.

Sentencing in the case is scheduled for May 7. The three each face a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison or a term of years as determined by the court.

"The FARC is a double evil -- they poison the blood of our people with their drugs and spill the blood of their own with guns and machetes bought with drug profits," U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration boss Karen P. Tandy said.

"As a financial officer for the guerrilla group, Sonia Valderama was directly responsible for converting drug money to blood money -- that is, overseeing the conversion of millions of dollars of cocaine profits from cash to weapons, uniforms and ammunition to arm the most violent terrorists in this hemisphere," Mrs. Tandy said.

Evidence presented at trial showed that Valderama oversaw all aspects of the purchasing and production of cocaine in the 14th Front territory, and collected all of the proceeds from the sale of cocaine for the 14th Front. The front is a group of about 250 militants that operates in the southern part of the country.

Prosecutors Ron McNeil, Stephen May and James Faulkner said Celis arranged for the purchase of large quantities of cocaine from Valderama and the 14th Front, and coordinated the shipment of cocaine from Colombia to Panama, and from Panama into the United States.

The prosecutors said Celis conspired with Valderama and Giraldo to purchase more than 11,000 pounds of cocaine for shipment to the United States.

They also said Giraldo introduced Celis to the 14th Front for the purpose of purchasing cocaine, worked with Valderama to purchase and transport cocaine, brought equipment for the 14th Front's cocaine-production operation, and assisted Valderama in all aspects of cocaine production and sale.

The FARC controls large portions of Colombia and finances its violent conflict with the Colombian government by engaging in drug trafficking, augmented by other means such as kidnapping and extortion.

Rebel Leader Convicted On Drug Charges by U.S.

A federal jury in Washington yesterday convicted a Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of leftist guerrillas on drug conspiracy charges.

DOJ_NMG_0135091

Nayibe Rojas is the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- FARC, in its Spanish initials -- whom a U.S. federal court has convicted of drug-running, although the U.S. and Colombian governments long have alleged that FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

Prosecutors cast Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a gun-toting senior FARC official who gathered coca base from farmers and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

The jury also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo were not members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired on the drug deal. The three face prison terms of up to 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Illegals Bill Near Complete (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Senators and lobbyists are putting the final touches on a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes an easier citizenship path for illegal aliens and weaker enforcement provisions than were in the highly criticized legislation that the Senate approved last year.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who ardently supports citizenship rights for illegals, will introduce the bill as early as next week, according to Senate sources knowledgeable about the negotiations. If the Senate Judiciary Committee can make quick work of the bill, it could be ready for floor action in April.

Mr. Kennedy drafted this year's bill with help from Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and outside lobbyists. Mr. McCain and the outside groups share Mr. Kennedy's support for increased immigration and leniency for illegals already in the country.

Among the most active participants have been the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition (EWIC) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Both groups support giving current illegals a path to citizenship and increasing the flow of foreign workers into the country.

"It's good for the country," EWIC immigration lawyer Laura Reiff said of Mr. Kennedy's bill.

In particular, EWIC and the chamber have taken a leading role in drafting the section of the bill dealing with work-site enforcement, Senate staffers say. Lobbyists in both organizations have shuttled around Capitol Hill drafts of those provisions, which are supposed to impose sanctions on businesses that hire illegal aliens, according to internal e-mails obtained by The Washington Times.

"That's putting the fox in charge of the henhouse," one Senate lawyer said about the pro-business chamber's involvement in drafting the punishment of employers.

One of those e-mails obtained by The Times invited Democratic immigration staffers to a briefing in early January with "key stakeholders" to discuss workplace-enforcement provisions. The invitation listed six such "stakeholders," including the chamber and EWIC. The other groups attending the meeting, according to the e-mail, were the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Immigration Law Center, the National Council of La Raza and the Service Employees International Union.

Not included in that meeting or any of the early meetings, according to several Senate aides, were key Republican senators or their staff who crossed the aisle last year to support "comprehensive" immigration reform that most Republicans considered a form of amnesty.

"We have been held out of any discussions," said Sen. Sam Brownback, one of those who supported last year's major immigration bill. "Our staffs have asked to be involved, but they were kept out."

Even Sen. Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who as chairman of the Judiciary Committee last year ushered the immigration bill through the Senate, has been left out of the process of drafting the bill.

Mr. Specter said yesterday that he and Mr. Kennedy have discussed the need to get a bill done this year but not any details. Mr. Specter has twice complained to Mr. Kennedy, most recently at a meeting last week, that the Republican senator's staff had been left out of negotiations.

"I raised the issue again, and a Kennedy staffer said there was nothing in writing" as legislation, he said. "Neither my staff nor I have seen any draft."

Last week, aides and Republicans said, Mr. Specter, Mr. Brownback and others were invited to a meeting where they got their first briefing on the nearly completed bill. Other Republicans invited included Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Mel Martinez of Florida.

Laura Capps, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy, said he has been working with "many senators and members of Congress to draft the new bill."

"The bipartisan coalition behind the bill remains strong and intact."

The one Republican who all agree has been part of the negotiations from the start is Mr. McCain, who is running for his party's presidential nomination. This worries Republicans who say that Mr. McCain is the last Republican they want representing their interests in negotiations with Mr. Kennedy over immigration legislation.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Kennedy have long embraced the same goal of giving illegal aliens a direct path to U.S. citizenship despite having broken laws to get here in the first place. Both men also denounce the view held by most Republicans that the federal government should first secure the border with Mexico and begin enforcing current laws before addressing other immigration issues such as what to do with the more than 10 million to 12 million aliens already here.

Who has been in and out of negotiations this year signals to Republicans that Mr. Kennedy will introduce a bill that more resembles the original McCain-Kennedy bill than the compromise that was ultimately approved last year.

As much as conservatives dislike last year's compromise bill, they consider it some improvement over the original bill because it lowered the number of new foreign workers permitted into the country each year and slightly narrowed the pool of illegals who would be granted "amnesty."

"If it's back to the old version without the changes we made last year, I don't think I could support that," Mr. Brownback said.

Ms. Capps said she expects Mr. Kennedy to introduce his bill "in the next few weeks."

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is "committed to getting something done this year," his spokesman said.

Along US-Mexico Border, Not Enough Hands For The Harvest (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

The nature of farming is that it comes with many unknowns: weather, pests, competition from abroad, effectiveness of new machinery. Rick Rademacher isn't clear why the labor pool needs to be another one – especially since so many day laborers from Mexico would be eager to work in his lettuce fields here in the midst of America's "winter salad bowl."

DOJ_NMG_0135093

Lifting a calloused hand to shade his eyes from the sun's glare, Mr. Rademacher gazes over a 40-acre field where nearly 40 migrant workers pluck or wrap or pack the leafy green heads. With about six weeks to go in this season's harvest, the fourth-generation grower is crossing his fingers and hoping he'll have enough workers to bring the crops in.

"We struggle daily," he says. "We just hope every day that we can fill the orders."

Empty stations on the harvest lines are more common this year throughout this swath of Arizona farm country, says Rademacher, who serves as president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association. The reasons are many: a 40,000-person limit on the number of foreign guest workers allowed into the US, tighter borders that are discouraging illegal crossings, and rising demand for day laborers in other industries, such as higher-paying construction work.

The shortage of farm workers has been driving wages higher. Last season, base pay for day laborers working in this area was $6.50 an hour. Now it's $8.50. Rademacher says it may go higher because farmers here can't attract enough employees.

He'd like to see an expanded guest-worker program to ease the labor crunch here, just five miles from the border. It would ensure that he can get his crop in – and sell it to supermarkets at a price that is competitive with prices of vegetables from overseas.

Congress is considering such a move, but not in time to reduce this season's uncertainty.

Because this 41,000-acre patch of the Southwest produces 95 percent of the nation's home-grown winter lettuce and 90 percent of its winter vegetables, its labor issues have ramifications far beyond these leafy fields.

A key one is how much consumers must pay for fresh greens. A 10 percent increase in labor costs on the farm results in a 6 percent jump in the price of a head of lettuce, according to research by Albert Kagan, a professor at Arizona State University who works on the National Food and Agricultural Policy Project (NFAPP), which is based at the school. He has run economic models for other labor-intensive produce as well, such as strawberries and table grapes, with similar results.

The NFAPP has also examined how farm labor costs at home affect the market for farm imports. If it costs 10 percent more to produce a US-grown head of lettuce, for example, lettuce imports are likely to increase by 3 percent, according to Dr. Kagan's research.

The math puts farmers like Rademacher in a bind.

"We have to offer more to get the workers, but we try to keep our costs in line, too," he says. "If we set the price [of vegetables] too high, one of our competitors will get the business, or the [super]markets will get the vegetables from out of the country."

Not all of Rademacher's harvest machines are fully staffed, despite the higher pay. Octavio Felix, a foreman overseeing the crews on two machines, sees one solution.

"Lots of people [in Mexico] would come to work if they could get permits," says the US citizen, who returns each weekend to San Luis Río Colorado, the town across the Mexico border where his grandparents still live.

The work here is labor-intensive, though the harvest machines, at about $250,000 a pop, have eliminated most of the heavy lifting. Both of the machines Mr. Felix supervises are fully staffed with 38 migrant workers. Two others at the far end of the field have only half that number.

Down the road, at gigantic broccoli and celery patches, two more harvest machines are running with crews that are half-staffed.

There are 11,130 documented migrant workers in Arizona and about 84,270 in California, according to figures from the Pew Hispanic Center. But there are also 9,870 undocumented farm workers in Arizona and 74,730 in California.

Identical bills known as AgJOBS, now wending their ways through committees in the Senate and House of Representatives, may eventually alleviate some farm-labor problems. The legislation would confer "blue-card status" on any foreign worker who meets four requirements: 1) performed agricultural work in the US for at least 863 hours, or 150 workdays, during the 24-month period ending Dec. 31, 2006; 2) applied for blue-card status during the 18-month application period (which would begin seven months from the day the law is enacted); 3) is otherwise admissible to the US; and 4) has not been convicted of any felony or a misdemeanor that involved bodily injury, threat of serious bodily injury, or harm to property in excess of $500.

These bills aren't a panacea for America's illegal immigration problem, but they represent a step in the right direction, growers say.

"Agriculture has ... made its case for sensible immigration reform which would result in a legal, stable workforce for the industry," said Tom Nassif, president and CEO of the Western Growers Association in a Jan. 10 statement. "We now have an opportunity to proceed with reform which will be beneficial for farmers, workers, enforcement officials, and the entire nation," he said of the AgJOBS legislation.

"This country has got to get a successful immigration policy," Rademacher says. "We have work for people in Mexico who want work."

2 Groups Compare Immigrant Detention Centers To Prisons (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — Two advocacy groups for refugees said on Wednesday that the Bush administration routinely detained immigrant families in prisonlike housing that separated young children from their parents and sometimes provided inadequate medical care, food and educational opportunities, despite calls from Congress to house such families in "nonpenal, homelike environments."

The Department of Homeland Security, which allowed the advocacy groups to visit the two detention centers that house immigrant families, has already corrected several problems identified by the groups. The two groups, the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Services, are expected to release their report on Thursday.

But department officials, who said they were still reviewing the report, vigorously defended the quality of services provided by the 512-bed T. Don Hutto Residential Center, which opened last year in Texas, and the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, which houses about 80 families in Pennsylvania. The centers hold immigrants and asylum seekers awaiting the outcomes of their cases.

"They adhere to the highest standards," said Marc Raimondi, a department spokesman.

The complaints come one month after a federal inspection of 5 of the nation's 325 immigrant detention centers found that most did not provide timely and responsive health care and sometimes failed to comply with the government's standards of disciplining, classifying and housing detainees. Officials of the Homeland Security Department say the study was too small to be representative.

The new report found that women at the Hutto center received inadequate prenatal care and that children received only one hour of schooling a day. At both centers, children as young as 6 were separated from their parents, and separation of families and the threats of separation were used as disciplinary tools.

The study praised the Berks center for providing adequate educational opportunities and allowing families to participate in field trips and outdoor recreation time. But it says both centers are modeled on prisons, even though they hold people who are fleeing persecution or stand accused of violating civil immigration laws, not criminal codes.

"The prisonlike conditions, this form of detention, is not necessary," said Michelle Brané, who heads the detention and asylum program at the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children.

"We release criminals," said Ms. Brané, pointing to parole and monitored supervision programs. "Yet for immigrants in civil proceedings, they have not explored those options. And these are families with children."

Mr. Raimondi said the family detention system was expanded to help end the routine practice of releasing immigrant families caught sneaking across the border. Smugglers began taking advantage of the loophole and pairing children with unrelated adults in hopes of ensuring their release, officials say. Some children were abandoned or abused. Mr. Raimondi said the centers provided a safe place for families and "serve as a deterrent to alien smugglers who needlessly endanger children's lives."

Ms. Brané said officials of the Homeland Security Department had addressed some of her concerns.

The Hutto center contracted with a local clinic to provide medical care to pregnant women. It also expanded the educational program to four hours a day from one.

Detention Facility For Immigrants Criticized (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

TAYLOR, Tex. -- The day Mustafa Elmi turned 3 years old he had to report to his cell three times for headcount. To be able to get one hour of recreation inside a concrete compound sealed off by metal gates and razor wire he had to pin his picture ID to his uniform.

Such routines characterized Mustafa's life, as well as that of his mother, Bahjo Hosen, 26, during their first seven months in the United States, the country to which they fled to escape political persecution in their native Somalia. They ended up in the T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, one of the nation's newest detention centers for illegal immigrants that the Department of Homeland Security touts as an "effective and humane alternative" to keep immigrant families together while they await the outcome of immigration court hearings or deportation.

Before the facility opened, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) routinely separated parents from their children upon apprehension by the Border Patrol. Infants and toddlers were placed in federally funded foster homes; adolescents and teenagers were placed in facilities for minors run by the Department of Health and Human Services; and parents were placed in adult detention centers.

Despite the change in policy, two national organizations decry the conditions at Hutto and have termed the facility "a penal detention model that is fundamentally anti-family and anti-American."

The center, which the DHS opened last May, is an unacceptable method "for addressing the reality of the presence of families in our immigration system," says a report written by the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, in New York, and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service, in Baltimore, and scheduled for release Thursday.

"As a country that supports family values, we should not be treating immigrant families who have not committed a crime like criminals, particularly children," said Ralston H. Deffenbaugh Jr., president of Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service.

During a tour of Hutto this month, Gary Mead, the assistant director of ICE detention and removal operations, said the facility, which is operated under contract by the Corrections Corporation of America, averaged 380 to 420 detainees daily. That day, Hutto housed 180 children and 150 adults -- four-fifths of them mothers -- from 29 countries. Seventy-five families were being detained while they awaited the outcome of their political-asylum petitions.

The 512-bed facility is part of the Department of Homeland Security's year-long push to build detention centers or contract them out to private companies to accommodate illegal immigrants apprehended along the Mexican border. A record 26,500 such immigrants are in detention daily -- up from 19,718 a day in 2005.

Hutto, located in central Texas, is used for immigrants from countries other than Mexico who are awaiting "expedited removal from the United States." That process ended the policy known as "catch and release," in which such people were given a notice to appear later before an immigration judge. Mexican nationals caught in the United States illegally are routinely sent back almost immediately.

For some years, ICE has contracted with Berks County, Pa., to run an 80-bed detention facility for families, and the report by the women's commission and Lutheran service touched on that center but focused on the much larger Hutto.

The report lauded the goal of keeping families together but urged DHS to close the Hutto facility, saying that "prison-like institutions" are not appropriate for families. "Family detention is not one that has any precedent in the United States, therefore no appropriate licensing requirements exist," the report said.

In response, ICE spokesman Marc Raimondi said that the Hutto and Berks facilities "maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare" of the detainees. He said that ICE detention standards exceed those set by the American Correctional Association, and that the agency's practice of conducting annual reviews and weekly visits to detention facilities "significantly exceeds industry standards."

The report recommended that ICE parole asylum-seekers while they await the outcome of their hearings. It also said that immigrant families not eligible for parole should be released to special shelters or other homelike settings run by nonprofit groups and be required to participate in electronic monitoring or an intensive supervision program that would use a combination of electronic ankle bracelets, home visits and telephone reporting.

The 72-page report also criticized the educational services for children; the food service and rushed feeding times for children; the health care, especially for vulnerable children and pregnant women; the therapeutic mental health care as insufficient or culturally inappropriate; and the recreation time as inadequate for children. The review said that families were being held for months in Hutto and for years in the case of the longer-established Berks facility.

The report also cited inappropriate disciplinary practices used against adults and children, including threats of separation, verbal abuse and withholding recreation or using temperature control, particularly extremely cold conditions, as punishment.

Hosen, who traveled with Mustafa on an inner tube across the Rio Grande from Mexico and insisted that a stranger in Texas call the Border Patrol so she could surrender to authorities, lived in Hutto from June 30 to Jan. 30.

Granted political asylum and now living temporarily in a home for immigrant women and children in Austin, Hosen said that she and other parents in Hutto were threatened regularly with separation from their children for minor infractions such as youngsters running inside the prison. She lost 30 pounds while detained, and her son lost weight and suffered from diarrhea. Concerned about her son's health, Hosen asked for a multivitamin for him but was denied the request, she said.

She recalled that the day she and Mustafa arrived at Hutto and she saw the word "residential" written on the facility's sign, she was relieved after having spent almost two weeks in a detention center for adults in south Texas while her son was held in foster care. Hosen said that although she was reunited with him, little else changed. "It was just like the place I was -- detention -- nothing different," she said.

Report Criticizes Conditions At Immigrant Detention Centers (MCT)

By Chris Mondics

McClatchy Newspapers, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON - The nation's two family detention centers for illegal immigrants - one in Texas and the other in Berks County, Pa. - are plagued by problems including inadequate medical care, lack of privacy, and abusive behavior by staff toward detainees, two advocacy groups alleged in a report being released Thursday.

Of the two centers, the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility in Leesport has the more humane conditions, but even there detainees reported harassment by staff including the threat of separating parents from their children, the report said.

"Every woman we talked to in the facilities cried," said Michelle Brane, one of the authors of the report, prepared by the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service and the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children. "Many of the children were clearly sad and depressed. Some feared separation from their parents, a common threat used to ensure that children behaved according to facility rules."

Both facilities are inappropriate for children and families because they too closely resemble jails, the authors said. The detainees are largely Latinos, apprehended at the U.S.-Mexico border or in the United States, but the facilities also house immigrants from China, Greece, Ethiopia and other nations.

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a division of the Homeland Security Department, said Wednesday that the facilities were run humanely with a high standard of care for the detainees. He said allegations that staff had threatened to separate parents from their children were unsubstantiated.

The "detention facilities maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare of the detained alien population," Raimondi said in an interview.

The report recommends a series of changes including moving families to more homelike facilities, while seeking opportunities to parole others. It comes as the government has intensified its focus on halting illegal immigration, amid growing complaints among voters and members of Congress.

Beefed-up patrols along the Southern border and highly publicized raids by immigration officials on factories believed to hire large number of undocumented workers seem to have functioned as a powerful disincentive to illegal immigration.

Immigration authorities say the number of border arrests has dropped off substantially in recent months, likely as a result of stepped-up enforcement.

The Berks facility, a former nursing home that houses about 20 immigrant families, was opened in 2001. The government opened the much larger T. Don Hutto Residential Center near Austin, Texas, last year following growing complaints from

Congress that illegal immigrants apprehended by authorities were being separated from their children, or simply being released because there was no place to house them.

The Hutto center was more harshly criticized in the report, which said children there typically get only one hour of schooling a day. Apart from sleep, an hour of recreation and 20 minutes per mealtime, families are confined to communal areas for the bulk of the day.

Because of space constraints, children at Hutto are sometimes confined to different cells from their parents, the report said. While the doors are not locked, it said, infrared sensors trigger alarms if the doors are opened slightly, prompting a response from staff.

At the Berks facility, children under 6 typically are housed with their parents, the report said. Older children are housed in same-sex juvenile rooms with children from other families.

The report said some parents reported that their children, assigned to separate rooms, cry at night, but that they are not permitted to visit them.

At the Hutto facility, one woman reported she had not received a prenatal medical exam until seven months into her pregnancy. Other detainees reported delays in receiving medical care, the report said.

It said the care of pregnant women had improved at Hutto since researchers who prepared the report had visited the facility. But the report criticized Hutto for continuing to transport pregnant women to the hospital in handcuffs.

Staff at both facilities threatened to separate children from their parents as a means of control, the report said.

"All families interviewed express a general sense that they were disrespected by staff members, frequently yelled at and issued unnecessarily harsh punishments for behavior as simple as not being able to do homework for lack of a pencil," it said. "Several families told us that facility staff would threaten them with separation if they misbehaved, and on several occasions it seems that children were sent to the secure juvenile detention facility without an opportunity to defend themselves in court."

High Profile Raids Leave Immigrants Across U.S. Living In Fear (AP)

By Juliana Barbassa, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - RICHMOND, California-Fear has gripped immigrant families across the United States as federal agents raid neighborhoods, work sites and jails in a nationwide crackdown on illegal immigration.

Tens of thousands of people have been rounded up over the past several months, and many more are afraid to leave home, answer a knock on the door or leave their children alone in fear they might be next. Churches and community groups are stepping in with legal advice and financial aid for families split up or left without an income because of the sweeps.

"My kids are asking me, 'Why is this happening, mommy? Why did they take uncle away?'" said Dinora Sanchez, whose uncle was taken by immigration officials in January while riding his bike to a construction job in this low-income city northeast of San Francisco. "I'm afraid. There are no explanations I can give them."

From California to Connecticut, federal officials have launched a full-scale offensive to find and deport illegal immigrants. It's part of a two-pronged approach, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement: secure the nation's borders while stepping up enforcement within.

"We're attacking these issues on multiple fronts," she said. "It's definitely a priority now."

Documented immigrants like Sanchez, a native of Mexico, have nothing to fear, said Kice. But her uncle, who had been in the U.S. illegally for 10 years and did not have work authorization, was an obvious target.

"People who are in this country complying with our immigration laws have no reason to be concerned," Kice said.

Groups supporting a reduction in immigration have praised the shift toward more aggressive enforcement. "Enforcement actions like these play an enormous role in deterrence," said Steven Camarota, of the conservative think tank Center for Immigration Studies.

But many immigrants and their advocates say it's splitting families and hurting the legal relatives of immigrants who crossed the border illegally, as well as their co-workers, employers and the businesses that serve them.

"We have to stop this reign of terror," said Mark Silverman, director of immigration policy at San Francisco's Immigrant Legal Resource Center.

Since launching "Operation Return to Sender" last May, Immigration and Customs has rounded up nearly 14,000 immigrants who entered the country illegally or were ignoring a judge's deportation order.

"They make a mockery of the system," Kice said, "and send the wrong message to those who follow the orders."

Some 4,400 others were rounded up in large-scale job site investigations, including immigrants working without proper authorization and those who hired them. More than 700 of those face criminal charges, including hiring illegal immigrants.

Searches of state and local jails over the past seven months identified another 5,500 immigrants who committed crimes, ensuring they'd go into custody of Immigration and Customs when they finished their sentences.

In one of the biggest sweeps so far, Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six states were raided in December, resulting in the arrests of 1,282 immigrant workers. One of those plants was in Marshalltown, Iowa, where Mexican immigrant Juan Padilla runs a western clothing store. He says he went from selling $5,000 (euro3,810) a month worth of cowboy boots, hats and slim-cut jeans last year, to just $600 (euro460) in January.

His wife, who wasn't authorized to work, lost her job at the meatpacking plant and is awaiting a court hearing. Padilla is wondering how they'll be able to support their five American-born children.

"I want my children to go to school, to have better opportunities, so they don't end up cutting meat 14 hours a day," he said. "But what can we do? Where do we go from here? I just don't know."

The enforcement action hit the growing immigrant community in the town of about 26,000 hard. More than 30 children were pulled from the school system, presumably by families who decided to leave the area.

Parents were "frightened that the immigration officials were going to come to school and take their children," said Thomas Renze, principal of Woodbury Elementary in Marshalltown.

Sister Christine Feagan, director of Hispanic ministry at St. Mary Catholic Church, agreed that the raids have been particularly hard on children, whether they're legal or not.

"You can't explain the difference to a second or third grader," she said.

As enforcement actions unfurl across the country, churches and other community organizations have been a key source of support and aid to families.

The Colorado faith-based group Congregations Building Community made sure the children of parents detained during raids didn't go home to empty houses after school, and is helping families who lost jobs pay bills through the winter.

Contra Costa Interfaith Supporting Community Organization, a coalition of 25 congregations in Northern California, protested the enforcement actions and rallied local officials to support immigrants.

Dozens of other organizations are taking donations, giving legal advice, and holding community meetings in response to the large-scale effort by federal officials to detain and deport undocumented immigrants.

"Our folks are really afraid," said the Rev. Carolyn Krantz of St. Peter Martyr Church.

The raids have targeted immigrants who have committed crimes or are evading deportation orders. But if in the course of tracking them down agents come across others they suspect of being here illegally, they will question, detain and deport them if warranted, Kice said.

"It's not uncommon for us to go to a location and discover that the target moved out weeks before," she said. "But we can find other individuals there who are immigration violators."

That's what happened to two of Maria Ramos' children, who were taken from their beds in San Pablo at dawn in January. The agents had come looking for an in-law, but instead they took Ramos' 17-year-old daughter, Elvira Mendoza, and 22-year-old son Victor Mendoza.

Elvira was released into the custody of an older brother who is here legally, but Victor Mendoza was deported back to Mexico, Ramos said.

"My heart is heavy," said Ramos, 64. "My children are what I have in life. I agree with looking for criminals, but there's no need to cause us so much pain."

While groups advocating a reduction in immigration are praising the stepped-up enforcement of existing laws, people on both sides of the debate questioned whether the crackdown would have any real effect.

Those detained add up to a tiny fraction of the millions of undocumented immigrants in the United States, and for every one deported another is there to take over their vacant apartments and jobs, they said.

"It's not like this ended immigration in Greeley," said Ron Marks, director of Congregations Building Community in Greeley, Colorado. "It just changed the individuals." 2007-02-21T03:35:18Z

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Pushes Plan To Shift Costs Of Health Coverage (USAT)

USA Today, February 22, 2007

President Bush flew to Chattanooga, Tenn., on Wednesday to promote his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions and responsibility to individuals.

"The best decisions are made by providers and patients, not by governments or insurance companies," Bush said at the Chattanooga Convention Center.

Under the president's proposal, health insurance benefits would be taxable income, but people would get a standard tax deduction for health insurance: up to $15,000 for family coverage, $7,500 for individual coverage.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee that oversees health matters, says the plan does little to help the poorest of the uninsured and undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage. "His proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on," the Massachusetts Democrat said.

White House officials see health care as one of a few areas in which they might advance their agenda with Democrats who now control Congress. The effort got a boost last week when a bipartisan group of 10 senators told Bush they want to work with him to expand health coverage.

Wrongly imprisoned man can't sue police, court says

The Supreme Court rejected an attempt by a Chicago man wrongly imprisoned for more than eight years to sue the police officers who arrested him.

Andre Wallace, whose murder conviction was overturned in 2002, waited too long to file his false-arrest lawsuit, the Supreme Court said in a 7-2 ruling. He had two years in which to file his civil rights lawsuit.

In Chattanooga, Bush Touts Plan To Help Uninsured Get Health Coverage (AP)

By Ben Feller, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA — President Bush today pushed his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions — and responsibility — to individuals.

Bush's proposal is one of the few major initiatives from his scaled-back State of the Union address last month. It assumes market forces and changes in the tax code will expand affordable choices.

"The best decisions are made by providers and patients, not by governments and insurance companies," Bush said during comments at the Chattanooga Convention Center.

"If you want a health care system that really works, you want the decision-maker to be the individual, in consultation with somebody who knows what they're talking about — somebody trained to help that person make the proper decision," Bush said. "That'd be your doctor."

The main ingredient of Bush's proposal would be a change in the tax code that, for the first time, would treat health insurance costs as taxable income — meaning that workers' taxable wages will increase.

In turn, Bush wants a standard tax deduction for those who buy health insurance — $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for individual coverage. Those who chose insurance policies below the size of the new deduction would end up with a decrease in their tax bills.

Key Democratic leaders have denounced Bush's plan. They say it does little to help the poorest of the uninsured and undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage.

"While the president's focus on health care is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on," said Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate panel that oversees health matters.

Still, White House officials see health care as one of a few areas in which they might advance their agenda with Democrats who now control Congress. They got a boost last week when a bipartisan group of 10 senators told Bush they want to work with him to expand health coverage.

Bush received a hearty ovation as he described his plan in Chattanooga. He shared a stage with people who hold full-time jobs but can't afford health insurance for their families.

One of them was Danny Jennings, a father of two and manager of a nursery. Bush said the change in tax code would save Jennings more than $4,000 a year on his tax bill.

"There's more money in his pocket as a result of the standard tax deduction, and there's more peace of mind knowing that his kids — and he and his wife — are covered," Bush said.

People will also start paying attention to how much health procedures really cost, which is bound to help, Bush said. The president compared it to knowing how much a car costs.

And then he realized he doesn't know that.

"I used to," said a laughing Bush, who travels by limousine. "I will soon."

Earlier, Bush toured the nonprofit Erlanger Hospital, which is allied with the University of Tennessee's College of Medicine. Erlanger serves patients from 50 counties in a 150-mile radius.

Dr. Donald Chamberlain explained to Bush how he used a robot-assisted device to minimize blood loss during a recent cancer surgery. As Bush watched a video of the invasive procedure, the doctor asked him: "Blood OK? You OK with blood?"

"Heck yeah, I'm OK with blood," Bush said, with an eye on the cameras on him. "How about you, doc?"

The White House characterizes its approach as basic fairness, in that every person will get the same tax deduction whether they get health coverage through their job or on their own.

Bush also wants to redirect federal dollars that hospitals and other institutions get to help cover costs for caring for the uninsured. With this money, states would set up programs to assist people in getting health coverage and help people with high-cost health conditions.

On the way out of town, Bush popped into Porker's Bar-B-Que restaurant, where he posed for photos, shook hands and sat down in a booth to chat with local residents.

Chattanooga Visit Goes Off Smoothly (CHA)

The Chattanoogan, February 22, 2007

President George W. Bush wound up a Chattanooga visit early Wednesday afternoon with an hour-long informal health care forum at the Convention Center.

Some 500 Chattanoogans, including many of the city's leaders, were in attendance as the President moderated the event aimed at promoting his new policies aimed at making health care more affordable.

He was on the podium with selected citizens and business owners - all of whom said they either could not afford health care coverage or had inadequate coverage.

President Bush praised Gov. Phil Bredesen, who was also on stage and explained his CoverTennessee program.

The President introduced Lt. Gov. Ron Ramsey, Sens. Bob Corker and Lamar Alexander, Rep. Zach Wamp, Mayor Ron Littlefield and County Mayor Claude Ramsey, though they did not speak at the Convention Center event.

The President arrived in Air Force One at Lovell Field just after 11 a.m.

He briefly shook hands with a small group of mostly GOP faithful who were awaiting him.

He also presented a volunteer service award to Debbie Chadwick, 43-year-old Chattanooga woman with Downs Syndrome who is a longtime nursing home volunteer.

DOJ_NMG_0135101

Then he was whisked into a presidential limousine. His motorcade, which had formed hours earlier, then proceeded to Erlanger Medical Center on East Third Street.

He was led on a tour of the hospital by Erlanger CEO Jim Brexler, including demonstration of some high-tech equipment at the hospital.

The motorcade arrived at the Convention Center around 12:30 p.m.

A small group of protestors was along Carter Street across from the Convention Center, but they were outnumbered by those sporting signs in support of the President.

Security was tight for the visit and a wide swath of local freeways were shut down while the motorcade was in transit.

State troopers and Chattanooga Police were stationed at each freeway underpass along the route.

The events were not open to the public and the Erlanger visit was open only to a local press "pool" that included the Times Free Press (newspaper), WRCB Channel 3 (TV) and WGOW Talk Radio (radio).

WGOW Radio provided extensive coverage, and the three local TV stations had live coverage while the President was at the Convention Center.

President Bush called Erlanger "a pretty fantastic hospital." He said, "I thank Erlanger for being on the leading edge of compassion."

He told of trying out a robotic surgery machine and joked, "There wasn't anybody on the other end of the machine, you'll be thankful to know."

He said his mission was "affordable health care," saying that currently "it's not affordable and it's not accessible to too many people and that's not acceptable."

He introduced Health and Human Services Administrator Mike Leavitt, former Utah governor, who came with him on Air Force One and was on the podium at the Convention Center.

President Bush called Lamar Alexander "a good, thoughtful guy" and introduced former Chattanooga mayor Corker as "a fellow you know pretty well who used to be in the business of paving your roads and filling your potholes."

Speaking of Rep. Wamp, he said, "All he talks about is Chattown. I'm glad I finally listened to him. I am really thrilled to be in this beautiful part of the country."

President Bush said private medicine works best, but he said a number of steps need to be taken to boost it, including giving tax breaks to allow individuals to afford private health care.

Erlanger physician Dr. Joe Cofer described the local Project Access program, which he said has provided more than $13.9 million in free medical care to over 1,600 patients.

He said the local program, led by Rae Bond, has help found similar programs in Knoxville and elsewhere.

President Bush said afterwards, "Thank you for recognizing that the federal government and state government can't do it all."

Sitting near the President was Danny Jennings, who said he has two children and operates a nursery at McMinnville, but cannot afford health insurance. The President said the new deduction would allow him to save about $4,500 in taxes and allow him to buy health insurance for about $47 per month.

The President urged those present to contact members of Congress in support of his tax deduction proposal. Of Congressman Wamp, he said, "You don't need to write Zach. He's already on board."

He also boosted the idea of bringing "transparency" in health care pricing, saying that will spur competition and help reduce costs. And he spoke in favor of health savings accounts that would be tax free. Another idea was having small businesses joining together to "pool their risks."

And he said, "I strongly believe we've got to do something about lawsuits." He said some counties no longer have OB/GYNs because of malpractice suits.

A single mother who is an office manager in McMinnville said she has a pre-existing condition and health care costs for her are "just outrageous."

Amy Childress, an interior designer from Nashville, said she had to drop her health plan when the cost rose to $210 a month. She said she now pays $100 per month, but the deductible is $5,000.

DOJ_NMG_0135102

She told the President she is 35, and he responded, "You don't look a day over 34." Ms. Childress replied, "Most people tell me 22, but that's OK."

The President, looking abashed, noted that he is not going to be running again. He also joked, "Who invited Amy?"

Will Smith of Chattanooga said he has nine fulltime employees in his development firm, but he cannot afford health insurance for them.

There was one unscheduled stop near the end of the presidential visit. The Bush entourage stopped for some barbeque at Porker's on South Market Street.

Rep. Wamp, Mr. Brexler and several Erlanger doctors were among those feasting with the President.

Afterwards, Bush said he recommended the local barbeque.

In Tennessee, Bush Talks Up Tax Breaks For The Uninsured (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Feb. 21 -- The last time President Bush visited this state, last September, it was to campaign with GOP Senate hopeful Bob Corker against the Democrats. Wednesday afternoon, Sen. Corker was in the audience and the state's Democratic governor was on the stage at the convention center here for a folksy discussion on how to improve the health-care system.

Bush hailed the governor, Phil Bredesen, for his "innovative policies," as he talked up his new plan to increase coverage of the uninsured by tinkering with the tax code and giving states more flexibility to design low-cost benefit plans for those who lack coverage. Bredesen said it was the first time he had been invited to appear with Bush in such a setting.

Democrats in Washington are showing little enthusiasm for the Bush health agenda, but the president is plugging away, insisting he sees hope for compromise before his term ends in less than two years. Indeed, the end seemed on his mind as he bantered with several hundred audience members, arguing for greater transparency in health-care pricing.

"I don't know about you, but I don't remember ever asking how much something was going to cost when it came to health care. I do when it comes to a car -- or I used to," Bush said, quickly remembering that he is driven around in a limousine. "I will soon!" he added to laughter.

While the focus of his administration is the war in Iraq, Bush is pushing an ambitious health-care agenda, the key element of which is a tax plan to make it easier for individuals to purchase health insurance coverage in the private market. He is also proposing to restrain the growth of Medicare and Medicaid by cutting payments to health-care providers and charging higher premiums to wealthier individuals, a plan Democrats have described as dead on arrival.

Under his tax plan, every family would get a standard deduction of $15,000 and individuals would get a deduction of $7,500 if they buy health coverage, whether they obtain it through their employer or individually. Bush says this would help rectify a situation in which people who work for companies that do not offer health coverage do not get any tax break for buying insurance, as workers essentially get through employer-sponsored health plans. He argued that his plan would make insurance more affordable for middle-income workers.

"Right now there's a limited market for the individual; it makes it hard to find a product that either suits your needs or you can afford," Bush told his Chattanooga audience. Bush was joined on stage by several uninsured workers and businesses managers who he claimed would find insurance cheaper under his plan.

Many health economists say they think Bush is overstating the impact of the tax code changes, but they say he might have a bigger bang if he were to give low-income people tax credits to buy insurance, an idea the White House considered and rejected. A study released this week by the Community Research Council of Chattanooga concluded that very few of the uninsured in Hamilton County, which includes Chattanooga and its suburbs, make enough money to benefit under the current Bush plan.

In an interview, Bredesen said he is glad that Bush is starting to tackle health care more seriously but voiced doubts about the tax elements. "I get less excited about the tax deduction stuff because there are a lot of people . . . for whom that's not going to make a difference," he said.

Even as the president arrived in Tennessee, the local news was full of reports that a change in federal reimbursement policy could cost the state as much as $250 million annually for charity care, countering any relief under the president's new plan. "It certainly would be a sore blow to us," Bredesen said.

The president's plan has also elicited mixed reaction on Capitol Hill. In the House, the idea has been declared a non-starter, and House leaders are moving in another direction, hoping to expand funding for the federal-state children's health program much more ambitiously than the president contemplates. The president's plan is for "every individual on their own," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "He does nothing to control costs and he does nothing to expand the number of insured. Other than that, it is incredibly helpful."

Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Finance Committee, sounded more positive, describing the president's tax plan as "an outside-the-box proposal" that deserves to be part of the debate. "Whether or not it's enacted into law, he's started a discussion," he said.

Bush, In Talk-Show Manner, Promotes His Health Plan (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Feb. 21 — President Bush's plan to expand health coverage by revamping the tax code has been pronounced dead by leading Democrats on Capitol Hill. But Mr. Bush, ever the optimist, forged ahead Wednesday, conducting a chat session here in Oprah Winfrey style with people who are uninsured.

Mr. Bush held forth for nearly an hour, cracking jokes about everything from the age of one of the participants — "You don't look a day over 34," he said after learning that she was 35 — to "the hair follicle benefit," a wry reference to what he views as luxury health plans. The participants had been carefully selected, the tone was confessional, and the president, describing himself as the "educator in chief," sounded more like talk-show host in chief.

Marty Ginn, an office manager from nearby McMinnville, told Mr. Bush, "I have a pre-existing condition, I have trouble with my left knee, and the quotes were just outrageous and I'm just kind of stuck."

"That's patently unfair," the president replied after telling Ms. Ginn that under his plan, she would get a tax deduction of $7,500 to help defray the cost of coverage.

"I think it'll work for you, Danny, I really do," Mr. Bush told another participant, a nursery manager named Danny Jennings, after encouraging Mr. Jennings to make a sales pitch of his own, for some nice spring rhododendrons.

The round-table discussion, which followed a similar if less lively event with health insurance executives in Washington on Tuesday, was aimed at pitching the president's proposal to provide tax breaks for low- and moderate-income workers to buy insurance while imposing tax increases on some Americans covered by generous employer-sponsored plans. Single people would receive a $7,500 tax deduction, and families a deduction of $15,000, but anyone whose insurance cost more would pay taxes on the difference.

Despite Mr. Bush's cheery demeanor, the idea seems to be a nonstarter on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have set universal coverage as their goal and the two parties remain miles apart in their visions for helping the nation's 47 million uninsured.

Leading Democrats, including Senator Max Baucus of Montana, chairman of the Finance Committee, and Representative Pete Stark of California, chairman of a subcommittee overseeing health policy, said in interviews that Mr. Bush's plan was far too dependent on the private sector and that they did not envision anything like it becoming law.

Mr. Stark called it "a farcical move" that was "primarily designed to encourage employers to drop group coverage." Mr. Baucus said the plan was "too much focused on the individual market," though he did give the president credit for "stirring up the debate" with his tax idea.

"It's an out-of-the-box thought," Mr. Baucus said.

Mr. Bush, undaunted, sees morsels of encouragement in a recent letter from a bipartisan group of five Democratic and five Republican senators who said they wanted to work with him on health care legislation. The Republicans, who included Senator

Trent Lott of Mississippi, the party whip, said they agreed in principle that universal coverage was the goal, maintaining that "the health care system cannot be fixed without providing solutions for everyone."

The Democrats, led by Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, who had initially been critical of the tax plan, said economists had convinced them that the tax rules needed to be modernized and that "current rules disproportionately favor the most affluent." Mr. Wyden said in an interview that the two sides had spent weeks parsing the language in the letter.

The White House, for its part, is signaling that Mr. Bush is flexible. A chief architect of the tax plan, Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council, said, "We realize that the ultimate legislation is not going to look exactly as the president proposed and that there's going to be compromise on both sides."

Whether that spells legislative possibilities for 2007 is hard to say. Democrats in Congress say they are most focused this year on reauthorizing Schip, a program that provides coverage to low-income children. As for tackling universal coverage, Mr. Stark said each of the two parties would most likely coalesce around whatever plan its 2008 presidential nominee embraces.

Some states, though, are moving ahead on their own. Tennessee, with the prodding of Gov. Phil Bredesen, who also participated in Wednesday's round table, has committed $100 million to a new program, Cover Tennessee, intended to help employers provide basic insurance to workers willing to pay a modest amount, roughly $50 a month.

After returning to Nashville later Wednesday, Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat, said in a phone interview that he was skeptical of the president's tax proposal and had been a bit leery of participating in the event here. He did so after assurances from Mr. Bush's health and human services secretary, Michael O. Leavitt, that he would get a chance to make his own pitch, for Cover Tennessee.

"I didn't particularly want to fly down there and be a set piece in a play for something I didn't really believe in," he said, "but he assured me that they really were there to highlight the kinds of things we were doing."

Bush Pushes Health Care Plan In Tennessee (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. -- President Bush campaigned for his health care proposals today, praising Tennessee's effort to expand health care coverage to the uninsured — and taking a turn at the controls of a surgical robot at a Chattanooga hospital.

At an event described as a "round table" on his health care initiatives, Bush traded one-liners with a handful of workers and employers, who have had trouble getting health insurance.

One of them was an interior designer named Amy Childers, who dropped her health coverage when she turned 35 and the premium was raised to $210 a month.

"Doesn't it make sense to change the tax code so that Amy Childers can better afford health care?" the president asked. Then he joked, "You don't look a day over 34."

"Most people say 22," Childers responded, adding that she would forgive him.

The president has proposed making premiums paid for medical insurance deductible for all Americans, up to $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for individuals. Currently, employers can deduct health care premiums without limit, but individual taxpayers cannot.

The president and his staff argue that the current system unfairly penalizes consumers who must insure themselves, such as the self-employed or those working for small businesses.

They also say it creates an incentive for employers and employees to choose more expensive health care than they need, helping drive health care prices higher.

On Capitol Hill, the president's proposals have gotten a frosty reception. Democrats, who took control of both chambers of Congress last month, agree that health insurance should become more affordable for the self-employed.

But they say the biggest problem facing the system is the 40 million Americans with no health insurance, and they say the president's proposal would help only a small fraction of them become insured.

In particular, they point out that the deduction would not help taxpayers who do not itemize their income tax returns, especially poorer paid workers who are the most likely to lack health insurance. Instead, Democrats favor a tax credit for health care premiums, which would help all taxpayers regardless of their filing status.

"Health care in America is in crisis, and what is needed is effective action to ensure that every American has quality, affordable health care," Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate labor committee, said in a statement.

"While the president's focus on healthcare is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on, and replacing it with a tax break that will benefit the wealthiest Americans," he said.

Supporters Outnumber Protesters As Bush Arrives In Chattanooga (AP)

By Bill Poovey, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA — Supporters and protesters turned out as President Bush arrived today for an event promoting his plans to reshape the nation's health care.

Bush was to tour Erlanger Medical Center, the region's biggest public hospital, and then stage a discussion about health care at the Chattanooga Convention Center, where hundreds of people waited for him outside.

Most carried welcome signs or waved flags on a sunny and unseasonably warm day with temperatures in the mid-60s.

Among them were several students from Chattanooga State Technical Community College, who attended in order to earn some credit for a government class, and Antonio Donate, 7, of Stockbridge, Ga., who hoped to get a glimpse of Bush.

"I don't know, I just like him," said the boy, whose father is an officer in the Army.

Dozens of protesters, several of them at odds with Bush over the Iraq war, also were outside the convention center.

Donna Cussack, 49, of Cleveland, Tenn., said she had never before protested at a presidential event.

"I'm hoping I can at least catch his eye for a moment," Cussack said as she held a sign that read, "Not in my name! No more."

The president was expected to promote administration health care proposals, including tax changes to allow deductions for health insurance and grants for states that develop programs to cover the uninsured.

Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, was expected to attend, along with Republican U.S. Sens. Bob Corker and Lamar Alexander, and U.S. Rep. Zach Wamp. Corker is a former mayor of Chattanooga.

Bush is the first sitting president to visit Chattanooga since his father in September 1992.

Protesters, Supporters Demonstrate Near Convention Center During President's Visit (CHA)

By Judy Frank

Chattanoogan, February 21, 2007

When Chattanooga resident Ethan Sklom learned last week that President George Bush was going to visit here, he knew immediately that he would be on hand for the occasion, he said.

So by 11 a.m. Wednesday, well before the President and his motorcade arrived at the Convention Center, Mr. Sklom was standing on the sidewalk at the intersection of M.L. King Boulevard and Chestnut Street, wearing the rubbery George W. Bush mask he bought last Halloween.

"You don't get many opportunities to take a stand for what you believe in," he said.

Mr. Sklom said he was part of a group of protesters who originally gathered directly across the street from the Convention Center, about a block away from a group of Bush supporters. But a police officer confronted his group and demanded that they move three blocks away, he explained, as other protesters nodded in agreement.

"The group supporting the president was allowed to stay where they were, he said, "but when we asked the police officer why we had to move, he just said, 'Because I say so,' " Mr. Sklom said indignantly.

Three blocks away, standing on a small grassy knoll directly across the street from the Convention Center, Bush supporter Billy McCurdy was likewise vehement.

He and his brother, Ronald, drove the 45 miles from their homes in Fort Payne, Ala., to Chattanooga because they thought it was important to support the President, Mr. McCurdy said.

"What I like about him is his Christian values," he said. "He's just about the best president we ever had . . . and his wife Laura is just about the prettiest first lady."

Mr. McCurdy said he believes the President and his advisors made some mistakes in fighting the war in Iraq. "They probably should have gone in at the beginning with a bigger force," he said. "If we'd had a surge like that back then, we probably wouldn't be where we are today."

But he thinks the President is a "good family man," he added, "who would like to have an end to this war like everybody else. And we're not going to get that unless we support our troops and our president."

Nearby, Cleveland resident Donna Cussack and Chattanoogan Rebekah Binney stood holding signs criticizing the President.

"With leaders like this, who needs terrorists?" read Ms. Binney's sign. "Not in my name!" Ms. Cussack's declared.

The two women, who met for the first time on the sidewalk outside the Convention Center, were critical of the President's policies on issues ranging from Iraq to the environment to civil liberties to national universal ID legislation.

"They're taking away our freedoms, and saying they're doing it to protect our freedom," Ms. Binney said angrily.

Katie Wilson, who handles marketing for Chattanooga Symphony and Orchestra, used her lunch hour Wednesday to walk over to the Trade Center and join the crowd of Bush supporters standing there.

"The reason I'm here today is because I support (the president's) plans and policies and tough decisions that support our way of life," she explained.

For example, she said, President Bush has championed small business and entrepreneurs.

"I think small business and the entrepreneurial spirit are key elements of America," she said. "We should all support the individuals who seek to make their own livings and build a business."

Some of the people outside the Trade Center said religion played a part in their decisions to be there.

"Jesus wouldn't go to war," declared ordained minister Bonnie Setliffe Jacobs, noting that her last assignment prior to her retirement was at Signal Mountain United Methodist Church.

Carrying a large sign covered with photos of victims of the war in Iraq, she said she viewed the president's visit as an opportunity to protest a variety of wrongs, including the toll that the war is taking on the nation's poor.

"It's killing people," she said. "People don't have money for health care. They join the military because they can't get jobs, and then they get sent to Iraq and killed . . . Poverty is a weapon of mass destruction."

Deborah Weaver and Soherah Stringers, both members of the Chattanooga community of the international Community of Twelve Tribes, arrived early on the sidewalk across from the Trade Center.

The two were part of a group of five Twelve Tribes members who spent their time passing out free copies of an 8-page religious newsletter entitled "What Makes For Peace."

Ms. Weaver said they were not there to support the president, or to demonstrate against him.

"We want to show people a different way," she said. "We appreciate people in the government and in authority, because we know how difficult a position that is. But we are not participating politically, because we believe in the separation of church and state."

Democrats Blast Bush Health-care Proposal (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts

Market Watch, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Top Senate Democrats on Wednesday charged that President Bush's proposal to change how the tax code treats employer-provided health benefits would do little to help the uninsured.

"Unfortunately, President Bush has proposed solutions to this country's health care system that would only serve to undermine the quality and reliability of care for those Americans lucky enough to have insurance," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in a statement.

Bush, in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits. Under current law, such benefits are provided to the employee tax-free, while individuals who buy their own health insurance don't get a tax break.

Under Bush's plan, all workers would receive a standard deduction of up to $15,000 for married couples and $7,500 for individuals for health insurance.

Each dollar of employer-provided health insurance above that level would be taxed as income. The White House estimates that around 80% of workers are below the limit. While the deduction would be indexed to inflation, analysts note that health care costs have outpaced the general rise in prices, meaning more workers would find themselves above the deduction limit in coming years.

Bush highlighted the plan in his weekly radio address last Saturday, and is making the case for the plan in events this week. On Tuesday, Bush met with insurance providers and other business leaders at the White House. On Wednesday, Bush toured a Tennessee hospital and held a public discussion with health experts.

"We're worried about helping make sure people can afford health care. But the tax code is so structured that if you're an individual or somebody working for a company that can't afford health care, you're disadvantaged relative to a company that is," Bush said.

The White House argues that the current tax treatment encourages employers to spend more on health plans than would otherwise be the case, helping to drive up health-care costs.

But critics say the plan would likely encourage employers to drop health benefits.

"While the President's focus on healthcare is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on, and replacing it with a tax break that will benefit the wealthiest Americans," said Senate Health, Energy, Labor and Pensions Committee Chairman Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., in a statement.

At Walter Reed, 'We're Going To Fix It' (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

A top Army general vowed yesterday to personally oversee the upgrading of Walter Reed Army Medical Center's Building 18, a dilapidated former hotel that houses wounded soldiers as outpatients.

Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, used terminology similar to that of a military campaign to describe his plan to overhaul the broken building, including giving it a more "appropriate" name, and the sluggish bureaucracy for outpatient care.

"We own that building, and we're going to take charge of it," Cody said at the Pentagon. "The senior Army leadership takes full responsibility for the lack of quality of life at Building 18, and we're going to fix it."

Cody blamed "a breakdown in leadership" for the troubling conditions but said no one has been fired or relieved of command. He did point to lower-ranking officers and noncommissioned officers lacking "the right experience and the authority to be able to execute some of the missions."

"That's what we're correcting right now," he said.

Cody and William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, said at a news conference that they frequently visit Walter Reed and were surprised and disappointed by the living conditions and the fact that they had learned about them from media reports. The Washington Post reported Sunday and Monday on the challenges facing outpatients at Walter Reed.

"We get concerns all the time directed to us. But we never got a concern sent our way about this issue, which is a little surprising. I'm not sure why that is," Winkenwerder said.

Standards of medical care at Walter Reed remain high, he said, but he acknowledged: "The trust has taken a hit here. And I think it's our job to repair that trust and to re-earn that trust. And that's what we're going to do."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), the top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, blasted the Army yesterday, saying in a statement that it has known for years about shortcomings at Walter Reed.

"You could put all of the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton and it wouldn't fix the personnel, management and recordkeeping problems that keep them languishing in outpatient limbo out there for months while paperwork from 11 disjointed systems gets shuffled and lost," Davis said.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) echoed Davis's concerns after she toured Building 18 and spoke to soldiers.

"The problem is much more serious than one building," she said in an interview. "It's going to be easy for everyone to duck this problem after the building is fixed if we don't fix the completely dilapidated administrative system."

Norton said that she thinks Congress will have to compel the Army to overhaul its outpatient care system but that immediate steps are needed to help soldiers trapped in the existing bureaucracy.

Army Secretary Francis Harvey said an independent review group of about eight people will be established to look at outpatient care. Winkenwerder said the group would report back to the Pentagon in a "short time frame."

Cody called the state of Building 18 -- where 76 soldiers live -- "inexcusable" and said he will "personally oversee" its renovation. He said the building had been upgraded several times and called the furniture "very nice" but said the walls and infrastructure were not "up to speed" and required inspections were not done or were not rigorous enough.

Harvey said the building would be renamed after an Army doctor, medic or nurse who was killed in action.

Cody said the Army will review all its procedures for handling wounded soldiers and their families and will seek to streamline systems for assistance.

Staff writers Steve Vogel and William Branigin contributed to this report.

Obama, McCaskill Sponsor Bill On Care For Veterans (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Several lawmakers are taking action to improve the conditions and care for veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Long considered a premier military medical facility, it is now under fire after The Washington Post reported last weekend that parts of the hospital have suffered from extreme neglect.

Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) are sponsoring legislation to improve the lives of recovering veterans at Walter Reed, while Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), a cosponsor of the Obama-McCaskill legislation, said that he would explore ways to direct new funds to Walter Reed and make immediate improvements to its veteran housing.

Meanwhile, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) wrote a letter yesterday to Secretary of Defense Robert Gates demanding information on the current state of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities. She also asked him to explain how conditions were allowed to deteriorate.

Lawmakers Seek Action On Walter Reed Problems (CQ)

By Patrick Yoest

Congressional Quarterly, February 22, 2007

Lawmakers reacted sharply this week to a report that injured soldiers at the Army's premier medical facility were receiving substandard care due to housing and administration problems.

A recent Washington Post article suggested that buildings housing injured soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington had physically deteriorated and many soldiers faced months-long delays in receiving care.

Senate Veterans Affairs Chairman Daniel K. Akaka, D-Hawaii, said he would hold a hearing on the issue next month, since many of the soldiers housed at Walter Reed will soon become veterans.

"I will purse the situation at Walter Reed and other military treatment facilities that are handling the bulk of returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans to ensure that the government is helping those who have been injured in service to our country, and their families," Akaka said.

House <eterans Affairs Chairman Bob Filner, D-Calif., has not publicly said he would hold a similar hearing.

Sens. Patty Murray, D-Wash., and Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates calling for an inspector general's investigation into outpatient care and the availability of psychological counseling for soldiers and their families.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars called for a congressional investigation of the reported problems, and the American Legion said it planned its own investigation.

Meanwhile, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said Tuesday he plans to introduce legislation along with Sens. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., and John Kerry, D-Mass., to improve conditions at Walter Reed.

According to Obama's office, the bill will include new reporting requirements and will mandate a lower ratio of caseworkers to patients, as well as more training for caseworkers.

"Caring for our returning heroes is one of the things we can still get right about this war, and that's why the deterioration of the conditions at Walter Reed is both appalling and unacceptable," said Obama, a Democratic presidential contender.

The Army and the Navy announced Tuesday they would form an independent review group to investigate outpatient care at both Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

But lawmakers expressed frustration that the Defense Department had not requested money to address the problem earlier.

"The Defense Department is never shy about asking for supplemental funds for operations and equipment," said Jeff Miller, R-Fla. "I cannot imagine why housing for recuperating wounded would not be a similarly high priority."

VFW national commander Gary Kurpius sounded similar notes.

"If money was needed to ensure that Walter Reed had the necessary personnel and programs to properly serve our wounded and their families during a time of war, then people were derelict in their duty for not reporting the need, and then for not following up on their reports," Kurpius said.

AARP To Push For Social Security Fix (POL)

By Jeff Patch

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

AARP officials said Wednesday they will push hard to revamp Social Security to maintain the social insurance program's solvency and fiscal health.

Changes need to be made in the program to head off rising health care costs and declining financial security, especially among baby boomers, said CEO Bill Novelli, legislative policy director David Certner and John Rother, executive officer for policy and strategy.

"The next generation could be the first in American history that is less well off than their parents," Novelli said.

Though Social Security is often deemed a "third rail" of American politics for its sensitivity, the program can and should be reformed, Novelli said.

"Of all the big domestic issues, Social Security might be the easiest to deal with," Novelli said.

AARP released a poll showing a consensus for reform in some of the key areas of Social Security.

The survey, which highlighted several reform provisions that a majority of Americans support or are willing to consider, is the first major stock-taking on the issue since President Bush's 2005 push to create private savings accounts within the program floundered.

Of eight possible options, a majority of respondents favored three measures that would raise revenue for Social Security in some fashion: increasing the income cap to $150,000; increasing the payroll tax by 0.5 percent for both workers and employers, and changing the benefit formula to make the program more progressive.

The online survey of 1,514 people over 21 was conducted for AARP by Knowledge Networks from Jan. 19 to Jan. 29. A majority of people were willing to consider investing part (15 percent) of the trust fund, although only 40 percent actually support it at this time. Efforts to raise the retirement age, change the longevity index, cut benefits for new retirees and implement modified price indexing were opposed by large margins.

"There is striking agreement among Republicans and Democrats," Rother said, with the main difference occurring when considering the trust fund option.

The political environment represents a rare opportunity for a deal, with Democrats looking to score legislative victories and President Bush seeking to salvage a legacy, officials said.

"Everything should be on the table," Novelli said.

AARP officials said 52 percent of voters in the midterm elections were older than 50. Twenty-five percent were AARP members. Seniors will not tolerate continued dithering, Novelli said.

"The public wants an end to the bickering," he said. "They want action. We have a narrow window of opportunity before the 2008 campaign heats up and legislation cools down."

AARP is pushing two broad campaigns to confront these issues. Its new campaign about health care and financial security, which is focused on all age groups – especially children – is called "Future Champions." AARP recently began airing ads featuring children, for its push to enact "fair and equitable bipartisan solutions."

Last month, the group announced an initiative with the Business Roundtable, the association of business executives, and Service Employees International Union, one of the nation's largest unions. The pitch, called "Divided We Fail," seeks to develop bipartisan changes on health and financial security issues. The associations say that although they differ on some policy points, a consensus exists to enact change.

AARP has set up four coalition offices in the four early primary and caucus states – Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina – to push health care and financial security issues in the 2008 presidential campaign.

No need to waste time and energy on the Social Security problem. It'll all sort itself out within the next decade or so - when it collapses. If you're under 60 years old and you expect to receive SS benefits in your lifetime, then you're a drooling idiot.

by sumawolf on 02.21.2007 at 06:48 PM

Why scrap anything ! Read up on the entire subject and learn how the US Government has been taking money out of SS for years with the promise of paying it back into the system and never doing so . Thats where all the money went and now they want to add illegal immigrants also ? Go figure ! The solution is stop stealing from SS US Government and no illegal immigrants period !

by drbillybob on 02.21.2007 at 05:23 PM

How about this; we just scrap the whole thing and make it a "Senior Welfare Program" for those in need? Increasing payroll taxes, means testing and increasing age limits are all steps in that direction.

Why not just scrap it now and encourage our younger workers to invest in privately held tax-advantaged savings plans? It's the only thing that makes fiscal sense.

Women Call For Change In Caucus (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Questions of Sensitivity Strain Alliance of Hispanic Democrats

This week's congressional recess has provided a timeout for feuding members of the Hispanic Caucus, whose tempers have been simmering over issues such as the group's governance and whether the chairman labeled one of the female members a "whore."

The chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.), is trying to hold together the group of 20 Democrats and smooth over multiple rifts.

"We've all got to come together, put personalities aside," Baca said yesterday by phone from California. "We've got 45 million Hispanic constituents we have to think about."

But several female members of the mostly male caucus say Baca himself is a source of problems, and one, Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), resigned last month in protest. There were six female members and 15 male members before Sanchez quit.

Sanchez, who declined to comment yesterday, has said that Baca called her a "whore" in a conversation with another Latino politician in Sacramento last summer. She said she did not hear the remark firsthand but learned about it later, and she has not revealed the source. She has said the slur demonstrates Baca's lack of respect for women.

Baca has denied making the comment. "I never used the five-letter word," he said. "All of a sudden because we have a female speaker, I and the caucus are being accused of being insensitive. I think we're being falsely accused."

Baca acknowledged that he made a crude remark about another member, Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), saying that she "was a kiss-up" to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). But he apologized privately to Solis. "She wants a public apology, so, okay, I am apologizing in The Washington Post," he said.

At a closed meeting last week designed to mend fences, Sanchez made an appearance and, along with several other women, aired grievances, said sources familiar with the caucus's workings. The women said their requests of the caucus staff are not taken seriously, among other things.

Baca pledged yesterday to correct problems but added that the complaints so far have been vague. "They haven't specifically spelled out where the problems are," said Baca, who was unchallenged in caucus elections in November. "I've only been in office five weeks. I will answer any concerns, but give me a chance."

When Baca was elected, Solis, Sanchez and her sister, Rep. Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), disputed the election procedure and unsuccessfully pushed for a new vote by secret ballot. They now say they want the governance to be restructured along the lines of the Blue Dog caucus, which disperses power among three co-chairs instead of a single chairman.

Baca said yesterday that any reforms must be approved by the caucus but that it seems odd the women didn't broach the subject before the recent elections. "Why now? Why change in midstream?" he asked. "If people wanted to do this, why didn't the body do it prior to electing the chair on Nov. 15? I ran unopposed. That's why this whole thing is really ludicrous."

Rocky relations between Baca and Loretta Sanchez and some other caucus members stretch back at least a year, to when the political action committee affiliated with the caucus gave about $3,000 to help Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy, run for California offices.

Baca said he recused himself from any of the decision making regarding his sons and the PAC. Both sons lost their bids to women. The Sanchez sisters and Solis were among six caucus members who severed ties with the PAC, saying the committee should support federal office seekers, not candidates running for state or local election.

The Baca sons returned the money to the PAC, but resentments linger, Baca said.

"It's a personal thing," Baca said about the squabbles inside the caucus. "I hope this thing goes away and we can work together as Democrats."

At Mock Briefing, Less Give-and-Take And More Sharing (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

"Tonight, we have truly what is a 'man bites dog' story," host Bob Schieffer told the crowd at the National Press Club.

That, at least, was the plan: The "dogs" -- NBC News's David Gregory and five other White House correspondents -- had agreed to submit to questioning by the "man," White House press secretary Tony Snow, who usually is at the receiving end of such grillings.

But Snow wouldn't bite. "For those of you who are expecting theatrical savagery on my part, forget about it," Snow advised the crowd of 250 and a live C-SPAN audience Tuesday night. Instead, the hour turned into a mutual rehabilitation session. Snow argued that reporters are not the jackals that the public supposes them to be. The reporters reciprocated with warm tales about covering the Bush White House; one spoke about the perk of seeing Snow's bare knees.

"If there is a flash of tempers between me and Tony, it's not about him and me, it's nothing personal," said Gregory, whose televised clashes with Snow have become legend.

Snow grinned. "What you see quite often at the briefings are sharp exchanges, but David's right: It's not personal," the press secretary agreed. "I not only like but admire everybody else sitting up here on this podium. It is a real pleasure and a privilege to work with them, to get to know them. . . . It is a wondrous thing."

For those requiring something even more cloying, there was a large tray of cookies at the exit.

Only occasionally did a barb pierce the evening's pleasantries. "How often have you gone home and you said, 'Man, I'll tell you what, if I could do it over again, I really would have been nicer to that press secretary?' " Snow queried.

"When I have something to announce, I'll announce it," Gregory replied, using a standard line of President Bush's spokesmen.

The New York Times' Sheryl Stolberg smiled sweetly at Snow as she confided to the crowd, "I often tease Tony and tell him that he's the most useless press secretary ever."

"Thank you," Snow responded with an aw-shucks look.

Mostly, though, the journalists grappled with one another rather than with Snow. "This will surprise you, but I think there are some people who play to the cameras," the Associated Press's Terry Hunt said of the White House briefings.

"No!" said CBS Radio's Mark Knoller, in mock surprise.

Gregory, wearing a natty purple tie, would not stand for this. "I think what Terry Hunt said is wrong and actionable," he deadpanned. "People think people are playing to the cameras. I can't control what Tony does."

Snow changed the subject, but Knoller soon brought the talk back to his showboat colleagues' hectoring of White House briefers. "I'm not there to debate them," he said.

"I see it a little bit differently," Gregory said, to laughter. "I'm just trying to push him to what I think would be more candor than he's prepared to offer."

The talk of candor must have moved Snow to offer up some. "There will be times when I tap-dance around something because it would be best answered off the record," he admitted.

The confessions continued. "The best thing I like about being on radio is the anonymity," Knoller said. "It means that if you're thumbing through the adult magazines at Barnes & Noble, nobody's going to know who you are."

Awkward laughter followed. Snow quaffed some water and raised his eyebrows. "It's a joke!" Knoller insisted.

Stolberg was the final panelist to be questioned by Snow ("Thank you for saving the best for last," she told him), but she proved the liveliest. She retold an exchange between her daughters: "My younger daughter said, 'Mommy, have you met the president?' And the older one said, 'The president has met Mom.' "

She also had some controversial views on the dusty Texas town where Bush has his ranch. "You know what I think is fun about being a White House correspondent? Crawford!" she said. "We can go in shorts, and the press secretary comes in shorts," she added.

Others on the dais recoiled. Gregory arched his eyebrows at Newsweek's Richard Wolffe. "And it's only 400 degrees," the NBC man said.

"The best thing about Crawford," Knoller chimed in, "is you can go to work and you don't have to go through metal detectors."

"And it's only 400 degrees," Gregory repeated.

American Urban Radio's April Ryan quietly told Gregory to "settle down."

"You always have Cindy Sheehan there," Snow offered.

But enough dissension. It was getting late, and it was time to make nice some more.

"It's very easy to overlook how cool it is to work in the White House," Snow proposed.

"Hard to beat," Wolffe concurred.

DOJ_NMG_0135113

"A rare privilege," said Stolberg.

"Best job I have ever had," said Ryan.

"An amazing honor," said Knoller.

Will somebody please release the hounds?

Role Reversal: The White House Press Corps Faces Answers Questions From Tony Snow (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

In what CBS's Bob Schieffer called a "man-bites-dog story," White House press secretary Tony Snow put A-list reporters on the spot Tuesday night, in front of C-SPAN cameras.

The forum, the first collaboration between the White House Correspondents Association and National Press Club, provoked unusually candid remarks by the reporters, who usually are loathe to talk about such delicate subjects as how ideology and blogs affect their work. And Snow acknowledged that they made some good points.

Snow, a former editorial writer who came to the White House after working as the host of "Fox News Sunday" and an anchor for Fox News, set a jocular tone for the colloquy with six of the best-known and most outspoken White House correspondents.

"For those of you expecting theatrical savagery on my part," he began, "forget about it. I'm just too nice. Having been on both sides – having been in the press, and also being a press secretary – one of the things you don't see quite often in the briefings is how much fun we do have."

Here are some excerpts of memorable exchanges from the hourlong session before an overflow crowd of more than 400, as televised by C-SPAN:

Tony Snow to David Gregory of NBC News: "How often have you gone home and stared in the mirror and you said, 'Man, I tell you what. If I could do it over again, I really would have been nicer to that press secretary.' "

Gregory, laughing and closing his eyes as if to concentrate: "Let me think how often that's happened. I wanted to say at the outset: That's an interesting question. And when I have something to announce, I'll announce it."

Snow: "Did you write that before you came?"

Gregory: "When it comes to Tony and I, neither one of us are trying to make it easy for the other. That's not the reason we're there. He's got a job to do, I have a job to do. And in some cases, those missions can conflict: I'm trying to get more out of him, he's perhaps trying to offer less than I'm trying to get. That's the intersection of some tension."

Snow to Terence Hunt, AP White House correspondent: "One of the questions people kept asking me when I first started is: Are you going to get rid of the cameras in the briefing room? And my sense is you really can't any more. If you had your druthers, would you have them on, or off?" (The daily White House briefing was off-camera until the Clinton administration.)

Hunt: "I would have 'em off … This will surprise you, but there are some people who, I think, play to the cameras. Yeah, it's true! You, of course, didn't have that back before the cameras were allowed in … Having said that, we've come this far, I don't think you can turn back the time and go back to not having cameras in the briefings."

Sheryl Gay Stolberg of The New York Times, on coming to the White House from Capitol Hill, where reporters have relatively free rein: "Coming from that environment, the White House felt utterly constraining. I often tease Tony and tell him he's the most useless press secretary ever."

Snow: "Thanks, Sheryl."

Stolberg: "I'm trying to get information out of you. You're trying not to give me information."

Snow: "I'm not sure that's quite the case."

Stolberg: "You ARE trying to give me information?"

Snow: "Yeah, but sometimes – ''

DOJ_NMG_0135114

The AP's Hunt, to laughter: "At a slow pace!"

Snow: "No. My view on this is pretty simple, which is: On a big story, if we don't get our side out, we have no right to complain if it's not reported. So we've certainly tried to be more aggressive, for instance, before a big speech and so on. There are going to be times when for various reasons – national security, or sometimes even the propriety of dealing with other individuals in Washington, around the world – you are, in fact, going to clam up for a little while until others have had their chance to speak. I've been getting lots of questions tonight about the decision the British government's made. Well, the prime minister has not yet made his announcement, and it's a little presumptuous for me to start characterizing or pronouncing on something that hasn't happened yet. So, 'stonewall,' 'useless press secretary.' But sometimes that, in fact, is the appropriate thing to do. On the other hand, again, I'm a big believer that if we come and complain that you haven't reported something and you have to ask for it, then that's our fault."

Gregory: "Can I jump in on the television part of this? Because what, I think, Terry Hunt said is wrong and actionable, frankly." (Gales of laughter.) "Look, this is a little bit self-serving, because I work in television. But I think that there is great utility, both for the White House and for us in these briefings being televised. I mean, this is democracy in action. This is an important part of the government in action. I think you were hired in large measure because you had an ability to assertively lay out the president's case in a way that perhaps hadn't been done before you were brought on. So the president recognized that: I need a forceful advocate who can be seen on television and who can seize that platform. At the same time, there are many of you watching. If you're watching on C-SPAN or you're here tonight, you want to watch not only the give and take but the topics to be addressed, and see the only representative of the White House on a daily basis, when the president does not speak, say what he wants to say but also be responsive to members of the press. And whether or not you think we accurately or justly represent the views of the American people, that's something that's very much up for debate. But it is a useful exercise. There's also a down side to it. If people think people are playing to the cameras, I can't control what Tony does." (Laughter, including from Snow.) "But I hope that some of my colleagues here will vouch for this."

April Ryan of American Urban Radio Networks: "I agree."

Gregory: "There is utility, and I also think there's a downside. Politics and political coverage has become so polarized in this country … It's the Internet and the blogs that have really used this White House press conference to somehow support positions out in America, political views. And they will clip and digitize portions of these briefings to fit into their particular argument. I think people try to divine motives of the questioners and certainly draw conclusions about the answers or non-answers based on their own political issues."

Snow: "I'm glad you raised the blog issue, because I think there'll be kind of a generational divide. Do any of you guys look at blogs much?"

Mark Knoller of CBS News, who was introduced as "the White House historian" because of his meticulous and unmatched recordkeeping: "I write a few, but I don't look at 'em much."

Stolberg of The New York Times: "I'm all for blogs. I'm all for the First Amendment. I think people ought to be empowered."

Snow: "We've got this new democratic age in the media. I'll occasionally punch it up. And it's amazing: You get this wonderful, imaginative, hateful stuff that comes flying out. Maybe one of the most important takeaways is the classical line: Not only should you not believe your own press, you probably shouldn't believe your opposition blogs, either. What do you think, Richard?"

Richard Wolffe, Newsweek senior White House correspondent: "I totally agree. David hit on a good point here that a lot of the blogs are trying to divine motive and bias. There seems to be this sort of witch hunt that's out there. A lot of the blogs are unduly devoted to media criticism which, itself, is kind of interesting given all the things you could comment on … The interesting thing, in looking at the political coverage as people try to look at what we do, is that they want us to play a role that really isn't our role. Our role is to ask questions and get information. The press briefing isn't Prime Minister's Question Time. It's not a chance for the opposition to take on the government and grill them to a point where they throw their hands up in surrender. Now, obviously there's a contentious spirit there. We're trying to get information. But it's not a political exercise, it's a journalistic exercise. And I think often the blogs are looking for us to be political advocates more than journalistic ones."

Snow: "Another sign of the times: My BlackBerry just went off."

DOJ_NMG_0135115

Gregory: "Want me to answer that?"

Snow: "The president says 'hi.' "

April Ryan: "I told you he was watching."

Snow: "Do you not think, April, that it is impossible as a reporter to try to bracket out your personal views or approach to things, or do you think that when you walk in as a journalist, somehow personal views go out the window and you can ask a crisp but thoroughly unslanted question?"

Ryan: "I've been there 10 years and I have to look at all sides – not just your side, but every side, and there's not necessarily two sides. But, Tony, you have to come in and see the full picture … I thank God for cameras. I thank God that it's on the record. Because the American public needs to see, there needs to be accountability. Those cameras keep everyone accountable."

CBS's Mark Knoller: "I'd like to ask my colleagues whether they're worried about the cases where a series of pointed questions risks dissolving into a debate. Do you sometimes worry that we're debating with Tony if we're not getting the answers we want? I make a great point of trying to ask pointed and blunt questions. But I'm not there to debate him. And if I don't like the answer that he's giving, well, I'm going to report what he said and what he didn't say. And I don't feel that I need to debate him in order to try to browbeat him into giving me what I'm looking for."

Gregory: "I see that a little bit differently." (Laughter.) "I don't see it as browbeating him or debating him. I see it as trying to provoke a little something that's closer to the real deal. Tony or any press secretary comes out there with a certain brief to argue or to impart. … When we're in the middle of a war and there are qualitative judgments being made, either by the White House or by its critics, and you're trying to push the White House – and, in this case, push Tony, to give an answer that he may not want to give, I think follow-ups and pointed questions are not inappropriate. So I don't necessarily see it as debating. But I agree with you, Mark, that at a certain point, you're either going to get it or you're not going to get it. But it's not a matter of going in there and saying, 'I want to get this such thing.' I assume he's not going to break down and say, 'Oh, gosh, you know, that's right. And what Nancy Pelosi said about the president, that's exactly right, and we fouled it all up.' I'm not looking for that. But I'm just trying to push him to what I think would be more candor than he's prepared to offer."

Snow: "Look, I think this is all legitimate. But it's part of the fun."

Snow: "We've got several parents up here. David, when you go home, what kind of reaction do you get from being on TV?"

Gregory: "I don't know, frankly. My kids seem caught up in their own many personal needs. But I will say that my oldest son, Max – he does pay attention – and he saw some video of the president where he was making a call from Camp David, so he was dressed casually. And he said, 'Daddy, how come the president doesn't have his news clothes on?' "

Snow: "My kids don't give a rip. They see me on TV, it means I'm not at home … It's very easy to overlook how cool it is to work at the White House. If we ever are insane enough to forget that, when you see your kids walking around in it, there's something very special. You just think, 'Whooooa! This is great!' "

Gregory: "It's funny, because Terry's daughter would watch the briefings and then thought that there shouldn't be any cameras."

For Norton And The City, The Wait May Be Over (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

It can't be easy being in Congress without a vote, but the District's delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton, has stuck it out for 16 long years, never truly a part of the club but always relentlessly knocking on the door seeking admittance.

Now, Norton is sure, success is in her sights. With Democratic leaders pledging to get it done and ample Republican support, the bill giving both the District of Columbia and Utah an additional voting seat is cruising along.

"Won't we be surprised if it doesn't happen -- but I tell you, it's in the stars," Norton said yesterday.

Not a moment too soon for Norton, a third-generation D.C. native, who had a long career in civil rights and as a tenured professor before serving in Congress. "This is really personal for me," she said. "My grandfather was a firefighter here."

The District's quest for voting rights and statehood has taken many roads for decades. Twenty years ago, legal experts believed only a constitutional amendment could give the city voting rights. But ultimately, only 16 of the 38 states needed voted to ratify the amendment. Most contemporary legal thinking, including an endorsement by the American Bar Association last year, declares the bill constitutionally sound.

Norton's bill, co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), must clear two committees before it is brought for a floor vote. Norton is hoping that will happen in March. Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Pelosi is committed to finalizing the bill's language, moving it through committees and having a floor vote as soon as possible.

The way the legislation is written, Norton could not automatically vote if it became law -- she would have to run for Congress in a special election. But Hill sources say that could change as the bill makes it way through the system.

What is likely to secure the measure's future is that it include a provision to add a congressional seat for Utah, which would probably be Republican, thereby balancing out the Democratic gain from the District.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity because it's seldom that you have a pairing of two jurisdictions," Norton said. "Either it happens now or it won't happen for a long time."

Cheney At Odds With McCain Over Rumsfeld (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday challenged GOP presidential hopeful John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld was one of the country's worst defense secretaries.

"John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong," said Cheney, a friend of Rumsfeld. He also disclosed that the Arizona senator had apologized to him for a previous comment that the vice president had "badly served" President Bush on Iraq.

"John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld," Cheney said in an interview with ABC News.

At a campaign event in Los Angeles, McCain said he stood by his remarks about Rumsfeld. He did not mention the vice president, and his campaign declined to comment on Cheney's remarks.

Despite having low job approval numbers overall, the vice president continues to be very popular among rank-and-file Republicans, and many of them are likely to vote in next year's GOP presidential caucuses and primaries.

McCain, who lost the Republican nomination to Bush in 2000, is expected to formally announce his second run for the White House next month. He faces strong challenges from Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and Rudy Giuliani, the ex-mayor of New York.

On the campaign trail this week, McCain has talked at length with voters about Iraq and defended his staunch support of Bush's 21,500-troop buildup there while criticizing the way the war has been handled.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," McCain said in Hilton Head Island, S.C., on Monday. "The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," McCain added.

Rumsfeld stepped down last year after a rocky six-year tenure.

A former defense secretary himself, Cheney was asked about McCain's comments while on the USS Kitty Hawk at the Yokosuka Naval Base in Japan. He called Rumsfeld a great secretary.

"I know a little bit about the job. I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances," Cheney said. "He and John McCain had a number of dustups over policy, didn't have anything to do with Iraq."

Last month, McCain blamed both Cheney and Rumsfeld for a "terribly mishandled" war.

"The president listened too much to the vice president . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense," McCain was quoted as telling The Politico, a Capitol Hill newspaper and Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0135117

A few days later, Cheney said, McCain approached him on the Senate floor, said he had been quoted out of context and offered an apology.

"I was happy to accept," Cheney said.

Democrats assailed McCain.

"He is trying to have it both ways by criticizing a war he always supported, while also trying to stick close to the president," said Luis Miranda, a Democratic National Committee spokesman. "If McCain wants to apologize, it should be to our brave troops and the voters he's misleading, not to Cheney and Rumsfeld."

Cheney Chastises McCain (POL)

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

President Bush and Vice President Cheney both say they have sworn off commenting on the '08 race, so their words are being parsed for glimmers of their view of the race to succeed them. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., was at odds with this president for years but has emerged as the most fervent backer of the White House Iraq policy of any high-profile official outside the administration.

But Cheney made it clear during an interview with ABC News Wednesday that he was none too pleased with McCain's declaration on Monday at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.: "I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history." McCain was greeted with applause.

Rumsfeld was forced from his job after November's election. Cheney, who was defense secretary under President George H.W. Bush, from 1989 to 1993, said at a Pentagon ceremony honoring Rumsfeld upon his departure in mid-December: "I believe the record speaks for itself: Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of Defense this nation has ever had."

The vice president is on a week-long trip to Japan and Australia and gave a 10-minute interview to ABC's Jonathan Karl aboard the USS Kitty Hawk, docked off the coast of Tokyo at Yokosuka Naval Base in Japan. Here is their exchange about McCain:

Karl: "You probably heard John McCain again come out and say that your friend Donald Rumsfeld is perhaps the worst secretary of defense ever. What do you make of that?"

Cheney: "I just fundamentally disagree with John. John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

Karl: "So what's your take on where Secretary Rumsfeld fits in?"

Cheney: "I think Don's a great secretary. I know a little bit about the job. I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances. He and John McCain had a number of dust-ups over policy, didn't have anything to do with Iraq -- other issues that were involved. John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong."

Karl: "I know we're just about out of time, but I wanted to clarify: Senator McCain had said that the problem with President Bush is he listened to you too much. So this is what he was apologizing to you for?"

Cheney: "Yes, yes."

Karl: "What did he say?"

Cheney: "Well, he came up to me on the floor a couple of days later, the next time I was on the floor of the Senate, said he'd been quoted out of context, and then basically offered an apology which I was happy to accept."

In January, McCain had told Roger Simon, chief political columnist of The Politico, during an interview at his Senate office: "The president listened too much to the vice president . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense."

Asked if he admired Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., for refusing to apologize for her 2002 vote to authorize the use of force against Iraq, the vice president started to answer but then demurred. "I'm not going to get involved in the presidential campaign," he said. "The president and I have both sworn off commenting on the give-and-take of the campaign in both parties. It's already well under way and so I'll withhold comment for now."

Similarly, Bush said jokingly at his East Room news conference last week after a question about Democrats: "I'd just like to establish some ground rules here with those of you who are stuck following me for the next little less than two years: I will resist all temptation to become the pundit-in-chief and commenting upon every twist and turn of the presidential campaign. As much as I like politics, and I'm intrigued by the race … I won't comment."

The vice president, did, however take a shot at House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. Earlier, during remarks at a rally for troops on the Kitty Hawk, Cheney had said, to applause: "I want you to know that the American people will not support a policy of retreat. We want to complete the mission, we want to get it done right, and then we want to return with honor."

Karl said during the interview: "You just made a very clear statement in your speech saying the American people do not support a policy of retreat."

"I believe that," Cheney said.

Karl pressed: "Is that policy that we hear from the Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi -- from other Democrats, is that a policy of defeat?"

The vice president replied: "Yes."

Cheney Argues Rumsfeld Served Well (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Vice President Cheney objected yesterday to Sen. John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld "will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history" and added that the senator had apologized to him for saying Cheney had misled President Bush on Iraq.

Cheney, speaking in an interview with ABC News yesterday during a week-long swing through Asia, said he "fundamentally disagrees" with the Arizona Republican's statement Monday about Rumsfeld, made while McCain was campaigning for president in South Carolina.

Bush replaced Rumsfeld in November after Democrats captured both chambers of Congress, a move that many congressional Republicans believe the president should have made before the election as the situation in Iraq soured. Although Rumsfeld's refusal to send a larger force to Iraq early in the invasion is seen by some as a crucial mistake, Cheney has maintained that Rumsfeld did an outstanding job under trying circumstances.

"I think Don's a great secretary. I know a little bit about the job," said Cheney, a former defense secretary. "I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances."

Cheney also countered McCain's assertion that the vice president misled Bush when it came to Iraq. "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized," Cheney said. "Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

McCain is expected to formally announce next month his second run for the White House. Long a vocal advocate of putting more troops into Iraq, he has strongly endorsed Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq even as he has harshly criticized Rumsfeld and Cheney for the way the war has been waged.

"The president listened too much to the vice president," McCain told the Politico last month. ". . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense."

In his interview, conducted aboard the USS Kitty Hawk at Yokosuka, Japan, Cheney said he encountered McCain in the Senate chambers. "Well, he came up to me on the floor a couple of days later, the next time I was on the floor of the Senate, said he'd been quoted out of context, and then basically offered an apology, which I was happy to accept," the vice president said.

McCain declined to comment on Cheney's remarks. "The senator's position on the war is well known," said Danny Diaz, McCain's spokesman.

"Ghosts Of Abu Ghraib": Fearlessly Facing The Shame (WP)

By Tom Shales

DOJ_NMG_0135119

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

"Ghosts of Abu Ghraib," a new HBO documentary produced and directed by Rory Kennedy, daringly approaches a scandal that hardly anyone wants to see reexamined -- least of all, one can safely assume, the Bush administration and the Pentagon.

The reason is not just that what happened at Abu Ghraib is, to understate in the extreme, unpleasant. The documentary says it's also because this breakdown was not so much nervous as inevitable -- and not so spontaneous, having been sanctioned by the top brass, including former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Skillfully and sparingly told without a narrator, with only occasional on-screen captions to help the narrative along, the film brings to life a sadly shameful moment in recent American history and does it without histrionics. But Kennedy (youngest of Bobby Kennedy's offspring) might have erred at the outset of her film by inadequately establishing the national mood that helped make Abu Ghraib possible: the understandable sense of shock, outrage and violation we all felt after the insane 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The visual reminders of those attacks consist of photographs and footage that show only physical destruction, the ghostly and ghastly remains of buildings. There doesn't appear to be a dead body in sight, almost as if the atrocities committed were extreme examples of architectural criticism. That weakens Kennedy's case. The photos she shows from Abu Ghraib are very explicit and, unlike the versions shown in newspapers and on television in 2004 when the story broke, uncensored.

We see naked prisoners in humiliating situations -- a man tied at the end of a leash, like a dog; a group of naked prisoners arranged in a lopsided human pyramid; men positioned in ways to suggest homosexual acts. Kennedy was right to show these pictures, but she should have been less genteel in what she showed of the 9/11 attacks. America violated the rules on interrogation of prisoners at Abu Ghraib, and for that, there is no excuse. But one must take into account the fury felt in the aftermath of 9/11 over monstrosities that also violated every covenant of "civilized" warfare.

This discrepancy doesn't really lessen the film's power. And in interviews with some of the men and women who perpetrated the torture, or who posed cheerfully (almost like tourists at Niagara Falls) with the victims, we see them looking anything but furious or consumed with wrath. Instead, they smile in the photos and, in the interview segments, they speak with a kind of numb, casual regret -- but nothing like wrenching shame or sorrow.

Perhaps just as unnerving and dispiriting as the photos is the story told by a former Abu Ghraib prisoner (photographed so as to disguise his identity) about how he begged guards to provide medical treatment for a fellow prisoner: his father.

When the man realized his father was ill, suffering shortness of breath and other symptoms, he says, he repeatedly begged that his dad be taken to a medical facility, only to be rebuffed by guards, told to go back to his cell and eventually threatened with being shot if he protested further. Fighting back tears as he finishes the story, the man remembers holding his stricken father in his arms as he died. The father, however, would not be listed officially as a fatality resulting from torture or neglect.

Kennedy suggests the torture was not an outbreak of lunacy but the direct result of policies handed down by Rumsfeld that were designed to circumvent the Geneva Conventions (which specify that prisoners of war be "treated humanely") and U.N. conventions against torture, to which the United States is, at least technically, a signatory. That was done by, among other things, refusing to classify the up to 6,000 inmates of Abu Ghraib as prisoners of war; Rumsfeld instead calls them "unlawful combatants" at a news conference. Then the term "torture" was redefined so narrowly in government memos that it would be almost impossible to commit it.

When the scandal broke, the administration sent out "conscious disinformation," one former official recalls, including the trivializing assertion that what happened at Abu Ghraib was just " 'Animal House' on the night shift." (Earlier, one of the military police stationed there recalls thinking of the place as " 'Apocalypse Now' meets 'The Shining,' except this is real and we're in the middle of it.")

It could easily be argued that it was the torturers and not the tortured who suffered the most as a result of what happened at Abu Ghraib. The damage done to the reputation of the United States was critical and criminal, and the torture that occurred can be seen as but a symptom of a much larger corruption: the pursuit of the war itself and the fallacious "evidence" fed to the American people to justify it.

The wider moral of the film is simpler and nonpolitical and painfully, poignantly evident: When you treat people as less than human, you become less than human yourself. "Ghosts of Abu Ghraib" will haunt those who see it long after the final frames have flickered out.

FEDERAL DIARY: Retiree Health Care Back On Hill Agenda (WP)

By Stephen Barr, D4

Washington Post, February 22, 2007

It's a classic pocketbook issue.

Since 2000, federal employees have been able to pay their health insurance premiums on a tax-free basis. Many federal retirees think they should get similar treatment.

But extending "premium conversion," as it's called, to retirees would require a change in tax law, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and others, who have pushed for that change in the last three congressional sessions, are back at it.

"We're talking about a modest amount of money, but to those on fixed income, this could have a real impact," Davis said as he again introduced a bill to extend the tax break. The bill would result in average savings of $820 a year for federal retirees, he estimated.

Under the bill, federal civil service and military retirees would pay their monthly health-care premiums through a pretax deduction from their annuities. The bill also would permit active-duty military personnel to deduct from their taxable income certain supplemental premiums or enrollment fees for Tricare, their military health insurance.

The tax code permits employees to pay for health insurance with deductions that are excluded from income and Social Security payroll taxes. It does not, however, allow employers to offer premium-conversion benefits to their retirees, the sore point that the Davis bill would address.

In recent years, Davis has gotten such legislation through the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which he chaired until this Congress. But the measure has always faltered because the House Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax policy, has balked at taking up the issue.

The likely cost of the bill appears to be the sticking point. According to a Congressional Budget Office estimate, extending the tax break to federal retirees would cost about $600 million over 10 years.

Davis hopes to build bipartisan support for this year's measure. Reps. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House majority leader; Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), who has a seat on Ways and Means; and Jon Porter (R-Nev.) have signed on as chief co-sponsors.

The Washington area congressional delegation and about half of the Ways and Means Committee also have agreed to be listed as co-sponsors of the bill, Davis said.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association and the Military Coalition, a group of 35 military and veterans organizations, are supporting the Davis effort.

"More than just retirees should care about this legislation," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the employees association. "Imagine the shock of a newly retired federal employee when she receives her first annuity check and learns that the federal government no longer uses pretax compensation to pay her share of health insurance premiums . . . just when it's needed the most."Hazards at Interior

An Interior Department study has found a number of health and safety hazards at the department's Main and South buildings, with about a dozen classified as potential threats to employees and the environment.

Mike Cyr, division chief for facilities management services, said that planning to correct hazards is underway and that a meeting with employee groups has been scheduled for March 1 to discuss the study's findings.

The study, conducted by a consultant Jan. 22-25, found that Interior needs to improve handling of hazardous waste, such as oil, paint, and fluorescent lamp tubes that could release mercury into the atmosphere if broken.

"Because no system for the proper disposal of hazardous waste or unneeded hazardous materials is provided to employees, the only options available to employees are to abandon these items in various mechanical spaces or discard them illegally," the study said.

The study was released by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, a watchdog group that has contended that the department's handling of a headquarters renovation project has routinely subjected Interior employees to chemical vapors, welding fumes and debris dust. About 2,000 employees work in the headquarters complex.

Frank Quimby, a department spokesman, said air quality is tested daily and meets standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency. Although the study found at least two areas where asbestos had crumbled and was loose, "there has been no dangerous exposure to employees," Quimby said. "These areas are fairly out of the way."

Studies to identify possible hazardous workplace conditions are planned for all of the department's major facilities. In this case, Quimby said: "We don't think it is something that should alarm employees or people who visit the building, because there is no actual threat to human health and safety. These are all potential threats."

Fresh Inflation Data To Keep Fed On Guard (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A widely watched gauge of consumer prices rose last month at the fastest rate since June, interrupting what had been a steadily improving inflation outlook in recent months.

The Labor Department said its index of "core" consumer prices, which excludes food and energy, rose 0.3% in January, after a string of three consecutive monthly increases of 0.1%. Those modest gains had begun to persuade economists that inflation was decelerating.

While any one-month pickup by itself is unlikely to cause alarm, economists said the uptick in core prices last month will keep Federal Reserve officials on guard for signs of renewed inflation pressures.

"The Fed is focused on inflation, and there are good reasons they are taking that stance," said Joel Naroff, chief economist of Naroff Economic Advisors, in a research note to clients. "This report tells us that inflation is still above" the level policy makers would prefer, and "that means the Fed will remain on inflation watch for quite some time."

Last month's increase in core prices was fueled by unusually sharp price increases for health care, which rose 0.8% from December, and in tobacco and smoking products, which leapt 1.5%. Darryl Jayson, vice president of the Tobacco Merchants Association, pointed to a recent wholesale-price increase for some premium brands and continuing tax increases on cigarettes -- including a new $1-a-pack levy in Texas -- as contributing factors.

Compared with a year earlier, core prices in January were up 2.7%, higher than December's 2.6% rate. Fed policy makers pay close attention to this measure because it offers a less-volatile picture of inflation trends over time. Overall, consumer prices rose 0.2% last month and were up 2.1% from a year earlier.

Last month's rebound in core prices probably wasn't a complete surprise to Fed officials, who have continually reiterated their concern that inflation could flare up again. Minutes of the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, released yesterday, indicated that Fed policy makers "did not yet see a downward trend in core inflation as definitively established," and they attributed part of the recent slowdown to temporary factors such as lower energy prices.

Still, Fed officials are unlikely at this point to see the January uptick in core prices, which was 0.256% before rounding, as a challenge to their view that inflation will slow over the course of the year.

Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen acknowledged yesterday that core inflation was "on the high side of expectations." But in a speech to a business group in Santa Clara, Calif., she added: "This followed three straight months" of low core inflation. "After smoothing through the volatility, this measure of inflation also has eased in recent months."

Ms. Yellen said she is still concerned about inflation pressures because the unemployment rate is probably lower than can be sustained over time without pushing up inflation. Economic growth would have to remain subdued "for a time" for the Fed to be sure the "economy is heading for a soft landing, with inflation continuing to move lower."

Also yesterday, the Conference Board, a New York private research group, said its index of leading economic indicators rose a modest 0.1% in January after a 0.6% gain in December. The group said the index "suggests that slow to moderate economic growth is likely to continue in the near term."

Consumer Price Gauges Rise More Than Expected (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Federal Reserve may expect more subdued inflation this year, but a small jump in consumer prices last month served as a reminder that those expectations are still far from being fulfilled.

As a result, analysts said, the Fed may yet find itself raising interest rates. Any cuts, it seems, will have to wait.

Prices accelerated last month on a wide variety of goods and services, from fresh fruit to hotel rooms to the cost of a hospital stay, the Labor Department reported yesterday. The overall rate of inflation climbed 0.2 percent in January after a rise of 0.4 percent in December.

Though inflation growth, as represented by the Consumer Price Index, slowed from December, it advanced faster than economists and Wall Street investors had expected. The rate of core inflation, a gauge that does not include food and energy and is closely monitored by the Fed, also surpassed economists' forecasts. It jumped 0.3 percent in January, compared with 0.1 percent in December.

The numbers stung Wall Street, and investors pushed many stocks lower yesterday. Bond traders, betting that the Fed would not lower interest rates anytime soon, nudged down the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note.

Before the Fed can act on interest rates in either direction, analysts said, it needs to have a clear indication that inflation is settling into a pattern, either higher or lower. But since the summer, consumer prices have been fickle, falling, flattening and then rising again.

"You can make a reasonable case that maybe inflation goes a little lower, or you can make a reasonable case that maybe it goes a little higher," the chief economist of MFR, Joshua Shapiro, said. "I think they're sitting there waiting to see if it breaks. If it breaks decisively one way or the other, then they'll act."

Minutes from the January meeting of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee, released yesterday after the customary three-week delay, indicated that the Fed was not on the verge of any significant shift in tone. "All members agreed that the predominant concern remained the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired," the minutes said.

They also showed that Fed officials discussed whether their tough tone on inflation was still appropriate and unanimously concluded that it was. All 11 Fed bankers who voted at the meeting agreed that "a change was not warranted at this time."

The Fed still has a lot to be concerned about, as the data released yesterday showed.

One factor officials pointed to during the January meeting as a potential obstacle to lower inflation was rising wages.

Yesterday, the Labor Department reported that the average earnings for workers in nonmanagement positions continued to advance at a brisk pace. After inflation, average earnings on both a weekly and hourly basis rose 2.1 percent in January. As recently as July, inflation was swallowing wage gains, leaving workers with negative real earnings.

The core inflation rate increased 2.7 percent from a year earlier, well above the 1 percent to 2 percent the Fed typically prefers. That reversed a four-month trend when the year-over-year core inflation rate fell or remained flat. After climbing as high as 2.9 percent in September, year-over-year core inflation fell to 2.6 percent in November and December.

"Inflation is still sticky, and higher than the Fed wants it to be," said Mickey D. Levy, chief economist with Bank of America. "And as long as it stays above 2 percent, the Fed is going to continue to express concern about it."

Overall inflation in January was 2.1 percent compared with a year earlier, down from 2.5 percent in December.

The Fed meets next on March 21. Most analysts expect it to keep the benchmark short-term interest rate at 5.25 percent, where it has been since August. But, as prices of contracts that allow traders to bet on future interest rates show, traders expect a rate cut before 2008.

Sharp rises in the costs of medical care (the most in more than 15 years) and tobacco (the most in almost 5 years) helped elevate core inflation in January, leading some economists to argue that temporary factors were causing an exaggeration of the figures.

"At first sight, the jump in January core consumer price inflation seems to signal renewed inflationary vigor," Kenneth Beauchemin of Global Insight wrote in a research note. But Mr. Beauchemin noted that the price increase for medical care in January was the fastest since 1991.

Food prices also rose the fastest in almost two years.

On the bright side, there were hints that the outlook for inflation in the long term was improving. Energy prices dropped 1.5 percent in January, after a 4.2 percent increase in December. Housing prices, including rent, rose at a slower pace.

When he addressed Congress two weeks ago, the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, said two major factors in the forecast for lower inflation this year were lower housing and energy costs. And many economists said yesterday that January's figures alone were not a reason to expect inflation to start rising at a troubling pace. "That's not going to cause them to run out and panic," Mr. Shapiro said.

But, as Mr. Bernanke has said, there is a degree of uncertainty to the Fed's forecast.

Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook, argued that the January consumer price data should alarm the Fed because it is probably a sign of things to come. A combination of rebounding economic growth, low unemployment and slowing worker productivity will push inflation higher, he said.

"Clearly this is not what the Fed wants to see," he wrote in a research note. "Bernanke has recently testified that core prices had been retreating, but January's numbers suggest we may have seen the lows for inflation in this cycle."

Slowing Economy Isn't Cooling Prices (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Inflation flared last month as rising prices for medical care, food and other items more than offset falling fuel prices, raising concern in financial markets that a slowing economy has not yet tamed price pressures.

Stock and bond prices fell after the Labor Department released its latest inflation figures, which convinced many investors that the Federal Reserve is not likely to cut interest rates any time soon and that it might have to raise them to subdue prices.

The department's consumer price index, a widely followed inflation gauge, rose 0.2 percent last month, as a 1.5 percent drop in fuel prices helped offset higher prices for many other goods and services.

The index was 2.1 percent higher than in January of last year -- a milder increase than the 2.5 percent rise for all of 2006. That's consistent with other recent data suggesting that overall, the economy has cooled.

But investors saw ominous trends in the details. Prices for gasoline and fuel oil tumbled last month because of falling crude oil prices, as natural gas prices fell because of unseasonably warm weather. Both trends have reversed in February, suggesting inflation will be higher this month.

And because oil prices swing so much, economists seek signs of underlying inflation by studying so-called core measures, which exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The department's core consumer price index jumped 0.3 percent in January -- the largest monthly increase since June. That left core prices 2.7 percent higher than a year earlier.

The higher core inflation resulted primarily from a rapid 0.8 percent increase in medical costs, including prices for prescription drugs, hospital care and visits to physicians' offices.

Food prices rose 0.7 percent in January, the biggest increase since April 2005. Airfare and hotel room rates climbed. Prices also increased for electricity, water, and sewer and trash collection, the department said.

"Inflation is not yet under control," Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, told clients. "Clearly this is not what the Fed wants to see."

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress last week that the central bank is likely to hold interest rates steady for a while to see whether slowing economic growth nudges inflation lower.

Inflation pressures have eased in recent months, but the monthly figures can jump around, so it will be "some time before we can be confident" that price pressures will continue to ease as the Fed forecast, Bernanke said.

He stressed that inflation remains too high, and Fed policymakers worry that it may climb higher. They are prepared to increase interest rates if necessary to force inflation lower, he said.

Bernanke and his colleagues are unlikely to raise interest rates because of one monthly inflation report but will if they see a series of similar reports in coming months, analysts said.

Fed policymakers forecast inflation to fall this year and next because of slower economic growth, cooled in large part by the slumping housing market. Recent data -- including flat retail sales, lower industrial production and plunging home construction in January -- show the economy is probably growing at a modest pace, around 2 percent a year, analysts said.

The Conference Board, a private business group, said yesterday that its index of leading economic indicators -- data such as building permits, consumer expectations and stock prices that hint at where the economy is heading -- rose slightly last month, by 0.1 percent. Analysts saw that as a sign that economic growth will keep to a modest pace in the months ahead.

Some of the price increases last month reflected temporary factors, such as crop freezes in California that boosted prices for some fruits and vegetables.

But analysts worried that some of the trends in the inflation report are likely to continue. Medical costs, for example, were 4.3 percent higher in January than a year earlier, and inflationary pressures in that sector are expected to continue as the aging U.S. population consumes more health care.

The increase in many food prices reflects federal efforts to encourage the production of ethanol as an alternative fuel, said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research. Higher demand for ethanol has boosted prices for corn, an ingredient in the fuel's production, as well as for other grains as farmers have shifted resources to produce more corn, he said. Corn is the main source of high-fructose corn syrup, a widely used ingredient in sweetened beverages and processed foods.

Yamarone said overall inflation is contained. But he forecast fuel prices to stay close to where they are now as food prices rise this year.

"You'll see people complaining less about their gasoline bills and more about their grocery bills," he said.

If inflation continues at this pace, workers may also complain about lagging pay. Average weekly earning for most workers fell 0.3 percent in January from the month before after adjusting for inflation, the Labor Department said in a separate report. These wages, paid to factory and non-managerial workers, were 2.1 percent higher last month than in January 2006, after adjusting for price changes.

Inflation Fears Rise As Price Index Gains 0.2% (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and his fellow policymakers worried during a meeting last month that inflation might not moderate as expected, a concern at least partially borne out by Wednesday's report that consumer prices rose more than expected in January.

According to newly released minutes of the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, the officials also discussed the possibility of changing an outlook statement closely watched by the markets. The statement for months has cited inflation as the biggest threat to the economy and warned that more interest rate increases could be needed to keep price pressures in check.

In the end, the Fed kept that language, and its bias toward rate increases. While the inflation rate has been lower in some measures, "all meeting participants expressed some concern about the outlook for inflation" and warned that "a failure of inflation to moderate as expected could impair the long-term performance of the economy," the minutes said.

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates unchanged for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006. The target for short-term rates, which influences borrowing costs economywide, is 5.25%, the highest in six years.

Brian Bethune of Global Insight says recent indicators show economic growth wasn't as rosy as the Fed estimated at last month's meeting. Still, the bump in the consumer price index means the Fed needs to keep a close eye on inflation. He expects rates to be steady for most of 2007.

The Labor Department said inflationary pressures at the consumer level rose in January as higher costs for food and medical care offset lower energy prices.

The CPI rose 0.2% in January following a 0.4% gain in December after adjusting for seasonal variations. Excluding often-volatile food and energy prices, the so-called core CPI rose 0.3% in January. That followed a 0.1% increase in December and was the biggest rise since June.

In the past year, core consumer inflation was 2.7%.

Economists, including central bank officials, pay particular attention to the core rate because it is considered a more reliable indicator of underlying inflation trends. Prices for a wide variety of goods, such as tobacco, hotel stays, clothing and medical care, rose.

Investors sold stocks after the report's release, fearing higher inflation would lead the Fed to raise interest rates in 2007. Some economists, such as those at UBS, said the January CPI increase was more likely because of temporary factors than an indication of a long-term trend. But others, such as those at Bear Stearns and First Trust Advisors, said the report sounded alarms.

"Inflation seems to be contained, but there are some causes for concern," says Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research. "One report does not a trend make," he says. But "Two or three more reports like this, the likelihood of a Fed rate hike increases." The Fed next meets March 20-21.

Fed Remains Cautious On Inflation (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The Federal Reserve grew more confident that inflation was moderating at its January policy meeting, minutes released on Wednesday revealed, but policymakers still did not see a downward trend in core inflation as “definitely established.”

The minutes show that all members of the Federal Open Market Committee agreed that the predominent risk remained inflation rather than growth.

Policymakers were more relaxed about the outlook for both inflation and growth than they had been in December.

However, while they regarded the risks from housing as “notable” they saw a new risk that demand might run too hot, potentially adding to pressure on prices.

US inflation rose faster than expected last month, led by increases in prescription drug prices, according to a separate fresh government figures.

Consumer prices rose 0.2 per cent in January while core inflation - excluding volatile food and energy prices - rose 0.3 per cent, according to the report.

The inflation increase tempered investor expectations of a rate cut later this year and pushed stocks lower, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling 0.25 per cent to 12,754.51 at the open.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury bonds rose to 4.7 per cent form 4.68 per cent as the market priced in a greater probability that the Fed would keep rates on hold for several months.

The surprisingly strong inflation figures stiffened the dollar, which beat back a brief rally by the yen when the Bank of Japan’s policy board raised interest rates for the first time in six months with an increase to 0.5 per cent

Meanwhile, Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said: “The 0.3 per cent gain in the January core CPI ended a three-month sequence of tepid 0.1 per cent readings. The details point to unwinding of unusual recent weakness in a number of categories rather than the start of a trend in the core CPI.”

Rising medical costs led the increase and helped offset a sharp fall in oil prices that had helped ease price pressures late last year.

Gasoline prices were 3 per cent lower than the previous month and 32 per cent lower than their peak in July 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0135126

Mr Ahmed said: “The January report confirms that the fourth-quarter’s sharp moderation in core inflation was partly due to transient factors.”

“The future path of core inflation will be determined by the interplay between upward pressures from resource utilisation and unwinding of earlier price shocks,” he added.

Global Economy Shrugs Off Oil, Housing Strains (WSJ)

By Yuka Hayashi, Joellen Perry And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The Bank of Japan's move to raise interest rates for the first time since July underscores the surprisingly upbeat state of the world's major economies, which continue to perk along despite the damage done by high energy prices and sagging housing markets.

The world's central bankers are so confident that growth will remain steady and inflation under control that their main worry is less the immediate future than whether conditions are breeding excessive speculation in financial markets.

Yesterday's move by the Bank of Japan reflected that confidence in its own economy as well as the broader world economy. Lifting rates to a still very low 0.5%, the bank said it "judged that our economy is likely to continue its...virtuous circle of production, income and spending," and that "uncertainties over the future course of overseas economies, including that of the United States, are abating."

Indeed, though the U.S. economy has slowed substantially from its torrid pace of a year ago, it has kept growing fast enough to keep unemployment down despite the housing slump. In the 13 countries that use the euro, growth is expected to abate from last year's six-year high but remain well above the sluggish pace of prior years. Data released yesterday show Spain joined Germany and Italy as standouts in the fourth quarter.

Globally, inflation is still low by recent historical standards, though higher than some central bankers would prefer. U.S. consumer prices, excluding food and energy, rose 2.7% over the past 12 months, the government said yesterday. Oil prices are off their peaks. Global stock markets are buoyant. (See related article.3)

"It's a pretty benign picture," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at U.S. forecaster Global Insight. "You've got at least moderate growth and inflation that looks for the moment like it's not out of control." The biggest risk he sees: too much of a good thing -- namely, a global economy so robust that it pushes up prices and prompts the U.S. and European central banks to boost interest rates.

Despite the rise of China, the U.S., Japan and Europe account for more than 70% of the global economy, according to J.P. Morgan Chase economists.

Central bankers' latest concern is that investors are underpricing risk, and bidding up prices of assets from corporate bonds to houses and in the process driving down returns on those assets, such as long-term interest rates. While for now that fosters global growth, some policy makers worry this can't last, and that an abrupt reversal in market perceptions about risk could trigger a drop in asset prices as investors pull back that could threaten growth.

Concerns about excessive risk-taking are being aired more frequently. "We want markets to be aware of the risks in one-way bets in general," European Central Bank President Jean-Claude Trichet said after meeting with his counterparts from other banks earlier this month. "We, in particular, think of carry trades" -- borrowing in countries like Japan with low rates to invest at higher rates in Europe and the U.S. -- "but not only carry trades."

Mr. Trichet and other policy makers also have expressed concern about a herd mentality in markets, possibly exacerbated by hedge funds piling onto similar trades, increasing the potential for excessive loss if the bets go bad.

Most central bankers remain more inclined to deem complacency a risk than a reason to raise rates. But in Tokyo, while attributing yesterday's rate increase primarily to confidence in the Japanese economy, Bank of Japan officials expressed concern that persistently low interest rates could fuel the carry trade, distorting markets in ways that could produce convulsive impacts on currencies, interest rates and global growth.

The BOJ governor, Toshihiko Fukui, said at a news conference that "extremely distorted movements in the financial market," including the yen carry trade, could "eventually have a negative impact on the real economy and prices." The central bank wanted to squelch expectations that Japanese rates would stay so low for very long in order to discourage investors from taking "extreme positions," he said.

U.S. Federal Reserve officials offer differing interpretations of markets' recent calm. Chairman Ben Bernanke attributes much to fundamental factors, such as emerging countries' funneling plentiful savings to the U.S. But Vice Chairman Donald Kohn sees more cause for worry.

"It would be imprudent to rule out sharp movements in asset prices and deterioration in market liquidity that would test the resiliency of market infrastructure and financial institutions," Mr. Kohn said in a speech in Washington.

Afterward, Mr. Kohn said markets are currently priced for "a very benign situation....I do get a little concerned -- or I wonder maybe -- at some of the low levels of volatility and the low levels of expected volatility."

Fed officials generally don't see market speculation as a reason to tighten monetary policy, or even keep it tight. Rather, they have cited the lack of spare economic capacity and an elevated inflation rate as a reason to maintain short-term interest rates at 5.25%, with a bias to raising them further.

Minutes from the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, released yesterday after the customary lag, indicate that Fed officials had become less worried about the prospect for both growth and inflation. Data show "somewhat smaller risks to economic growth as well as improved prospects for core inflation," the minutes said.

Data released since that meeting show retail sales, housing starts and industrial production all weakened in January, and the strong fourth-quarter growth number, 3.5%, is likely to be revised down substantially next week. If unemployment also starts to edge higher, as Fed officials expect, they may begin to signal more concern about slowing growth and less about rising inflation in coming months. The minutes suggest there was more debate than usual in January about whether to continue saying inflation risks might yet require higher interest rates, as the Fed statement ultimately did.

In the European economy, recent surprises have nearly all been on the upside lately. "The euro area really surprised on all levels late last year, weathering both a downturn in demand from the U.S. and a rise in the euro, and we expect the positive momentum to continue this year," says Julian Callow, chief European economist with Barclays Capital in London. Exports remain the 13-nation bloc's mainstay, but the labor market is also improving and that could bolster consumer spending. The number of people at work in Germany, which has the region's largest economy, reached a five-year high in 2006.

Despite signs that this year's growth won't match last year's, the signs of strength are likely to push the ECB to raise interest rates this year, with many analysts predicting a boost to 4% by June from today's 3.5%.

Political uncertainty is a risk, as well, with the surprise resignation yesterday of Italian Premier Romano Prodi, elections approaching in France, and Britain facing a change in leadership as well. (See related article.4)

Yesterday's move in Tokyo was the first since the BOJ in July ended its five-year-old stance of keeping its benchmark rate at zero, an emergency measure taken to nurse Japan out of a long period of low growth and falling prices. Prices are hardly rising, today. Japan's core consumer-price index -- which excludes volatile fresh-food prices but includes energy -- rose just 0.1% in December from a year earlier. Economists think the index could fall over the next several months because of declines in oil prices.

The Japanese economy surged at an annualized growth rate of 4.8% in the final three months of 2006. But economists say much of that was due to an unsustainable bounce-back of consumer spending after six months of very slow growth.

Stocks Brush Off Inflation Data, Crude's Rise (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay And Craig Karmin

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The stock market reacted with little more than a shrug -- with the Dow down and the Nasdaq up -- as crude oil topped $60 a barrel for the first time this year and investors fretted about monetary policy in the U.S. and Japan.

The Bank of Japan raised its key interest-rate target a quarter percentage point, to 0.5%, a move that will increase borrowing costs there and could discourage investment, including in U.S. shares. (See related article1.)

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 48.23 points, or 0.4%, to 12738.41, ending five days of gains. It is up 2.2% on the year.

In the U.S., fresh inflation data from the Labor Department showed bigger increases in consumer prices in January than Wall Street expected. Analysts interpreted the report as a sign interest-rate cuts by the Federal Reserve aren't imminent, contrary to some investors' hopes.

"If [Fed policy makers] are going to err, they're going to err on the side of keeping inflation under control," said Gordon Fowler, chief investment officer at Philadelphia money-management firm Glenmede Trust.

That would likely mean holding rates steady awhile longer, Mr. Fowler said, perhaps well into the second half. In turn, that could mean little or no "cheap money" flooding into the stock market from investors benefiting from reduced borrowing costs.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 2.05 points, to 1457.63, up 2.8% on the year. But the technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index edged up 0.2%, or 5.38 points, to 2518.42, up 4.3% on the year.

Refinery and pipeline problems pushed crude-oil futures for April delivery up $1.22, or 2.1%, to $60.07 a barrel, its first close above $60 this year. Still, oil is off 1.6% this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange and down 22% from its record in July.

In currency markets, the Bank of Japan's decision failed to lift the yen, as traders said a popular financial maneuver, known as the carry trade, remained intact. The carry trade involves borrowing money in a country with low interest rates and putting that money into countries that pay higher rates. Because Japanese rates have long hovered around zero, the yen has been particularly popular for borrowing in this kind of trade.

If Japanese rates continue rising, as expected, many fear the carry trade could unwind rapidly, rattling currency and bond markets world-wide. Financial markets in countries with higher rates, from New Zealand to Iceland, could be particularly vulnerable.

Because Japanese rates remain so low, analysts were quick to dismiss the move by the Bank of Japan as an immediate threat to the carry trade. Also, Japanese officials suggested that any further rate increases will come gradually.

"It's going to take more than that to upset the carry trade," said Adnan Akant, a currency specialist at New York money manager Fischer Francis Trees & Watts.

The yen fell against the dollar to 120.88 yen compared with 119.99 yen, touching one-week lows against the U.S. currency during the trading session.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.5%, or 1.20 points, to 252.44.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed2 and bond prices fell3. The 10-year note fell 3/32 point, or 93.8 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.692%. The 30-year bond fell 5/32 to yield 4.790%.

The dollar strengthened4. In addition to the gain on the yen, the euro was steady at $1.3139.

McCain Slams Bush On Global Warming, Iraq Policy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

The Arizona senator criticizes White House decision-making during a tour of the L.A. and Long Beach ports.

Republican presidential candidate John McCain was anything but subtle Wednesday as he took swipes at the Bush administration during a meticulously staged appearance with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on the bustling docks of Los Angeles Harbor.

President Bush's record on global warming? "Terrible," McCain declared. His pursuit of the Iraq war? "A train wreck."

If the point of the Arizona senator's visit was to put distance between himself and his party's unpopular president, McCain was following a pattern set by Schwarzenegger in his reelection campaign. For McCain, the task is especially important because his vocal support for Bush's recent troop buildup in Iraq threatens a voter backlash.

DOJ_NMG_0135129

In what was billed as a nonpolitical event to call for tougher federal action to stop global warming, McCain joined Schwarzenegger for a hazy morning helicopter tour of the Long Beach and Los Angeles ports. The Republican duo flew over the future site of a hydrogen power plant that would pump carbon dioxide into the ground instead of the air.

Later, standing side by side amid the roar of engines as cranes hoisted cargo containers onto ships and trucks, Schwarzenegger lavished praise on McCain ("a great, great senator, a great national leader"), raising the question of whether he supports him for president.

All signs to the contrary, Schwarzenegger said, "We're not doing presidential politics here" — but not before McCain wisecracked: "I think it's the endorsement, yes."

One of McCain's chief Republican rivals, Rudolph W. Giuliani, had to settle recently for a private steak dinner and cigars with Schwarzenegger in the governor's Sacramento hotel suite.

But on the San Pedro docks, Schwarzenegger offered McCain access to his usual retinue of trailing TV crews, and McCain used the opportunity to pound Bush on a number of fronts.

"I would assess this administration's record on global warming as terrible," McCain said, recalling that he got "no cooperation from the administration" at Senate hearings on the subject. He pronounced himself "very happy to see the president mention global warming and a renewed commitment from the administration to this issue." But he added tartly: "It's long overdue."

(White House spokesman Tony Fratto declined to respond directly to McCain but said Bush had "set an ambitious goal for our nation to cut greenhouse gas emissions, and we're meeting it.")

Asked about the scathing remarks he has made on the administration's conduct of the war, McCain said his criticism started three years ago "when I saw that this train wreck was taking place, and that we needed more troops, and we needed a different strategy."

As the campaign has heated up in recent weeks, McCain has repeatedly criticized the administration.

In South Carolina on Monday, McCain said former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would "go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history." ("I stand by my comment about Secretary Rumsfeld," he responded to a question on that topic in San Pedro.) In an interview last month with a politico.com columnist, McCain said that Bush had been "very badly served" by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, who shot back Wednesday.

"I just fundamentally disagree with John," Cheney told ABC News. "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

Cheney praised Rumsfeld for doing a "superb job."

"He and John McCain had a number of dust-ups over policy," Cheney said. "Didn't have anything to do with Iraq — other issues that were involved. John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong."

McCain, whose campaign spokesman, Danny Diaz, declined to respond to Cheney's comments, was not entirely acidic toward the Bush White House at his harbor stop with Schwarzenegger. He said he was still "strongly supporting" Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops to U.S. forces in Iraq, a stand that could cost McCain support among the independents and moderates who are crucial parts of his political base.

As for the fight against global warming, an effort that Schwarzenegger made a centerpiece of his reelection campaign, McCain portrayed California as a model for Congress to take action. He voiced support for the kind of mandatory reductions in carbon emissions that California enacted last year.

"I'm here," he said, "because I think that California leads the nation, and we all know that in many respects — much to the dismay sometimes of us in Arizona, particularly when it comes to the theft of Arizona's water."

Schwarzenegger Lavishly Praises McCain (AP)

By Michael R. Blood, Ap Political Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger offered his most lavish praise yet Wednesday for any 2008 presidential candidate, calling John McCain a "great senator" and "very good friend" who shared his views on critical issues like the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0135130

The celebrity governor stopped short of a formal declaration of support for McCain's budding candidacy, but their appearance together in the Port of Los Angeles was a strong reminder that the two maverick Republicans share a well-developed friendship.

The Arizona senator joked that he was endorsed by Schwarzenegger. Then Schwarzenegger said their joint appearance wasn't about politics.

"We share common philosophy and goals for this country," McCain noted.

The governor called McCain a "great, great leader

Coming off a decisive re-election in November, the governor appears eager to assume a more prominent role in national affairs. His push to move California's presidential primary to Feb. 5 from June could give the state — and by association him — much greater influence in the 2008 presidential sweepstakes.

With McCain at his side, Schwarzenegger called for a national low-carbon fuel standard for transportation fuels, similar to standards in California intended to make fuel burn cleaner. It wasn't clear how such a standard would be put in place, or if it would become a centerpiece of McCain's nascent campaign.

"I know that Senator McCain sees the value of bringing to Washington the same kind of programs that we have put into place right here in California," Schwarzenegger said.

The senator and Schwarzenegger have shared a bond going back years. McCain has headlined fundraisers for Schwarzenegger in California, and they've campaigned together. The governor's 2006 campaign manager is now a senior adviser to McCain's campaign.

GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-cut Pledge (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The two front-runners for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani -- have not signed an anti-tax-increase pledge that has been embraced by several of their rivals.

The reluctance of the party's two leading candidates to sign the pledge, which has been signed by every Republican presidential nominee since 1988, raised concerns among conservative tax cutters about Mr. McCain's and Mr. Giuliani's commitment to reduce tax rates at a time when all of the Democratic presidential contenders have vowed to raise income taxes if they are elected.

"I can't imagine that McCain wouldn't sign it or that Giuliani wouldn't sign it. I can't imagine any Republican not signing that," said Jack Kemp, architect of the tax cuts signed by President Reagan in the 1980s.

The pledge, which asks the candidates to sign a statement declaring they will "oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates," could become an issue for both men as they vie for the support of their party's economic conservatives -- especially for Mr. McCain who was a foe of President Bush's tax cuts until he began actively running for president last year.

The Arizona senator, who has been aggressively reaching out to the conservative base of his party to secure the nomination, was one of only two Republicans who voted against Mr. Bush's $1.35 trillion across-the-board tax cuts in 2001. He also opposed accelerating the tax cuts in 2003, but changed his mind last year and voted to extend the tax cuts, including those on stock dividends and capital gains.

Mr. Giuliani has yet to fully set forth his views on tax policy, but, like Mr. McCain, has said that the Bush tax cuts, most of which are due to expire in 2010, should be made permanent.

"Senator McCain has over a 20-year record of opposing tax increases and the senator's record speaks for itself," said Danny Diaz, chief spokesman for the McCain campaign.

"The senator supports making the tax cuts permanent. There has been no stronger voice in Washington, D.C., for fiscal discipline," Mr. Diaz said.

But when asked if the senator would or would not sign the pledge never to raise tax rates if he should become president, he replied, "no comment."

DOJ_NMG_0135131

A spokesman for Mr. Giuliani yesterday also declined to say whether the former mayor, who leads Mr. McCain in many voter preference polls, intended to sign the pledge.

"Mayor Giuliani has a strong record of cutting taxes" in New York, said Maria Comella, deputy communications director for the Giuliani campaign. When asked directly if he will sign the pledge, she replied, "His record speaks for itself."

The pledge is a written document that has been circulated among Republican candidates since 1986 by Americans for Tax Reform (ATR), a tax-cut advocacy group that has been an influential force in the tax-cut battles of the past two decades. Every Republican presidential nominee since then has signed it, making it a ritual threshold for candidates to demonstrate their opposition to higher taxes.

Grover Norquist, president of ATR, said yesterday that the pledge has been signed by several Republican presidential contenders, including former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, and former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III.

"In my conversations with each of the campaigns, it is my expectation that before the summer's out all of the Republicans running for president will have signed the pledge," Mr. Norquist said last night.

Mr. Romney, who has made his economic conservatism the centerpiece of his campaign, signed the pledge on Dec. 31, a few days before he left the governorship.

Those who have not signed it, besides the two front-runners, include Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel (who has signed previously as a senator) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

"McCain has signed it in the past and I assume he will sign it again, and I expect Mr. Giuliani to sign it," Mr. Norquist said.

Some Republican tax cutters expressed dismay yesterday that neither of the two front-runners had signed the pledge at this point in the two-year election cycle.

"I can't imagine why they wouldn't sign a statement against raising the tax rates. Someone might not want to bind themselves down to any tax increases, on cigarettes or something like that, but this says tax rates," Mr. Kemp said.

"I'd sign it, but I'm not running. But the bigger issues are reforming the tax code to make it simpler and more efficient and bringing the tax rates down for maximum economic growth," he said.

So You Want To Run ... (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

I want you to know I've shelved the idea of writing a book called "The Idiot's Guide to Winning the Republican Presidential Nomination." But that doesn't mean I don't have ideas. Here are a few rules the G.O.P. contenders should follow if they want to sweep this thing.

First: Be the Snowball. The conventional view is that Feb. 5 is going to be the decisive day of the race, when California, New Jersey, Illinois and a bunch of other states will probably have their primaries. That's wrong.

Since so many states will be voting then, the candidates will be stretched thin in all of them. As a result, the Republican candidate who does best in the first three states — Iowa, New Hampshire and, on Feb. 2, South Carolina — will sweep on Feb. 5 through sheer momentum.

You want to be that snowball rolling downhill. Focus your efforts on the first three, especially New Hampshire. Win those, and the big states will take care of themselves.

Second: Remember the Rule of Three. When three big candidates go up against one another, two of them often get into a mutually destructive grudge match and the third skates through to victory. (Right now, the McCain and Romney camps seem set to brawl, leaving Giuliani alone.) Whatever you do, don't let yourself become one of the duelists.

Third: Don't Be a University. Most campaigns organize their policy experts like academic departments — economists on one committee, social policy types on another, religious leaders on a third. They come up with utterly conventional recommendations.

You want to organize your committees according to priorities. For example, create a Flourishing Families Committee. Get economists, religious activists and psychologists in one room to figure out how government can reduce stress on struggling families. You'll be surprised by how much interdisciplinary creativity you can unleash and how much closer you get to the problems of real people.

Most of all, you'll break free from the useless categories most pundits use to define Republicans: social conservative, free market libertarian, neoconservative. If you define yourself by those categories, you're dead.

Fourth: Be the Change. You are running to lead a traumatized party. Many Republicans think their party can recover from recent setbacks by returning to the old verities: cutting spending, cutting taxes, attacking government bureaucrats.

That's wrong. The world has changed since the glory days of the 1980s, and no amount of Reagan nostalgia will bring those conditions back.

For example, Republicans in the 1980s could win by promising to expand freedom and reduce overbearing government. But today, post-9/11, most Americans aren't anxious because their freedoms are being impinged. They're anxious because there's chaos all around: foreign policy chaos, fiscal chaos, cultural chaos. The authority structures they rely on have let them down.

You need to lead the party to a new definition of Republicanism. This is a Republicanism that can provide safety, order and authority, so people can feel secure enough to pursue their dreams. This doesn't mean championing a big government. It means championing a strong government that can do the jobs it is supposed to do.

Your main job over the next few months is to come up with a governing philosophy that explains how individual freedom can be enhanced by a strong, limited and energetic federal government.

Fifth: Make an Offer They Can't Refuse. If your last name is Giuliani, McCain or Romney, social conservatives are never going to love you. Don't try to pander to gain their devotion. Instead, offer them a deal.

Tell them: You social conservatives may not agree with me on everything. You may doubt my recent conversions on your issues. You may not even like me. But I'm the guy who can deliver on four programs you want. Then pick out four programs you and they can agree on and repeat them in every speech for the next year.

Sixth: Get Ready for Phase II. Over the next several months, the surge in Iraq will dominate debate. But by late summer, the surge will either have succeeded or failed. A new, broader debate will start. One candidate will define the landscape by coming up with a new Grand Strategy for the war against extremism. Be that guy.

Seventh: Win the T.R. Primary. Many of you admire Theodore Roosevelt. You've got his picture on your walls. Every day, as the campaign madness swirls around, wake up and ask, Would T.R. be proud of what I'm doing? If not, take a risk. Do something else.

Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Hillary is not David Geffen's dreamgirl.

"Whoever is the nominee is going to win, so the stakes are very high," says Mr. Geffen, the Hollywood mogul and sultan of "Dreamgirls," as he sits by a crackling fire beneath a Jasper Johns flag and a matched pair of de Koonings in the house that Jack Warner built (which old-time Hollywood stars joked was the house that God would have built). "Not since the Vietnam War has there been this level of disappointment in the behavior of America throughout the world, and I don't think that another incredibly polarizing figure, no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is — and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? — can bring the country together.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family. Americans are dying every day in Iraq. And I'm tired of hearing James Carville on television."

Barack Obama has made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles.

DOJ_NMG_0135133

She didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going." But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed.

"Hillary is livid that Obama's getting the first big fund-raiser here," one friend of hers said.

Who can pay attention to the Oscar battle between "The Queen" and "Dreamgirls" when you've got a political battle between a Queen and a Dreamboy?

Terry McAuliffe and First Groupie Bill have tried to hoard the best A.T.M. machine in politics for the Missus, but there's some Clinton fatigue among fatigued Clinton donors, who fret that Bill will "pull the focus" and shelve his wife's campaign.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Mr. Geffen says, adding that if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it. "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

She is overproduced and overscripted. "It's not a very big thing to say, 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Mr. Geffen says. "She's so advised by so many smart advisers who are covering every base. I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms."

The babble here is not about "Babel"; it's about the battle of the billionaires. Not only have Ron Burkle and David Geffen been vying to buy The Los Angeles Times — they have been vying to raise money for competing candidates. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket magnate, is close to the Clintons, and is helping Hillary parry Barry Obama by arranging a fund-raiser for her in March, with a contribution from Mr. Spielberg.

Did Mr. Spielberg get in trouble with the Clintons for helping Senator Obama? "Yes," Mr. Geffen replies, slyly. Can Obambi stand up to Clinton Inc.? "I hope so," he says, "because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective."

Once, David Geffen and Bill Clinton were tight as ticks. Mr. Geffen helped raise some $18 million for Bill and slept in the Lincoln Bedroom twice. Bill chilled at Chateau Geffen. Now, the Dreamworks co-chairman calls the former president "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country."

They fell out in 2000, when Mr. Clinton gave a pardon to Marc Rich after rebuffing Mr. Geffen's request for one for Leonard Peltier. "Marc Rich getting pardoned? An oil-profiteer expatriate who left the country rather than pay taxes or face justice?" Mr. Geffen says. "Yet another time when the Clintons were unwilling to stand for the things that they genuinely believe in. Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The mogul knows it's easy to mock Hollywood — "people with Priuses and private planes" — and agrees with George Clooney that it's probably not helpful for stars to campaign for candidates, given the caricatures of Hollywood.

I ask what he will say if he ever runs into Bill Clinton again. " 'Hi,' " he replies. And will he be upset if Hillary wins and he never gets to sleep in the Lincoln Bedroom again?

"No," he says with a puckish smile. "It's not as nice as my bedroom."

Obama, Clinton Rivalry Flares Over Donor (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Brendan Riley

AP, February 21, 2007

The rival presidential campaigns of Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama traded accusations of nasty politics Wednesday over Hollywood donor David Geffen, who once backed Bill Clinton but now supports his wife's top rival.

The Clinton campaign demanded that Obama denounce comments made by the DreamWorks movie studio founder, who told New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd in Wednesday's editions that while "everybody in politics lies," the former president and his wife "do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The Clinton camp also called on Obama to give back Geffen's $2,300 contribution.

Campaigning in Iowa, Obama refused.

"It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," the Illinois senator said.

For her part, New York Sen. Clinton sidestepped questions, leaving the issue to her aides to discuss.

"I'm just going to stay focused on my campaign and I'm going to run a positive campaign about the issues that affect the people in our country," she told The Associated Press in an interview in Nevada. She was participating a candidate forum in Carson City.

The Clinton team seemed eager to continue the attack. With Obama in Iowa, aides arranged for former Iowa attorney general Bonnie Campbell to criticize him in a conference call with reporters.

In the newspaper interview, Geffen also said Bill Clinton is "a reckless guy" and he does not think Hillary Clinton can bring the country together during a time of war, no matter how smart or ambitious she is.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs added another criticism of Clinton.

"It is also ironic that Senator Clinton lavished praise on Monday and is fully willing to accept today the support of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who said if Barack Obama were to win the nomination, he would drag down the rest of the Democratic Party because 'he's black,'" Gibbs' statement said.

Ford later apologized. The Clinton campaign said it disagreed with Ford, but the senator has embraced his support.

Another Democratic presidential candidate, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, said at the candidate forum that Obama should denounce Geffen's comments. "We Democrats should all sign a pledge that we all be positive," Richardson said.

Obama Dismisses Clinton Campaign Complaint (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 22, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, in Iowa today, responded to criticism from fellow senator and candidate Hillary Clinton's campaign that he's engaged in "slash and burn" politics.

Obama dismissed the Clinton campaign's demand that he apologize for remarks made by a Hollywood financial supporter who strongly criticized Clinton.

Obama said he "can't be responsible for the statements of every individual" and said voters and candidates alike have more pressing issues that deserve focus.

"My suspicion is that the voters in Iowa are more concerned about what both myself and Senator Clinton think about Iraq," Obama, a U.S. senator from Illinois, said.

Obama met with reporters at the state Capitol this afternoon prior to a scheduled town hall meeting tonight at the Polk County Convention Center. The event was expected to draw thousands of people. He also attended a private meeting with Iowa House and Senate Democrats.

Clinton's staff complained today about remarks by Los Angeles media mogul and former Clinton supporter David Geffen, who now supports Obama. "Everybody in politics lies, but they (the Clintons) do it with such ease, it's troubling," Geffen said in a New York Times column by Maureen Dowd.

Clinton's campaign demanded that Obama denounce Geffen's remarks and return donations he had made to the campaign.

"I think what's so surprising and disappointing is that Senator Obama has a discussion with the people of Iowa and America about the politics of hope and the need to change the tone of politics in this country," former Iowa attorney general

Bonnie Campbell, a senior campaign strategist for Clinton, said. " I find it inconsistent that he would not distance himself from what was clearly a personal attack on

Senator Clinton and the Clinton presidency, for that matter."

Although his campaign issued a response shortly after Clinton's statement, Obama said he had only heard of the comments upon getting off his plane in Des Moines.

"It's not clear to me, why would I be apologizing for someone else's remarks? I confess that I haven't read the whole article. My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have problems with the Clintons, but that doesn't affect this campaign," he said.

"I've said repeatedly I have the utmost respect for Senator Clinton. I consider her an ally in the Senate, and I will continue to consider her in that way throughout this campaign."

Other Democratic presidential candidates and their staffs have already weighed in on the issue. Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said, in a statement, "The Democratic Party doesn't have time for this kind of negative politics. David Geffen should apologize today for his statements about Bill and Hillary Clinton … The country doesn't want to go down this road of personal insults."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson called for a positive campaign pledge. "We Democrats should sign a pledge that we are going to be positive. That is what the American people want and that is how we're going to win it," he said.

Today marked Obama's second visit to Iowa in as many weeks. Obama chose the Iowa event over a Carson City, Nev., forum sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

Obama cited a tight schedule as the reason he was unable to attend the Nevada forum.

"We were interested in campaigning here in Iowa; we had already started scheduling some things," he said. "I have a slight disadvantage, as some of my other Senate colleagues do in terms of not having that many days … and we thought it was more important to be here in Iowa."

Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

An increasingly acrimonious competition between Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton to enlist the Democratic Party's leading fundraisers and operatives burst into the open yesterday, overshadowing what was billed as the presidential campaign's first gathering of candidates in Nevada.

While Clinton (N.Y.) and Obama (Ill.) have not for the most part taken their competition public, their campaigns in recent weeks have been trumpeting each victory, such as the recruitment of a major Boston-based rainmaker by Obama and a prominent African American state senator from South Carolina by Clinton.

The back-and-forth between the two campaigns has largely been fodder for political insiders. Yesterday, however, David Geffen, the music and film producer who is one of the party's most prominent donors, made the fight more public. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Geffen said that Clinton is "the easiest to beat" of the Democratic field and skewered her unwillingness to apologize for her 2002 vote to use force in Iraq. "It's not a very big thing to say 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Geffen said.

Geffen, who was a co-host of an Obama fundraiser Tuesday night in Los Angeles, saved even sharper criticism for former president Bill Clinton, to whom he was close before a falling-out over the pardoning of financier Marc Rich at the end of Clinton's second term. "I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen said in an oblique reference to questions surrounding the former president's private life.

After seeing the comments yesterday morning, the Clinton campaign immediately issued a call for Obama to disavow Geffen's remarks and return his $2,300 donation, arguing that they were contrary to Obama's pledge to run a positive campaign.

"A day after Barack Obama goes out and eschews the politics of slash-and-burn, his campaign embraces the politics of trash," said Phil Singer, Clinton's deputy communications director, referring to a speech Obama made Tuesday in Las Vegas.

Obama communications director Robert Gibbs took a markedly different course. After refusing to get in the "middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," Gibbs pointed out that Hillary Clinton had recently praised Robert Ford, another South Carolina state senator who endorsed her and said the Democratic ticket would be in serious trouble if Obama was the nominee because of the color of his skin. Clinton distanced herself from that remark, and Ford later apologized for it.

Obama weighed in later. "It's not clear to me why I would be apologizing for someone else's remarks," he said in Iowa, where he had gone instead of the candidates forum because of a prior commitment. "My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have differences with the Clintons, but that doesn't really have anything to do with our campaign."

At the forum in Carson City, Nev., ABC's George Stephanopoulos, the moderator, asked Clinton whether she agreed with her campaign spokesman that Obama should disavow Geffen's comments.

Clinton did not answer directly. "I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said. "I think we should stay focused on what we're going to do for America." She then added, to applause: "And, you know, I believe Bill Clinton was a good president. I'm very proud of the record of his two terms."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson sided with Clinton and called on Obama to denounce Geffen's comments. "I think these name-callings are not good," he said. "I don't know Mr. Geffen. I don't know what was said. . . . But we don't need that. We Democrats should sign a pledge that we all be positive. That's what the American people want."

While her campaign was on the attack against Obama, Clinton found herself on the defensive once more over Iraq. She was challenged again to explain her vote for the 2002 resolution authorizing the war and her reluctance to call that vote a mistake or to express regret for it.

"My vote was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances that I had at the time," Clinton said. "And I have taken responsibility for my votes and I believe that none of us should get a free pass. It is us up to the voters to judge what each of us has said and done."

Yesterday's forum was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME). In addition to Clinton and Richardson, participants included Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, former senator John Edwards (N.C.), Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (Ohio) and former senator Mike Gravel (Alaska).

The forum highlighted the West's emerging role as a significant player in the Democratic nomination process. Nevada is scheduled to hold its caucuses five days after the Iowa caucuses, the second contest on the 2008 Democratic calendar.

AFSCME President Gerald McEntee said the union hopes to endorse one of the Democrats before the primary elections. But he said the process will be slower, given the union's experience of having endorsed Howard Dean four years ago, only to see his campaign implode.

Iraq and health care dominated the forum. Vilsack offered the clearest call for Congress to stop funding the Iraq war and bring the troops home. But Biden warned that hasty withdrawal could leave the region in chaos. "People say just get out," he said. "Everybody wants to get out, no one faster than I want to get out. But if that civil war metastasizes into a regional war, we're going to be sending your grandchildren back."

Dodd was asked whether Clinton should apologize for her vote on the war. "Senator Clinton will speak for herself," he said, adding: "When you've made a mistake, there's nothing wrong with admitting that, in my view. . . . It was a mistake, in my view, to vote the way we did five years ago on that resolution."

Edwards, who also supported the authorization of the war, issued what sounded like a clear challenge to the New York senator to say she is sorry for her vote.

"We need a leader who will be open and honest with you and with the American people," he said. "Who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake, who will take responsibility when they've made a mistake."

Asked whether what Clinton had said about her vote was inadequate, he replied, "Whether it's good enough is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge."

Clinton, Obama, Come Out Swinging (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- One day after Sen. Barack Obama made a glittery statement with a Hollywood fundraiser that brought in an impressive $1.3 million, the top two Democratic presidential contenders went after each other in the first big food fight of the 2008 presidential election.

It started when David Geffen slammed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York in remarks published Wednesday morning, accusing the presidential candidate of lying with "such ease" compared to other politicians, dismissing her husband, former President Bill Clinton, as "reckless," and blasting the Clinton "machine." Geffen, a powerful Hollywood producer and executive, was once a major Clinton supporter but has switched to Obama and was a host of Tuesday's bash.

The Clinton campaign, perhaps stung by Obama's successful incursion into Hollywood, which at one time was unchallenged Clinton country, hit back hard, saying Geffen's comments contrasted poorly with the Illinois senator's self-promotion as a new breed of politician, unifying and optimistic.

"If Sen. Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson. "While Democrats should engage in a vigorous debate on the issues, there is no place in our party or our politics for the kind of personal insults made by Sen. Obama's principal fundraiser."

The Clintons have long been known for skilled, aggressive political infighting, and Geffen's comments provided a way for the Clinton campaign to test how Obama, relatively new to the national stage, would take a punch. It also was the first of what will no doubt be many attempts by rivals to knock the halo off Obama's head.

The Obama camp—eager to show that it knew how to handle criticism and could stand up to an experienced political warrior like Clinton—issued a biting statement.

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," said Obama communications director Robert Gibbs. "It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom."

Obama also took the opportunity to go on offense, suggesting that Clinton was being hypocritical, since she had not disavowed the recent comments of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford. Ford, who has endorsed Clinton, said last week that if Obama were the Democratic nominee, "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose, because he's black and he's top of the ticket. We'd lose the House and the Senate and the governors and everything."

Gibbs said Wednesday that it is "ironic" that Clinton has praised Ford and accepted his support.

If both candidates had reasons for engaging in what might seem like a minor squabble, the spectacle of Clinton and Obama duking it out so early in the campaign was nonetheless striking. It was the sort of rat-a-tat-tat political spat that usually breaks out in the snowy cold of New Hampshire in the critical days before the nation's first presidential primary, rather than 11 months before that contest and almost two years before the 2008 election.

Geffen interview sparked spat

What ignited the battle of words was an interview with Geffen in Wednesday's New York Times by columnist Maureen Dowd, in which Geffen portrayed himself as disenchanted with both Clintons, their failure to always stand firm on principle and their style of political battle. "Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said.

He called Bill Clinton "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country." Geffen slammed Hillary Clinton for refusing to apologize for her vote to authorize the Iraq war. "It's not a very big thing to say, 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Geffen said.

Asked if Obama would be able to stand up to the Clinton machine, Geffen said, "I hope so, because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective."

This rhetorical eruption came one day after Geffen—along with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, his partners in DreamWorks SKG—hosted a $2,300-per-person fundraiser for Obama at the Beverly Hilton, site of the glitzy Golden Globe Awards.

There was no red carpet, but stars of the entertainment world showed up in packs. Flashes popped in the hotel lobby as tourists spotted stars like Jennifer Aniston. She walked past purposefully, though she tossed her hair, turned and smiled when a fan with a digital camera yelled her name.

An all-star cast

Actors Ben Stiller, Eddie Murphy, Morgan Freeman, and Christine Lahti also showed up. Singers Jackson Browne and the Dixie Chicks' Natalie Maines were there. And so were producers Norman Lear, Ron Howard, Lawrence Bender, producer of Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth," and J.J. Abrams. The heads of several major studios also attended.

Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington bought tickets but did not show up.

Despite the star power, the event was a low-key affair. No cameras were permitted inside the fundraiser, which drew 300 guests and raised about $1.3 million, according to Katzenberg. Hotel security guards ejected camera crews and ushered out several reporters who had not registered as guests, explaining that they were acting on instructions from the organizers.

Barack, Hillary Trade Body Blows (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. -- The Battle of Beverly Hills has begun.

Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama traded their first body blows Wednesday after Obama backer and Hollywood media titan David Geffen accused the Clintons of lying, recklessness and trying to establish an American monarchy.

The fight was waged through a series of heated e-mails from both campaigns Wednesday -- in which Clinton's top spokesman accused Obama of being a "slash & burn" politician and Obama's staff slammed the Clintons for using the Lincoln Bedroom as a cash register in the 1990s.

It hit a crescendo during a Democratic presidential candidates forum here Wednesday, when Clinton suggested that Obama and his campaign were engaging "in the politics of personal destruction."

Later, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Bill Clinton's former UN ambassador, agreed, calling on the Illinois senator to apologize.

The fracas began on Tuesday night, when Geffen, a media billionaire who was once a major Clinton moneyman, co-hosted a $1.3 million fundraiser with his DreamWorks partners and Clinton boosters Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg, who is hosting a Clinton fundraiser next month. Geffen also invited New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd to his Beverly Hills mansion to extol Obama and trash the Clintons.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family," Dowd wrote in her column Wendesday, quoting Geffen, who unsuccessfully lobbied Bill Clinton to pardon convicted murderer Leonard Peltier in 2000.

Geffen went on to say Republicans are rooting for Clinton because "they believe she's the easiest to defeat," adding that the country was better served by bosses in "smoke-filled rooms" than by Clinton's pollsters and high-priced advisers.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said of the Clintons.

The remarks largely upstaged the first forum of the 2008 primary, which Obama skipped for his West Coast swing.

The forum candidates were each interviewed separately here, with Clinton pledging to enact universal health care for all Americans by the end of a second term in the White House.

Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards criticized her approach, saying, "Anybody who comes into your state and tells you that they have a universal health care plan but they don't have a revenue source ... they might have a bridge in Brooklyn to sell you, too."

When moderator George Stephanopolous asked Clinton if Obama should renounce Geffen, she replied, "I sure don't want Democrats and supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of the personal destruction. And I believe Bill Clinton was a good president."

She left the heavy hitting to her spokesman Howard Wolfson, who said earlier, "While Senator Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics ... was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband."

Added Wolfson: "If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money."

Campaigning in Iowa, Obama told the Associated Press, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," he said.

His spokesman Robert Gibbs said, "It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping in the Lincoln Bedroom."

Later, Geffen released a statement saying Obama had no reason to apologize because he held no official position with the campaign. The anti-Clinton tirade, he said, "reflect solely my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons."

An Insult From A Hollywood Money Man Sets Off A Democratic Feud (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. - What's a million dollars and a little back-stabbing among fellow Democrats?

Enough to set off the first full-scale fight of the fledgling 2008 presidential campaign between the front-runners, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

And perhaps enough to kill talk of a new, less hostile politics - and maybe even speculation about a Clinton-Obama or Obama-Clinton ticket.

At the center of the feud is David Geffen, the entertainment mogul who co-founded DreamWorks studio, helped Bill Clinton raise millions from Hollywood, then turned on his old friend. He hosted a star-studded fundraiser for Obama this week, then trashed the Clintons.

Geffen raised $18 million for Bill Clinton in the 1990s, when Clinton treated Southern California like an ATM. Hillary Clinton wanted the same ready cash.

But the Geffen who slept in the Lincoln Bedroom during the Clinton years is no longer their friend. Some say it's because a Geffen friend was passed over when President Clinton was handing out pardons on his last day in office. Some say it's more personal than that.

Either way, Geffen hosted a gala fundraiser for Obama on Tuesday, raised $1.3 million and introduced him to such glitterati as actress Jennifer Aniston and actor Eddie Murphy.

Twisting the knife, Geffen then told The New York Times that the Clintons are liars, that Hillary Clinton is coldly ambitious and that the former president hasn't changed his ways, an apparent reference to his womanizing.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they (the Clintons) do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said.

Clinton's camp fired back Wednesday, accusing Obama of hypocrisy for telling a Nevada audience Sunday that he opposes "slash and burn" politics even as his top fundraiser was attacking the Clintons.

"I want to run a very positive campaign and I certainly don't want the candidates or supporters to engage in the politics of personal destruction," Clinton said when she was asked about the brouhaha Wednesday.

Her aides went further.

"While Senator Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics ... his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband," said Howard Wolfson, Clinton's campaign communications director.

"If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money. ... (T)here is no place in our party or our politics for the kind of personal insults made by Senator Obama's principal fundraiser," Wolfson said.

Obama's camp returned fire, saying the Clintons liked Geffen well enough when he was raising money for them.

"It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom," Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said.

Gibbs accused Clinton herself of hypocrisy for accepting support from a South Carolina Democrat who's said that Obama's race would hurt him.

"It's a slim possibility for him to get the nomination, but then everybody else is doomed," said South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who's black. "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose - because he's black and he's top of the ticket."

Gibbs said it was "ironic that Senator Clinton lavished praise on Monday ... and is fully willing to accept today the support of South Carolina state Senator Robert Ford."

Democrats begin voting for their presidential nominee next January.

In Both Parties, 2008 Politeness Falls To Infighting (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135140

The sun was not yet up yesterday, and members of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign team were confronted with the kind of attack that most infuriates them: one questioning the character of Mrs. Clinton and her husband.

To make matters worse, it came from David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big supporter of the Clintons but has since turned on them and is now backing Senator Barack Obama for the Democratic presidential nomination.

What followed was a remarkably caustic exchange between the Clinton and Obama campaigns that highlighted the sensitivity in the Clinton camp to Mr. Obama's rapid rise as a rival and his positioning as a fresh face unburdened by the baggage borne by Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York. The Clinton camp seemed also to be sending a warning to mudslinging critics that they would be dealt with fiercely.

It began with a column in The New York Times by Maureen Dowd, in which Mr. Geffen said the Clintons lie "with such ease, it's troubling" and that the Clinton political operation "is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective." Mr. Geffen called Mr. Clinton a "reckless guy" who had not changed in the last six years, and suggested that Mrs. Clinton was too scripted.

In a statement it fired off at 9:46 a.m., the Clinton campaign called on Mr. Obama to sever his ties to Mr. Geffen and return the portion of the $1.3 million that Mr. Geffen helped raise on Tuesday at a reception in Beverly Hills.

"While Senator Obama was denouncing slash-and-burn politics yesterday, his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband," Howard Wolfson, the Clinton campaign communications director, said in a statement.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for Mr. Obama, responded with a statement less than an hour and a half later, saying it was "ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen" when he was "raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln Bedroom."

The punch and counterpunch went on all day, transfixing the political world and overshadowing a gathering of all the Democratic candidates except Mr. Obama, the junior Illinois senator, at a union-sponsored forum in Nevada at which Mrs. Clinton faced criticism from some opponents about her Iraq stance.

The Democrats were not the only ones dealing with intramural warfare. On the Republican side, Vice President Dick Cheney struck back at criticism leveled against him and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld by Senator John McCain of Arizona, underscoring the often tense relationship between the White House and Mr. McCain.

The presidential campaign has been a relatively polite affair in its early stages, and the day marked an abrupt change of tone that exposed the intensity of the bad feeling bubbling just below the surface in both parties. None of the players showed much inclination to back off.

In an interview with ABC News in which Mr. Cheney was asked about Mr. McCain's criticism of Mr. Rumsfeld, the vice president responded by bringing up other McCain comments critical of Mr. Cheney's role in managing the war in Iraq, and said Mr. McCain had subsequently said he was sorry.

"John said some nasty things about me the other day," Mr. Cheney added, "and then the next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

In response, Mr. McCain seemed to go out of his way to re-emphasize his assertion that Mr. Rumsfeld would be remembered as one of the worst defense secretaries in history, and to criticize the Bush administration more generally when he appeared at a news conference in Los Angeles to discuss initiatives to deal with global warming.

When asked about the administration's environmental record, Mr. McCain said, "I would assess this administration's record on global warming as terrible."

Asked by a reporter about his comments about Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. McCain said, "The criticism of the conduct of the war I have voiced for more than three years when I saw that this train wreck was taking place."

Some minutes later, after the news conference had ended, Mr. McCain, unbidden, said to the reporter, "Sir, I stand by my comments about Secretary Rumsfeld, by the way."

Similarly, Mr. Geffen affirmed his view of the Clintons, saying he had been quoted accurately and that Mr. Wolfson was wrong in calling him the finance chairman of the Obama campaign (he said he had no formal role in the campaign).

Mrs. Clinton, asked Wednesday afternoon if Mr. Obama should denounce the Geffen remarks, declined to join in the hand-to-hand combat, but expressed general disapproval with the remarks while also defending her husband, which drew huge cheers from the audience of union members she was addressing.

"I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said at the forum of Democratic presidential candidates in Carson City, Nev. "I think we should stay focused on what we're going to do for America. And, you know, I believe Bill Clinton was a good president, and I'm very proud of the record of his two terms."

When pressed, she said she would leave it up to the Obama campaign to make its decision on Mr. Geffen, then noted that she was "excited" to be in Nevada "with the other candidates who came," a comment that only drew attention to Mr. Obama's choice to skip the event.

The Geffen remarks bubbled up throughout the forum. One candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, said Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen's remarks. "If we're going to win, we have to be positive," Mr. Richardson said. "I think these name-callings are not good."

As he arrived in Iowa late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Obama was met with questions from reporters about the clash.

"It's not clear to me why I would be apologizing for someone else's remarks," Mr. Obama said. "My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have differences with the Clintons, but that doesn't really have anything to do with our campaign."

When asked whether he was proud of Mr. Geffen's support, the senator declared: "He hosted an event for me yesterday. Absolutely."

Obama advisers described the Geffen remarks as an insignificant blip and said they saw no political danger in letting them stand. While some supporters of Mrs. Clinton said they were worried that the campaign had lost its cool over Mr. Geffen, several Clinton advisers insisted that they were not overreacting.

One adviser, who is not part of Mrs. Clinton's day-to-day inner circle but speaks to her regularly about politics and fund-raising, said Mr. Geffen's comments might not shock "political insiders" in Washington or New York who are used to hearing bad things about the Clintons. But such criticism, especially from a former Clinton supporter like Mr. Geffen, could surprise and concern average voters in Iowa, New Hampshire and in other politically important states where they are starting to form impressions of Mrs. Clinton as a presidential candidate.

Other advisers said the Clinton camp was simply frustrated that Mr. Obama had received glowing media coverage, and was eager to call out his campaign for hypocrisy by contrasting the Geffen remarks with Mr. Obama's pledge to be positive.

"Obama has gotten under the campaign's skin for weeks now — especially his free ride in the media —and Hillary's people were just waiting for their first chance to attack his image as Mr. Positive," said one Clinton adviser who is not part of the day-to-day political operation.

Clinton-Obama Fight Rattles Party Faithful (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Forget President Bush. The Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama presidential campaigns have gone after each other in an unusually early and nasty exchange, provoked by a big Hollywood donor.

An email fusillade yesterday left many Democrats shaking their heads that party infighting -- like everything else about the 2008 presidential campaign -- is starting so soon, nearly a year before the first nominating votes.

Aides argued all day over who started the exchange. Unaffiliated strategists in both parties suggested the Clinton campaign had overreacted, thus telegraphing concern over Mr. Obama's fresh-faced appeal and risking the ire of Hollywood backers and black voters. But they also said the Obama camp shouldn't have taken the bait and muddied its candidate's call for a new, positive politics.

The spark was a New York Times column quoting anti-Clinton remarks by film and recording mogul David Geffen, a former Bill Clinton supporter. On Tuesday night, he and his DreamWorks SKG co-founders, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, hosted a $1.3 million fund-raiser for Mr. Obama, a first-term senator from Illinois.

Mr. Geffen was quoted calling Sen. Clinton, of New York, an "incredibly polarizing figure" who was too scripted to admit her 2002 Iraq war vote was a mistake, and saying her husband was "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition."

By the time most political reporters got to their offices, they had an email from Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson: "While Sen. Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics yesterday, his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Sen. Clinton and her husband."

He demanded Mr. Obama denounce Mr. Geffen's comments, remove him from the campaign and return his money. An Obama spokesman said Mr. Geffen has no official title or role in the campaign; Mr. Geffen said the same in a statement standing by his remarks.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs soon fired back. "We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," he wrote, before noting, "The Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when [he] was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom." That was a reference to the Clinton-era controversy over using the White House as a fund-raising tool.

Within an hour, Mr. Wolfson sent a final volley, in an email headlined "Obama Embraces Slash & Burn Politics." It noted that this week, in a campaign appearance in Nevada, Mr. Obama had railed against "the slash and burn politics that have become the custom in Washington."

On the subject of hypocrisy, the Obama camp countered that Mrs. Clinton had "lavished praise" Monday in South Carolina on a black state senator who supports her -- though he recently was quoted as warning that if Mr. Obama were the party's nominee, the Illinois senator would lose and drag the entire Democratic ticket with him "because he's black." The Clinton advisers said the campaign -- though not Mrs. Clinton personally -- had quickly issued a statement that "we strongly disagree" with the state senator. And he issued an apology, "if I caused anybody -- including myself -- any pain."

Later, campaigning in Iowa, Mr. Obama said, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," according to the Associated Press.

For her part, Mrs. Clinton declined to be drawn further into the dispute at a forum of eight candidates in Carson City, Nev., yesterday. "I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said. Asked twice whether Mr. Obama should rebuke Mr. Geffen, she replied, "I'm going to leave that up to the other campaign."

Then, in what was seen as a dig at Mr. Obama, she said, "I'm glad to be here in Carson City." Mr. Obama had skipped the event, citing his prior campaign commitments in Iowa.

Later at the forum, another rival, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, was asked whether Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen. He quickly said yes, then added, "I don't know what was said."

Gentle Jabs Turn To Punches For Clinton, Obama (LAT)

By Tina Daunt And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

Remarks by David Geffen spark the first direct attacks between the two camps.

In her run for the White House, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton eventually was going to face the legacy of the more unsavory episodes of her husband's two terms as president. But in a surprise Wednesday, the first person to draw wide attention to some of the old controversies was not a Republican candidate or the "vast, right-wing conspiracy" that the Clintons have assailed, but a leading liberal at the heart of Hollywood.

Comments from entertainment mogul David Geffen, which were highly critical of the Clintons, reverberated through the presidential campaign and prompted the first direct attacks between the camps of Clinton — a New York senator — and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. Considered the two leading Democratic candidates, they until now had traded only gentle jabs in genteel language.

Geffen talked about why he had soured on the Clintons, his longtime allies, and was instead backing Obama. He called Sen. Clinton an "incredibly polarizing figure," criticized her husband's 2001 pardon of fugitive financier Marc Rich and suggested that Bill Clinton's personal habits would damage his wife's campaign, hurting Democratic hopes of retaking the White House next year.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," Geffen said of the Clintons in a New York Times interview published Wednesday.

The comments marked an escalation in the battle between Sen. Clinton and Obama for Hollywood money. Geffen, who had raised millions of dollars for the Clintons over the years, on Tuesday hosted a $1.3-million fundraiser for Obama.

His remarks prompted the Clinton campaign to demand that Obama sever all ties to Geffen and return his campaign donations, citing Obama's past denunciation of "slash and burn" tactics. The interview also sparked a brawl of the billionaires in Los Angeles.

Responding to Geffen's comments, media mogul and Clinton supporter Haim Saban said: "David is allowing his emotions to cloud his better judgment, and I'm frankly surprised, to say the least, at the venom in his statement."

Saban, who made a fortune on the Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers, wrote in an e-mail to the Los Angeles Times that Geffen "knows in his heart of heart, that Hillary is the most qualified person to be the next president of the USA. Why would he lie to himself?"

The dispute comes at a crucial time for Clinton, who had been counting on strong support from Hollywood to help her post big fundraising numbers and build momentum by enhancing her front-runner status in the party. Supermarket magnate Ron Burkle remains one of Clinton's most ardent backers, and her strategists are hopeful that a Burkle fundraiser set for March will raise even more than Geffen raked in this week for Obama.

But Clinton now risks allowing Geffen to become a focal point among donors and primary voters in search of an alternative to her candidacy. That possibility gained potency this week when Obama, a figure in national politics for only three years, proved he could draw interest from major donors in a town that has long been dominated by the Clintons and was expected to line up behind Sen. Clinton's candidacy.

Husband's role

Moreover, the episode highlighted the predicament facing Clinton as she decides what role her husband should play in her campaign.

Bill Clinton remains popular among many key constituencies, but Geffen's comments dredged up controversies that could haunt the couple in 2008, such as fundraising tactics in which donors were rewarded with White House sleepovers, and the pardons he issued at the end of his term to Rich and others. By calling the former president a "reckless guy" and doubting that he "has become a different person" since leaving office, Geffen also seemed to be reviving images of Bill Clinton's impeachment over his dalliance with former intern Monica S. Lewinsky — an episode that contributed to the Clintons' polarizing reputation.

Wednesday's eruption coincided with Bill Clinton's official entry into the campaign with a fundraising letter to supporters.

"The attacks on Hillary haven't stopped, and she hasn't stopped winning," the former president wrote.

In Hollywood, Clinton campaign officials have moved aggressively to limit Obama's inroads and force longtime donors to back the former first lady.

Her campaign chairman, Terry McAuliffe, recently warned donors that Clinton would remember those who did not back her. "You are either with us, or you're against us," McAuliffe told potential donors during a dinner at Saban's house.

So far, the appeal has not succeeded. Some, such as Geffen and fellow DreamWorks studio co-founder Jeffrey Katzenberg, have been drawn to Obama, 45, while others are following the lead of Norman Lear in supporting multiple candidates to foster a dynamic debate.

When Lear, the legendary TV sitcom producer, was told of McAuliffe's comments this month, he responded: "What's Hillary going to do? Jail me?"

Adopting Lear's strategy are singer Barbra Streisand, former Paramount Pictures head Sherry Lansing and another DreamWorks founder, Steven Spielberg — all of whom are giving early contributions to multiple candidates.

Democratic Race Gets Rolling With Nevada Forum (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. — Democratic presidential candidates defended their histories on Iraq, offered their ideas for ending the war and opened fault lines on taxes and health care Wednesday in the first major forum of the 2008 nomination race.

Eight hopefuls showed up for the forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. The only absentee was Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, in Des Moines for a town meeting.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton faced questions on two awkward issues from moderator George Stephanopoulos of ABC News, a former aide in her husband's White House. First he asked why she won't say her 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq was a mistake. "My vote was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances I received at the time," Clinton said.

Stephanopoulos also asked Clinton about a "press-release scuffle" that broke out Wednesday between her campaign and Obama's over comments made by Hollywood mogul David Geffen to The New York Times. Geffen called Bill Clinton "a reckless guy" who gave his enemies ammunition; criticized Hillary Clinton for refusing to admit a mistake on the war; called them both liars; and said he had gotten in trouble with them for helping Obama.

The Clinton camp demanded that Obama cut ties with Geffen and return cash associated with him. The Obama camp said Clinton should renounce support from South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford. Ford, who is black, said Democrats would lose with Obama "because he's black." He later apologized. Geffen, meanwhile, said his remarks reflect "my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons" and he has "no formal role" in Obama's campaign.

Asked whether Obama should denounce Geffen's remarks, Clinton replied: "I'm going to leave that up to the other campaign." She said she wants to run "a very positive campaign. I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction." She added that she is "very proud" of her husband's two terms.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who was Bill Clinton's U.N. ambassador and Energy secretary, said Democrats should pledge not to attack one another. Asked whether Obama should denounce the Geffen comments, he replied: "Yes. If we're going to win, we have to be positive."

Nevada is a newcomer to the early primary season; its caucuses are scheduled Jan. 19. The forum, held before 750 in a community center and 400 more in an overflow site, was the first of at least five events scheduled this year in the state.

Iraq dominated much of the session. Former North Carolina senator John Edwards and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd tried to set themselves apart from Clinton. Edwards, who wants to start bringing U.S. troops home now, said it is time for a leader "who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake." He said he was "wrong to vote for this war." Dodd said that "I made a mistake and I don't know" are two responses politicians dislike. He added it was "a mistake" to vote for the war and called for "a surge of diplomacy."

Another senator who calls his vote a mistake, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware, said he had "vastly underestimated" the Bush team's incompetence. The question now is "What next?" he said, and pushed his plan to partition Iraq.

Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack did not cast votes on Iraq. "What have you done today to end this war in Iraq? It needs to be ended now," Vilsack exhorted the audience. Richardson said Congress should "deauthorize" the war.

Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich, an early war opponent, said it must be hard for candidates to say they were "tricked, deceived, misled" and said he wasn't. Former Alaska senator Mike Gravel said the war isn't worth "one more American dead."

The Democrats endorsed expanded health care but differed on how to pay for it. Clinton said she wants to find a way to provide universal care "without putting billions more into the system when we already spend so much more than anybody else." Vilsack and Richardson said they would expand coverage without tax hikes.

Edwards has proposed a universal health care plan financed by repeal of Bush's tax cuts on households making over $200,000. Anybody who says they don't need new revenue to pay for universal care, "they might have a bridge in Brooklyn they want to sell you, too," he said.

Clinton In Attack On Obama Over Donation (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135145

The US presidential campaign on Wednesday took a nasty turn when Hillary Clinton demanded that Barack Obama, her closest rival for the Democratic nomination, return campaign donations from a Hollywood mogul who had made "vicious attacks" on her personality.

Mrs Clinton's office was responding to a column by Maureen Dowd in Wednesday's New York Times in which David Geffen, the Hollywood executive and prominent Obama supporter, was quoted as having disparaged Mrs Clinton.

Mr Geffen, who organised a $1.3m (€1m, £660,000) election fund-raising event for Mr Obama in Los Angeles on Tuesday was a one-time supporter of Bill Clinton who fell out with the former president and his wife in 2001.

Mrs Clinton on Wednesday called upon Mr Obama, who launched his campaign last month with the promise to put an end to the "slash and burn" politics of Washington, to return the money donated by Mr Geffen and to repudiate his remarks.

"If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr Geffen from his campaign and return the money," she said. "There is no place in our party for the kind of personal insults made by Senator Obama's principal fundraiser."

Mr Geffen was quoted as having said: "I don't think another polarising figure – no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is – and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? – can bring this country together." He also criticised Mrs Clinton for refusing to admit she made a mistake in voting to authorise the Iraq war in 2002.

On Wednesday, Mr Obama, who is posing an increasingly credible challenge to Mrs Clinton's frontrunner status for the Democratic nomination, came close to accusing her campaign of hypocrisy.

In a statement, Robert Gibbs, Mr Obama's communications director, referred to the fact Mr Geffen had stayed at the White House in the 1990s when Mr Clinton was president.

"It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18m and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom," Mr Gibbs said.

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters."

Mr Obama, who is the first African American with a serious shot at the White House, also referred to an incident in South Carolina last weekend where Robert Ford, who is a prominent black supporter of Mrs Clinton's campaign, said Mr Obama's nomination would doom other Democratic candidates "because he's black". Mr Ford apologised.

"This campaign is already getting out of control," said a seasoned Democratic operative in Washington. "It is only February 2007 and they're already at each other's throats."

Hillary, Obama Producing Their Own Hollywood Drama (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The two top Democratic presidential candidates sparred yesterday as a political battle played out Hollywood-style in a possible preview of the fight to come for superstar dollars.

Democrats with eyes on the White House are playing roles in the Hollywood primary, which is almost as crowded as the real contests in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Starring in yesterday's drama were Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, whose rival campaigns feuded over some comments made by a major Hollywood player who helped raise $1.3 million for Mr. Obama.

The fundraising figure impressed pundits, but the headline of the day featured remarks that music and movie producer David Geffen made about Mrs. Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

The fundraiser on Tuesday was hosted by Mr. Geffen's DreamWorks/SKG colleagues Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg. Mr. Spielberg has promised to hold similar parties for Mrs. Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, but Mr. Geffen is supporting Mr. Obama.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family," he told New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd.

Mr. Geffen in the column called Mrs. Clinton "polarizing" and said he thinks Republicans will use Mr. Clinton against his wife if she gets the nomination. He called the former president a "reckless guy." Mr. Geffen also criticized Mrs. Clinton for refusing to apologize for her October 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war.

The Clinton campaign demanded Mr. Obama disavow the comments, quoting his own promise to avoid "slash-and-burn" politics.

"If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks ... and return his money," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs noted that Mr. Geffen had raised millions for Mr. Clinton and famously slumbered in the Lincoln Bedroom.

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," Mr. Gibbs said.

He added that Mrs. Clinton accepted the support of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who said recently that if Mr. Obama got the nomination, "everybody else is doomed."

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose -- because he's black and he's top of the ticket. We'd lose the House and the Senate and the governors and everything," Mr. Ford said, according to the Associated Press. He later apologized when his remarks drew wide criticism.

Mr. Wolfson wasn't satisfied with Mr. Gibbs' response, saying it called into question whether Mr. Obama "really believes his own rhetoric."

He added, "When one of Senator Clinton's supporters made an inappropriate statement, her campaign disavowed it immediately and the supporter apologized for his words. Why won't Senator Obama do the same?"

Mr. Geffen said yesterday the quotes were accurate and reflect "solely my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons."

News reports and the Dowd column both have blamed the Geffen-Clinton rift on Mr. Clinton's not pardoning Leonard Peltier, an American Indian sentenced to life imprisonment 30 years ago for murdering two FBI agents and on whose behalf Mr. Geffen has advocated.

At a campaign forum in Nevada yesterday, Mrs. Clinton managed to dodge a question about the dust-up while working in a dig at Mr. Obama, the only candidate who did not attend because he was campaigning in Iowa.

"I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said.

But when asked by forum host George Stephanopoulos whether Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen's remarks, Mrs. Clinton said: "I'll leave that up to the other campaign. I'm glad to be here in Carson City."

She then noted her appreciation for "the other candidates who came."

Despite the celebrity drama yesterday, Mr. Obama's star-studded event was well-received. Actress Jennifer Aniston of television's "Friends" fame told a reporter that she finds Mr. Obama to be "lovely," and Dixie Chicks singer Natalie Maines praised Michelle Obama, the first-term senator's wife. Also in the crowd at the Beverly Hilton were comedian Ben Stiller, director Ron Howard and actors Morgan Freeman and Eddie Murphy.

During the $2,300-per-ticket fundraiser Mr. Obama praised the glitterati for the cultural impact of such films as "Hotel Rwanda" and "Schindler's List," saying "What an enormous power that is, what an enormous responsibility."

The line resembles one from the megamovie "Spider-Man," in which Peter Parker's Uncle Ben tells the superhero: "Remember, with great power comes great responsibility."

Ron Burkle, a supermarket tycoon, will host his own Hollywood fundraiser for Mrs. Clinton next month. Hollywood A-listers Tom Hanks, Jerry Seinfeld and Martin Scorsese are expected to attend.

The other Democrats in the race are also wooing Hollywood stars, whose names often are as important as the checks they write.

Mr. Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee, was a featured guest on HBO's "Real Time With Bill Maher" on Friday. He also raised $100,000 last week with television actors in Hollywood, according to the New York Times.

Singer and actress Barbra Streisand has made $2,300 donations to Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards.

DOJ_NMG_0135147

Should former Vice President Al Gore decide to jump into the presidential race, he could trump all the Hollywood cash seekers by becoming an Oscar winner Sunday night. His film on climate change, "An Inconvenient Truth," has been nominated for best documentary.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week stopped by the "Tonight Show" to exchange yuks with Jay Leno and even jokingly offered fellow guest and comedian Jim Carrey a spot on his presidential ticket.

Rivals At Democratic Presidential Forum Push Positions On Iraq War Into Spotlight (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev., Feb. 21 — Two Democratic presidential rivals of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton applied more pressure on her over Iraq on Wednesday, extolling the virtue of admitting mistakes about the war — which she has not done — and comparing politicians who do not with President Bush.

The toughest words, here at the first Democratic candidate forum of the 2008 race, came from former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. He said Americans needed "a different kind of leadership" than that provided by the current president who, Mr. Edwards said, had refused to admit error on Iraq. Mr. Edwards has apologized for his 2002 vote to authorize military action in Iraq; Mrs. Clinton cast the same vote and has stood by it while also criticizing the war strategy.

"We need a leader who will be open and honest with you and with the American people — who will tell the truth, who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake, who will take responsibility when they've made a mistake," Mr. Edwards said at a forum sponsored by the American Federation of Federal, State and Municipal Employees.

"If we want to live in a moral and just America and we want America to be able to lead in a moral and just world, we need a leader who is honest, open and decent," he added.

Asked by the forum's moderator, George Stephanopoulos of ABC News, about Mrs. Clinton's explanation that her vote was cast based on a sincere belief in military intelligence provided at the time, Mr. Edwards replied: "Whether it's good enough I think is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge."

Another candidate, Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, who has also renounced his 2002 vote, said there was "nothing wrong" with admitting mistakes.

"There are two things that people in public life — two responses people in public life never like to give, and I don't understand why: 'I made a mistake' and 'I don't know,' " Mr. Dodd said. "I've made them in the past. I'll make them in the future."

Because the forum rules prevented direct engagement among the candidates — indeed, they appeared one at a time — Mrs. Clinton could not respond immediately. Once it was her turn, she reiterated her opposition to the war and outlined her new plan to cap troop levels and start withdrawing some units from Iraq within 90 days.

If the president does not move in that direction, she added, "I think we should require that he has to seek additional Congressional authority, because it has run out on what George Bush has tried to do in Iraq."

Of the major Democratic candidates, only Senator Barack Obama of Illinois was absent; he was campaigning in Iowa. Yet he was here in spirit: At times the focus of the forum, and of some reporters, drifted to the e-mail attacks on Wednesday between the campaign war rooms of Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama over an Obama donor's personal criticism of the Clintons this week.

David Geffen, the entertainment executive, in an interview with a columnist for The New York Times, described Mrs. Clinton as "incredibly polarizing" and "ambitious," and said Mr. Clinton may make trouble for his wife by causing a new scandal in their lives. Mrs. Clinton pushed back at the forum, to applause from the audience of public employee union members, by saying candidates and their allies should not "be engaging in the politics of personal destruction."

Not everyone seemed to agree with that. Outside of the event here in the capital of Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second round of presidential caucuses next January, leaflets calling Mrs. Clinton unelectable were tucked under the windshield wipers of cars. The leaflets, of unknown provenance, were titled "Why Can't She Win?" and cast her as unpopular with liberals over the war and with conservatives over just about everything.

Other than Iraq, health care insurance was the subject of greatest discussion, with most of the candidates promising to push for universal coverage. Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico promised that he would not increase taxes to expand health care, but rather focus on preventative care, while Mr. Edwards repeated plans for a huge health care program that would include higher taxes on wealthy Americans.

"I think we have reached a place in American history where small baby steps, incremental steps, are not enough — we need big, transformational change," Mr. Edwards said to some applause.

Mrs. Clinton, who has been portrayed by Edwards advisers and others as an incrementalist, said she wanted to develop a plan to provide universal care without spending billions of dollars more, given that the United States already spends significantly more on health care than any other nation.

Yet she also presented herself as a bold goal setter, recalling President John F. Kennedy's pledge to put a man on the moon in a decade.

"I want to have universal health care coverage by the end of my second term, and with everybody working on that, I think we can do it," she said to applause.

Edwards Needles Clinton About Iraq Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 21, 2007

Former Sen. John Edwards jabbed gently at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday in the first all-candidates forum of the 2008 Democratic presidential campaign, saying her refusal to disavow a 2002 vote on Iraq was "between her and her conscience."

"It's not for me to judge," said Edwards, who — like Clinton — voted in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq, but unlike her, has since apologized for his vote.

The event format did not permit Clinton to respond to Edwards' swipe, which stood out on an afternoon in which Democrats launched serial attacks on President Bush's war policies.

"The worst we can do is tear each other down," said New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who called on his Democratic rivals to sign a pledge to avoid negative campaigning and concentrate their energy on taking the White House away from the Republicans next year.

Among Democratic presidential contenders, only Barack Obama skipped the event, which was hosted by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Union. The Illinois senator campaigned in Iowa instead.

The convergence of so many candidates underscored Nevada's newfound importance in the 2008 nominating campaign. The state will hold caucuses on Jan. 19, five days after the lead-off Iowa caucuses and presumably only a few days before New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

In their time on stage, several of the candidates made an explicit pitch for the votes of union members, stressing their backing for legislation designed to make it easier to join unions, for example.

Edwards, Clinton and others drew cheers when they voiced support for universal health coverage, and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio vowed to pull the United States out of NAFTA soon after taking office in the White House.

But the Iraq war overshadowed all else at the two-hour event, Democrat after Democrat vying to show their eagerness to end U.S. participation in a conflict that has resulted in the deaths of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

"Sign me up. No negatives," Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware said just after Richardson made his appeal. Moments later, though, he spoke dismissively of congressional efforts merely to stop Bush's plan to deploy additional troops. "Don't talk about capping and all that. Do something," he said.

Clinton and Obama support separate bills to prevent an increase in troop levels above those in effect in January.

Kucinich was more direct. He said he had voted against authorizing the war in 2002, adding, "People are looking for a president who does the right thing when it matters the most."

Former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska, a quarter-century out of office, was the eighth candidate. "I don't think it's a big deal whether I get elected president or not," he said at one point.

The event occurred on a day in which aides to Obama and Clinton clashed over remarks made by DreamWorks founder David Geffen, a one-time supporter of President Clinton who has lined up behind the Illinois senator in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0135149

The Hollywood mogul was quoted in the New York Times as saying while "everybody in politics lies," the former president and former first lady "do it with such ease, it's troubling." Aides to the New York senator promptly called on Obama to give back a campaign donation from Geffen.

Clinton sidestepped a question of whether Obama should denounce Geffen's remarks. "I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she told moderator George Stephanopoulos.

Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, the first to speak, brushed aside a suggestion from some administration allies that the withdrawal of troops from Iraq would create chaos.

"How much more chaos could there be in Baghdad than exists today?" he asked to applause from the audience at a union-sponsored event near the Nevada state capitol.

"Time has run out on what President Bush has tried to do in Iraq," said Clinton when she took her turn on stage. She touted her legislation to begin a troop withdrawal within 90 days, and as she has repeatedly, declined to apologize for her vote to authorize the war in 2002.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack struck a similar note. "I want to challenge every single one of you and ask a simple question, what have you done today? What have you done today to end this war in Iraq?

"It needs to be ended now. Not six days from now, not six months from now. Not six years from now. It needs to be ended now, and it is up to you," he said.

Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, said it was time to begin a troop withdrawal. "I voted for this war. I was wrong to vote for this war. I should never have voted for this war. I take responsibility for that. No one else is responsible for it.

He added, "But the truth is, if we want to live in a moral and just America, and we want America to be able to lead in a moral and just world. We need a leader who is honest, open and decent and trying to do the right thing."

Stephanopoulos asked Edwards moments later whether he had been referring to Clinton.

"Well, whether it's good enough I think it's between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge," said the former North Carolina senator.

The program called for each contenders to make brief opening comments, then field three questions from Stephanopoulus, an ABC News broadcaster and former aide in Bill Clinton's White House. That meant, for example, that Clinton was backstage when Edwards spoke.

The Republican National Committee used the forum to try to put its own spin on the candidates, releasing "research documents" containing unflattering critiques of each of the Democrats hours before the event.

In recent years, Democrats have sensed political opportunity in the mountain West, a fast-growing region long dominated by Republicans. Nevada, with its large Hispanic population and influential labor unions, was considered a battleground state in 2004, and President Bush won the state by just 3 percentage points.

Ex-Senate Leader Daschle Endorses Obama (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama won the endorsement Wednesday of former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, who said the White House hopeful "personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country."

Daschle said Obama has a "great capacity to unify our country and inspire a new generation of young Americans, just as I was inspired by the Kennedys and Martin Luther King when I was young."

Obama began his term in the Senate after Daschle lost his seat in 2004. But the South Dakotan served in the Senate with several of the other Democratic presidential hopefuls, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joe Biden of Delaware, Chris Dodd of Connecticut and John Edwards, a former lawmaker.

Daschle said the party was "very fortunate to have an extraordinary field of candidates."

No Way To Elect A President (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135150

When Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid announced plans to hold an unusual Saturday session last week to vote on the House-passed resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops into Iraq, he disrupted the schedules of at least six of his colleagues who are running for president.

Joe Biden and John McCain were both supposed to spend the day in Iowa; Hillary Clinton, in New Hampshire; Chris Dodd, in South Carolina; Barack Obama, in South Carolina and Virginia; and Sam Brownback, in Florida.

It's only February of 2007, but from the schedules these presidential hopefuls -- and their rivals -- are keeping, you would think the primaries were almost upon us. Plenty of campaign consultants were aggravated that Reid was inconsiderate enough to let a little matter such as the Iraq war intrude on their important work of getting their candidates elected -- next year.

What we have, friends, is a remarkably distinguished field of candidates vying in an election system that has become truly insane.

I think the 16 men and one woman actively pursuing the presidency right now constitute a classy assemblage. The front-runners are people of substantial stature; the long shots include many who, in other years, would have been thought of as formidable challengers.

But the process in which they are engaged is bizarre -- and getting more so, every time you look.

Ever since 1976, the first presidential election year after the Democrats "reformed" their nominating rules, the states have been trying to increase their influence by racing to the head of the line of primaries. The result has been that a selection system that used to begin in March now is over in February -- at the latest.

The Democrats are mostly to blame for this mad rush to judgment, but neither party has tried seriously to apply the brakes. Their indulgence of this breakneck competition among the states means that someone is likely to put a death grip on each party's nomination before most Americans have begun to size up his or her capacity to be president. The second consequence is a numbingly long general election campaign: a nine-month marathon that leaves contenders and voters exhausted.

It also drives the cost of the election right through the ceiling -- and makes the candidates spend untold hours courting those with the wealth to finance their campaigns. Serious students of the process proclaim this to be the first billion-dollar election and predict the old system of partial public financing, with its spending controls, will be shattered to bits by the runaway money chase.

How did all this come to pass? Well, it began innocently enough with both parties giving official sanction to the traditional early kickoff contests -- the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. But as other states began inching forward, Iowa and New Hampshire advanced their dates, bit by bit, into January.

This year, the Democrats triggered a new stampede by deciding -- on grounds of diversity -- to cram the Nevada caucuses into the week between Iowa and New Hampshire and add a South Carolina primary just a week later.

Those four January events may be followed by a Feb. 5 blowout that will very possibly end the race. Four mega-states -- Florida, Illinois, Texas and California -- are all advancing legislation that would move their contests up to that date. Alabama may sneak in three days earlier, and other states are considering jumping in.

This is madness. There is no way that candidates can really communicate their qualifications, their aspirations and their policies to millions of people in widely scattered locales in a week's time or less. The campaign will be reduced to 30-second TV spots, sound-bite debates and airport tarmac rallies.

Long ago, the late Mo Udall, the canny congressman from Arizona who finished second to Jimmy Carter in the 1976 primaries, proposed the best solution I've ever heard.

He urged the parties to adopt a simple rule: Any state could hold a nonbinding contest any day it wants, but delegates to the national conventions would be seated only if elected on the first Tuesday of March, April, May or June. That way you would get spacing between the events to allow for serious examination of the choices and, probably, a mixture of results that would keep the race open until the end.

What we have now is so out of kilter that senatorial candidates can barely tend to their duties a year before the first primary.

Ex-lawmakers Find Work With Lobbyists (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 22, 2007

The cozy relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists that embarrassed Congress and cost some lawmakers re-election haven't stopped the revolving door between Capitol Hill and the lobbying industry that seeks to influence legislation.

Five of the 39 ex-lawmakers rejected by voters three months ago landed jobs at firms that seek to influence Congress. The hires include two Republicans — Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Conrad Burns of Montana — who lost in part because of allegations of ethical lapses.

Federal law requires lawmakers to wait a year after leaving office to lobby Congress, but lets former Congress members advise lobbyists and clients. The Senate passed a bill that would extend that "cooling-off" period to two years and also ban ex-lawmakers from advising others during that time. The House of Representatives has not taken up that issue.

Weldon, a former member of the House Armed Services Committee, was named chief strategic officer this month by Defense Solutions, a defense contractor that consults and lobbies for other companies. One of the company's executives, in a previous job, benefited from federal funds secured by Weldon.

A series of FBI raids at the homes and offices of his lobbyist daughter and her business associates and clients became a major issue in Weldon's campaign. He has said he did not help her obtain contracts.

Burns was hired last month as a senior adviser by Gage LLC, a lobbying firm headed by his former chief of staff and whose clients benefited from funding Burns inserted into spending bills.

Burns lost his Senate seat after Democrat Jon Tester criticized his ties to Gage and lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was sentenced to prison last year for fraud. Burns received about $150,000 in donations from Abramoff and his associates and clients. Burns, who returned the money, has said he didn't help Abramoff.

Weldon and Burns did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Others who have joined lobbying firms:

•Former congressman Jim Davis, D-Fla., who lost to Republican Charlie Crist in the race for Florida governor, joined Holland & Knight, a large law and lobbying firm. Davis said he will work mostly in Florida with occasional visits to Washington to advise clients. Managing partner Howell Melton Jr. said in a statement last month that the Democrat "will be a valuable asset to our clients now that the new majority in Congress has convened."

•Former congresswoman Nancy Johnson, R-Conn., joined law and lobbying firm Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz, which touted her health care credentials — including her role in crafting the Medicare drug benefit. Democrat Christopher Murphy, who defeated Johnson, criticized the drug benefit and her ties to the pharmaceutical industry. Johnson did not return messages seeking comment.

•Former congressman Richard Pombo, R-Calif., on Tuesday joined Pac/West Communications, a lobbying and public relations firm. Pombo chaired the House Natural Resources Committee, and Pac/West's clients include timber and oil companies. Pombo said he will advise grass-roots groups on how to be politically effective.

Democrats made ethics an issue in last year's elections. Former congressman Bob Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty last year to Abramoff-related corruption charges and in 2005, former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from businessmen seeking Pentagon contracts.

Can Free Trade Be A Fair Deal? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Within the past year, an important new debate has taken shape, though it's not likely to be the focus of any forthcoming presidential debates as such. It is likely, however, to distinguish liberal from centrist thinking for decades to come.

The debate begins at the familiar flash point of trade -- more particularly, with the realization of business elites and their political champions that the nation's free-trade policies have become threatened by growing public anxiety over our economic future. While corporate profits soar, individual wages stagnate, held at least partly in check by the brave new fact of offshoring -- that millions of Americans' jobs can be performed at a fraction of the cost in developing nations near and far. November's elections, in which voters sent to Congress a freshman class composed almost entirely of free-trade skeptics, rang alarm bells on both Wall Street and K Street.

In reaction not just to November but to reams of economic data showing that the U.S. median income has flat-lined, such longtime champions of free-trade orthodoxy as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin have changed their tune. Maintaining and extending our trade agreements is still their holy writ, but to compensate for whatever leveling effect trade may have on Americans' incomes, they now call for wage insurance to help workers who've been compelled to take lower-paying jobs than the ones they lost. As call centers relocate to India, the Rubinauts call for extending trade adjustment assistance to service as well as manufacturing workers. They call for a universal health-care system delinking insurance from employment, so that U.S. companies can compete globally without having to be the only corporations in an advanced economy that cover their workers' medical costs. They call for improving our education system so that American workers can be more competitive.

These domestic policy proposals all have merit; the question is whether they're remotely sufficient to the challenge of a globalized economy. In fact, there are nations with advanced economies that trade even more than we do and have still managed, chiefly through domestic policies, to retain high levels of economic equality and vitality: the nations of northern Europe. Trade constitutes a higher percentage of Scandinavian nations' gross domestic product than it does ours, with little of the downward-leveling and, accordingly, anti-trade backlash that we experience. Their secret is a series of job-training and placement policies, a bigger and better-paying public sector than ours, and the fact that their leading trade partners are other high-wage European nations.

The cost of creating this economic security while remaining globally competitive isn't cheap. In the March issue of the American Prospect (which I edit), my colleague Robert Kuttner calculates that these nations devote roughly 15 percent more of their GDP to governmental outlays than the United States does. That pencils out to roughly $2 trillion a year that we'd have to shift to the public sector to build an economy in which globalization wouldn't be viewed as so dire a threat. Neither Rubin, a true believer in balanced budgets, nor anybody functioning in the real world of American politics is calling for anything this far-reaching to reshape the U.S. economy.

Free-trade skeptics such as I believe that these domestic reforms, while overdue, are not enough. We argue that there need to be rules for the global economy that protect workers no less than investors, that global minimum wage standards, say, are no less necessary in a global economy than national minimum wage standards are in a national economy. Our challenge is that absent a global government, a global polity, such standards are excruciatingly difficult to create -- though altering the rules of the World Trade Organization would be a good place to start.

And so the debate: Is it possible, in a globalized economy, to have decent capitalism in one country? Or must enforceable laws be enacted to create a more egalitarian global economy, just as the New Deal here and social democratic governments in Europe established the framework for broadly shared prosperity on a national scale in the middle of the last century?

The historically minded may hear in this debate a dim echo of a Soviet controversy of 80 years ago, in which Stalin argued it was possible to build Soviet-style socialism in one country while Trotsky insisted that without global socialism, Russian socialism was bound to fail. Today's debate, fortunately, concerns the fate of a vastly more benign system: decent capitalism. And -- since neither a Scandinavian conversion nor a global government is just around the corner -- it is a debate that will pit the left against the center probably for the next half-century.

EDITORIAL: Mortgage Insecurities (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

If the bankers, investors and regulators who populate the global financial markets are not already anxious, they should be. The easy money that has buoyed the global economy for much of this decade is getting harder to come by.

At a similar point a decade ago, Russia defaulted on its foreign debt and Asia came unglued, weakening global growth. This time, the trigger could be the rapid erosion in the quality of American home mortgages — reflected in surging delinquencies and rising defaults.

Two economists, Mark Zandi and Juan Manuel Licari of Moody's Economy.com, detailed the dangers recently. In 2005 and 2006, lenders wrote an estimated $3.2 trillion in new home mortgages, which was a record — and lowered their credit standards considerably to do it. In 2005 alone, 20 percent of the mortgages taken out were "subprime" — made to borrowers with poor credit — and many more had worrisome features like interest-only payments.

Not surprisingly, as interest rates rose last year, mortgage delinquencies soared. Delinquency rates are expected to peak in 2008 at over 3 percent, well above the level of the last recession. Many of these risky mortgages were sold to investment banks, who carved them up into complex i.o.u.'s that they sold to investors worldwide. More than 20 percent of global private debt securities is now tied to housing in the United States. That works out to $7.5 trillion — far larger than the market for United States Treasuries. So if America's mortgage market heads south, the losses could be widespread.

The odds of a global financial crisis are still low, according to Mr. Zandi and Mr. Licari, but they are rising. There is not a lot now that can be done about the risks in the mortgage market. But the growing possibility of hard times ahead is another argument for rolling back many of the recent excessive tax cuts, so the government will have more resources available to respond if a crisis comes.

Rigged Game In Richmond (WP)

THE DECK is stacked in Richmond this week as negotiators from Virginia's House of Delegates and Senate try to find the first new money for transportation in a generation. Specifically, it is stacked in favor of a flawed plan that would use unstable, unreliable funding sources to produce an anemic cash flow.

Witness the negotiators on the House-Senate conference committee, whose mission is to fashion a compromise between competing transportation funding formulas. Just two of the 12 negotiators are Northern Virginians, despite the fact that the region accounts for one-third of the state's population, 40 percent of its economy and at least half its traffic headaches. Ten of the 12 negotiators are Republicans. And, thanks to some artful parliamentary maneuvering, 11 of the 12 negotiators named to the conference committee voted for the House-backed funding package, which is less responsible than the Senate's approach.

The chances of this group of lawmakers forging a genuine compromise are not promising. Rather, they appear to be planning a package similar to the House's original one, which they hope to present to the Senate with the clock ticking -- the legislature is scheduled to adjourn Saturday -- and dare the senators to reject it, as they have once already on a preliminary vote. It's an all-or-nothing gambit that plays chicken with the commonwealth's best interests.

The problem with the House funding package is twofold. First, it would produce barely more than half of the $700 million a year in new transportation funding that Northern Virginia desperately needs. Second, it would pay for improvements to the state's roads and rails in part by diverting $250 million annually in state funding for public schools, higher education, health care, human services and public safety. It would, in other words, throw transportation into the same competitive pool as other spending priorities, meaning that whatever amount is promised for road-building now could be chipped away or redirected in its entirety at the first sign of inclement budgetary weather. And then what -- highway projects abandoned halfway through construction? Federally matched Metro funding suspended?

Transportation has long been treated as a special case in Virginia (as in other states) and funded from separate, dedicated, dependable revenue sources in the knowledge that road-building projects are long-term undertakings. That Republicans in the House are allergic to new taxes, and that all 140 seats in the General Assembly are on the ballot this year, does not change that basic reality.

Rather than shove the House plan or something close to it down the Senate's throat and see whether it gags, the conferees would be wiser to offer a real compromise. That would entail limiting transportation's dependency on unreliable general fund revenue while drawing on some new, more sustainable revenue source -- perhaps along the lines of a fee for all newly registered vehicles, such as the one that Sen. John H. Chichester (R-Northumberland) has proposed and that the Senate has endorsed. By incorporating elements of both plans, negotiators may produce a package that neither the House nor the Senate adores but that makes sense for a state too long starved of money for essential infrastructure projects.

Rice Urges Iran To Reconsider Defiance As Nuclear Deadline Passes (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0135154

By David Millikin

AFP, February 22, 2007

As Iran ignored a UN deadline Wednesday to suspend its nuclear reprocessing activities, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Islamic republic to reconsider its defiance and accept an offer of better relations with Washington.

"The Iranians have unfortunately not acceded to the international community's demands," Rice said after talks here with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

Rice, in Berlin for a meeting of the so-called Quartet of Middle East peace mediators, said she would be consulting with her major power counterparts on the next steps to take concerning Iran's nuclear programme.

The United States has said it will seek to expand sanctions imposed on Iran on December 23 because of Tehran's refusal to suspend a uranium enrichment programme it and others fear is a cover for the development of nuclear weapons.

The UN Security Council resolution gave Iran 60 days to comply, but Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Wednesday vowed to press ahead with the nuclear programme.

"Achieving nuclear energy is very important for the progress and development of our country," Ahmadinejad told a public rally.

Tehran insists its program is only to provide fuel for nuclear power plants, but highly enriched uranium can also provide material to make atomic weapons.

Rice re-affirmed a US offer, first made last May, to end a 27-year rupture in American-Iranian relations if they comply with the UN conditions.

Together with the other four permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany, Washington also pledged to help Iran develop a peaceful nuclear energy programme if it would halt its own enrichment activities.

"We offered to reverse 27 years of policy to engage in the context of the six (parties) and I said I would meet with my Iranian counterpart any place, any where, any time if they suspend," she said.

"I want to emphasize that the best course would be for Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities so we can return to negotiations," Rice said at a press conference.

"That's the purpose of having pressure on the Iranian regime," she said.

Rice was expected to discuss the issue of increasing the sanctions pressure against Iran with Steinmeier, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana on the sideline of the Berlin meeting.

The limited sanctions resolution adopted in December specifically target trade and officials involving Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes and Russia, which has close economic ties with Iran, is expected to resist further punitive measures.

The next step in the UN process is a report to be released by the head of the UN nuclear watchdog by Friday confirming that Iran is pushing ahead with uranium enrichment.

Iran Risks Further Isolation, Says US (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Iran faced further isolation if it failed to meet United Nations demands to curb its nuclear programme, the US's national security adviser warned on Wednesday.

On the day of a UN deadline, Stephen Hadley argued that the Bush administration's concerns were shared by Russia, in spite of the split between Moscow and Washington on issues such as missile defence.

"Regrettably, the Iranian regime has pursued a policy of pursuing a nuclear programme in defiance of the international community and the result is that it is increasingly isolated," he said. However, an expected report on Iran's nuclear programme by Mohamed ElBaradei, the UN's chief nuclear watchdog, was delayed yesterday, for finishing touches.

Mr Hadley added that Moscow's recent decision to delay work on Iran's light water reactor at Bushehr – ostensibly because of Tehran's failure to pay Russian contractors promptly – indicated the Kremlin's worries about Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"They have been increasingly concerned about the proliferation risks associated with Bushehr," he said. "They have entered into understandings with Iranians to mitigate some of those risks," he added, referring to Russia's agreement with Tehran to take back spent nuclear fuel.

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, yesterday rallied public support for the programme in speeches in the northern province of Gilan, claiming that nuclear technology would "push Iran 50 years ahead".

The US and Israel have frequently warned that Iran could reach a "point of no return" and master uranium enrichment.

U.S. Weighs Extra Steps On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Amid signs of economic unease in Iran, the U.S. and its European partners are weighing another set of financial restrictions on Tehran, including the possibility of targeting companies run by the country's elite Revolutionary Guard Corps.

• The Goal: Officials from the U.S. and Europe say that U.N. sanctions on Iran are working and plan to pursue further financial restrictions in the Security Council to force Tehran to the negotiating table.

• The Alternative: If the Security Council doesn't act, as is likely, the Bush administration will take its own measures, and is keen to find ways to home in on the growing business operations of the Revolutionary Guard, Iran's paramilitary force.

• The Hurdle: Despite rising friction among various factions in Iran over how to proceed on the nuclear front, there are few suggestions so far that the Iranian government plans to bend.

U.S. and European officials say that the move toward a second round of United Nations sanctions, which would likely involve freezing the overseas assets of certain Iranian companies or individuals, reflects their cautious optimism that sustained pressure on Tehran might succeed in bringing the country to the negotiating table over its nuclear program. International financial restrictions, including a U.N. package in December, have stirred significant debate within Iran about the wisdom of confrontation with the outside world, as the economy there begins to show signs of distress.

Bush administration officials say they are also considering ways for the U.S. to ramp up pressure on its own if countries within the U.N. Security Council balk at sterner steps, as is likely. The administration is particularly keen to find ways to home in on the growing business operations of the Revolutionary Guard, the country's secretive paramilitary force also known as the IRGC.

Keeping up the pressure may not be easy. Of the five permanent members of the Security Council, France, Britain and the U.S. are eager to push ahead on a second resolution and have already begun to consider some potential targets. But China and, above all, Russia are wary of pushing too hard. "Russia will control the pace of things going forward," said one U.S. official.

The December resolution gave Iran a 60-day ultimatum to freeze its uranium-enrichment work or face stiffer economic sanctions. The West alleges Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear program; Iran insists it is developing an independent energy source. The U.N. deadline lapsed yesterday, without any signs of compromise from Iran.

Despite rising friction among various factions in Iran over how to proceed on the nuclear front, there are few suggestions so far that the Iranian government plans to bend. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said earlier this week that Iran might be willing to suspend its uranium-enrichment work if other countries did the same, an offer the U.S. quickly rejected. Yesterday, he said in a speech that the U.S. and others will not "thwart the will of the Iranian nation to achieve the peaceful use of nuclear technology."

Still, the combination of U.N. sanctions and more-focused U.S. financial actions has already scared away some international business from Iran and increased the cost for Iran of conducting international trade. Recent U.S. moves to isolate Iranian banks and companies from international financial circles have led several major European banks to cut off their operations in Iran. So far, European trade with Iran hasn't slumped substantially.

Current and former U.S. officials say they are now focusing on how to combat the IRGC, which is seen as the power base behind Mr. Ahmadinejad's presidency and the central Iranian player supporting militant Islamist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas. The IRGC is also central to Tehran's pursuit of unconventional weaponry, and it has increasingly taken a leading role in Tehran's business activities, particularly gaining concessions in lucrative oil and gas deposits, U.S. officials say.

The December U.N. resolution singled out the financial assets of two of the IRGC's top leaders, Major Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi and IRGC Air Force chief Gen. Hosein Salimi. It alleged that both are aiding Iran's pursuit of nuclear technologies and long-range missiles.

Some U.S. officials now want to expand these sanctions to target the financial assets of the IRGC. These officials argue that the listing of the two IRGC leaders in the December resolution gives the international community legal grounds to try to freeze all IRGC assets internationally. The IRGC's oil and gas investments are seen as particularly vulnerable, because they often would involve foreign partners or foreign financing to succeed. Some U.S. officials believe many Iranians would support sanctions against the IRGC, because the organization is gaining a greater hold over Iran's overall economy.

Singling out the IRGC "buttresses domestic criticism of the regime's cronyism; and it pulls at the purse strings of the specific element of the Iranian bureaucracy responsible for the region's most egregious behavior," said Matthew Levitt, who served as the Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for intelligence and analysis until last month.

Some U.S. and European officials working on Iran said there isn't yet a consensus internationally or in Washington to challenge the IRGC directly. Others disagree over whether the U.N. mandate provides the legal grounds to try to freeze the IRGC's assets, while some U.S. diplomats worry that taking a confrontational stance against the IRGC risks undermining continuing efforts to find a negotiated settlement over Iran's nuclear program.

A second U.N. sanctions resolution would most likely seek to expand the list of targeted Iranian companies and individuals whose assets abroad would be frozen, U.S. and European officials said. The U.S. may try to include more IRGC officials, or even IRGC companies, on an expanded list, although that debate has yet to begin among U.N. Security Council members, which would need to approve any new sanctions on Iran.

The December resolution demanded that countries freeze the assets of 10 companies and organizations and 12 individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. That list was the result of months of debate between the U.S., Britain, France and Germany on one side, and Russia on the other. China was less involved in the negotiations. Moscow, in particular, resisted the imposition of any restrictions that would take aim at Iran's economy generally or that would impede its continuing construction of a nuclear-energy plant in Iran.

Iran's President Vows To Keep Enriching Uranium Despite Expiration Of U.N. Deadline To Stop (NYT)

By Graham Bowley And Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

Unbowed by international pressure, Iran's president vowed yesterday to press ahead with the country's uranium enrichment program, even as a United Nations deadline to shut the program down passed.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran had a right to pursue nuclear technology and "will continue our work to reach our right in the shortest possible time," according to the ISNA news agency. Speaking in Siahkal in northern Iran, Mr. Ahmadinejad said, "Obtaining this technology is very important for our country's development and honor."

The United Nations seems unlikely to take swift action, because of a sense that the limited sanctions already imposed on Iran by the Security Council are working. Two Council ambassadors in New York and officials in Washington indicated that Iran's stance had become less truculent and more flexible.

A report by the International Atomic Energy Agency, expected to be released today, will detail the extent of Iran's compliance with the United Nations demands.

The report may intensify the debate among Western governments about whether to impose more punishing sanctions. It may also deepen the debate within the Bush administration over whether and when to take military action.

Though Mr. Ahmadinejad took a hard line yesterday, he has said in recent days that Iran is prepared to negotiate and offered to stop enriching uranium if Western nations did the same — a proposal that the Bush administration dismissed out of hand.

DOJ_NMG_0135157

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said yesterday. "It's pretty clear that the international community has said to the Iranians, 'You can have nuclear power, but we don't want you to have the ability to build nuclear weapons.' And that is an offer we continue to make."

Germany, which along with France and Britain has led negotiations with Iran on behalf of the European Union, held out hope that talks could be reconvened, but only if Tehran sent clear signals of its sincerity.

American-led efforts to build pressure on Iran gained a prominent backer yesterday when India announced that it had banned the export of anything that could assist the Iranian nuclear program.

In contrast to past instances, when the United States and other countries have cited Iran's noncompliance as a reason for prompt international action, diplomats said that the only political conversations now in progress about Iran were taking place within national governments, and that United Nations ambassadors in New York had not yet met to discuss their ideas. They said efforts to formulate a United Nations response to the broken deadline would probably take many weeks.

A Dangerous Partnership (WSJ)

By Ilan Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Financial pressure by the U.S. and other Western governments in recent weeks is beginning to have a real impact, chilling investment into Iran's energy sector and ratcheting up the costs of the regime's atomic effort. But these gains are in danger of being erased, thanks to the growing economic partnership between Tehran and Beijing.

In late December, China's third-largest national energy conglomerate, the China National Offshore Oil Corporation (Cnooc), signed a memorandum of understanding to develop Iran's massive North Pars natural gas field. Under the prospective deal, worth a whopping $16 billion, Cnooc would cooperate with the National Iranian Oil Company to develop and liquefy the field's estimated 80 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. At around the same time, another Chinese firm, PetroChina, inked a deal to annually import some three million tons of liquefied natural gas from Iran over a quarter-century. PetroChina's parent company, the China National Petroleum Corporation (CNPC), has followed suit, finalizing a $3.6 billion project to explore and exploit Iran's South Pars gas field.

In the process, Beijing has put the Bush administration on the horns of a major policy dilemma. The first part of the problem is practical. Cnooc is a publicly traded company on the New York Stock Exchange. So is PetroChina. As such, both potentially are subject to the provisions of the 1996 Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA), which is intended to curb Iran's "ability to support acts of international terrorism and to fund the development and acquisition of weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them." It does so by authorizing the White House to impose a number of concrete economic penalties -- from prohibitions on large-scale U.S. bank loans to restrictions on the procurement of goods -- on foreign corporations engaged in commerce in the U.S., which also do more than $20 million annually in business with Tehran. The message of the law, as written by Congress, was clear: You can trade with us, or with Iran, but not with both.

But when it comes to China, the situation is not so simple. Cnooc, PetroChina and CNPC are not just private entities; they are appendages of the Chinese Communist Party, and de facto instruments of its foreign policy. The application of sanctions against them, therefore, would be tantamount to an act of economic warfare -- and the Bush administration has little stomach for a trade war (or worse) with China.

The second issue is strategic. Already, other foreign multinationals have begun to take their cues from Beijing. Royal Dutch Shell has, along with Spain's Repsol, just concluded a preliminary agreement with the Iranian regime worth an estimated $4.3 billion for the construction of a liquefied natural gas plant and port terminal in the Islamic Republic. Malaysia's L1, meanwhile, recently signed a deal worth nearly $3 billion to build a refinery in Iran's Khuzestan province. Needless to say, these deals have struck a body blow to the recent progress made by Washington in isolating the Islamic Republic financially.

Reversing this trend is bound to be an uphill battle. Over the past decade, ILSA has been honored entirely in the breach, with the U.S. consistently failing to apply its provisions to foreign violators.

The one time that it came even remotely close to doing so was in 1998, against Russia's Gazprom, France's TotalFinaElf and Malaysia's Petronas. But the Clinton administration ultimately chose to waive ILSA provisions in the spirit of international cooperation -- and as a sop to the new, "reformist" government in Tehran. That decision became the model for subsequent violations by companies such as Italy's ENI, Canada's Sheer Energy and Norway's StatOil. Each time, Washington's calculus has been the same: bilateral trade over international security.

This is a major miscalculation. Bilateral sanctions are a critical tool in the U.S. economic arsenal. By actively enforcing such measures, policy makers in Washington have the ability to hammer home the point that trade with an increasingly intransigent Iranian regime is not cost-free -- and to force Iran's trading partners to choose between doing business with Tehran and conducting commerce with the U.S.

At the end of the day, China's economic interests are understandable. Runaway economic growth has brought with it a voracious appetite for energy, and Iran has emerged as one of China's largest oil suppliers. As a result, policy makers in Beijing have studiously avoided making a choice on Iran's nuclear program, even as they provide the Iranian regime with the economic tools to accelerate it.

The failure of the Bush administration to take Beijing to task, however, is far less comprehensible. U.S. policy must be geared toward making China and its economic fellow travelers aware of the gravity of the unfolding Iranian nuclear crisis -- and providing them with the political rationale to make the right choices about partnership with Tehran. Raising the costs for China to do business in the Islamic Republic seems like a very good place to start.

Mr. Berman, vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, is the author of "Tehran Rising: Iran's Challenge to the United States" (Rowman & Littlefield, 2005) and editor of the forthcoming "Taking on Tehran" (Rowman & Littlefield, 2007).

Splits Emerge Between U.S. And Europe Over Aid For Palestinians (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 21 — Fractures between the United States and Europe began to appear Wednesday over whether the new Palestinian unity government was likely to receive international economic support even as the Middle East peace negotiators officially continued their wait-and-see approach.

After the meeting here of representatives of the so-called quartet of Middle East peace negotiators — the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union — the group released a statement that “reaffirmed” its support for a Palestinian government that would recognize Israel and renounce violence.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said repeatedly that unless the new unity government meets those conditions, the United States will continue its economic boycott of the Palestinian government. So far, the Saudi-brokered government, which included the moderate president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and the militant Islamic movement Hamas, does not.

But European officials appeared more willing to hold out the possibility of finding members of a new unity government with whom to work. “There are ways that we can be flexible,” one European official said.

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, who has said that the United States and Europe should look for ways to engage Hamas, was pointed during a news conference about not threatening to continue the boycott if the new government did not recognize Israel.

The quartet communiqué said, “Clearly in this statement we support the formation of a new Palestinian government,” Mr. Lavrov said. “It was also underscored that further steps must be taken to support the Palestinians. One certainly shouldn’t speak of a boycott in this regard.”

In the United States Congress, Representative Nita M. Lowey, Democrat of New York, is blocking $86 million that the Bush administration wants to strengthen Mr. Abbas’s security forces. An aide to Ms. Lowey said she would lift the hold when the State Department provided guarantees that the money would be used only for nonlethal security assistance, like uniforms and communications equipment.

The United States and other Western countries cut off close to $1 billion in direct aid to the Palestinian government after Hamas won last year’s parliamentary elections.

DOJ_NMG_0135159

The United States will have a tough balancing act as it tries to keep the quartet united in an economic boycott of the Palestinian government while trying to bolster Mr. Abbas in peace talks with Israel. Those talks, which began Monday with a summit meeting between Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, ended a few hours later with little sign of progress.

Mr. Abbas has maintained that he agreed to the pact to end the violence between Hamas and Fatah, which has left more than 100 Palestinians dead.

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, Mr. Olmert said Wednesday that he was willing to meet "again and again" with Mr. Abbas. But he also made clear that serious peace negotiations were unlikely unless the Palestinian government was willing to recognize Israel.

"The agreement signed between Fatah and Hamas does not promise any change in the basic policy toward Israel," Mr. Olmert said at a news conference.

Hamas says it has no objections to Mr. Abbas's negotiating with Israel, but Mr. Abbas has limited authority, and Mr. Olmert indicated that would limit the scope of their discussions.

United Front On Unity Government (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 21 -- European and U.S. officials on Wednesday sought to play down emerging differences over the new Palestinian unity government during a meeting of a high-level group that monitors efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The meeting of the Quartet -- made up of the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and the United States -- came as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas started a tour of Europe to promote the unity accord he had reached with the Hamas militant group. He met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and also planned to visit Paris, Berlin and Brussels.

U.S. officials say they were surprised that Abbas struck the deal, which angered Israeli officials and cast a pall over a summit that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brokered in Jerusalem this week between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

European officials have been much more receptive to the unity government, saying it might be a way to encourage Hamas to eventually accept a peace deal. European officials note that some possible members of the government are seasoned and respected Palestinians with no links to terrorism.

"I hope very much that the national unity government will be part of the solution and not part of the problem," the E.U. foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said at a news conference after the meeting.

In a statement laden with diplomatic code words, the Quartet welcomed Rice's efforts and reaffirmed that a Palestinian government must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and honor previous agreements with Israel. But the group also said it was exploring an expansion of a European aid pipeline to the Palestinians.

In Israel, Olmert suggested to foreign journalists that Abbas, whose Fatah movement lost parliamentary elections to Hamas in January 2006, would not be able to enforce any agreement that emerged from peace talks with him. "A body which does not represent the majority today amongst the Palestinians will not be able to actually carry out any commitment that will make any such talks valuable or meaningful," Olmert said.

A day earlier, Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin, said that future contacts with Abbas, if he allows Fatah to join the Hamas-led unity government, would be limited to discussion of conflict-management issues such as prisoners and checkpoints and roadblocks in the occupied territories.

U.S. officials, distributing transcripts of Olmert's news conference, sought to emphasize that elsewhere in his remarks, Olmert did not close the door to the peace efforts launched by Rice. They noted that Olmert said he was "absolutely loyal" to eventually creating a Palestinian state.

An Israeli official, asked to explain Olmert's remarks on condition of anonymity, said the Israelis would continue bilateral discussions on fighting terrorism and improving life for the Palestinians, while keeping the door open to contacts with Abbas.

U.S. officials originally hoped that Abbas would be able to use a possible peace deal to defeat Hamas in another election. But those hopes were dashed when Abbas, saying he needed to end intra-Palestinian violence that has left scores dead, reached an accommodation with Hamas.

Quartet Plays Wait-and-see With Palestinian Government (AFP)

By Deborah Cole

AFP, February 22, 2007

A meeting of the Quartet for Middle East peace wrapped up with major powers saying they will await the formation of the new Palestinian unity government before deciding whether to lift aid and diplomatic embargoes.

The meeting was the second this month bringing together Russia, the European Union, the United States and the United Nations -- the Quartet behind the roadmap for Middle East peace drawn up in 2003.

But the two-hour talks left the diplomatic riddle posed by the power-sharing deal between Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and the Islamist movement Hamas unsolved.

"We will make a decision when it is time to make a decision but there is not yet a Palestinian unity government," Rice said when asked about the Quartet's position on existing embargoes.

The statement, read by UN chief Ban Ki-moon, reiterated the Quartet's demands to begin normal diplomatic relations with the Palestinian Authority: recognising Israel, renouncing violence and honouring past agreements with the Jewish state, including the roadmap.

It added the Quartet agreed to continue to meet regularly and that the next gathering of the four powers would take place in the Middle East "soon."

Hamas, which the US, the European Union and Israel call a terrorist organisation, has not yet clearly agreed to the West's conditions.

Long an advocate of a softer line on Hamas than Washington has taken, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov chose to emphasise the Quartet's support of an end to the Palestinian power struggle.

"The statement that the UN Secretary General has just read is quite clear -- it supports the formation of a new Palestinian government and in this context it was underscored that further steps must be taken to support the Palestinians," he said, adding that the statement did not mention the boycott.

Rice, who is trying to convince her allies to withhold recognition of the unity government unless Hamas meets international principles for peace, said the Palestinian leadership should not expect any flexibility on the issue.

"When one talks about peace between Israelis and Palestinians, it has to be on the basis of internationally accepted principles," she said.

"How can it be that you have talks about peace if one party does not accept the right of the other party to exist? How can it be that you have discussions about peace when a party will not renounce violence?

"In that sense the complication of not fully having a Palestinian government that clearly accepts the Quartet principles I think should be well understood."

The embargo imposed by the Quartet after January 2006 elections that Hamas won has caused widespread economic hardship in the Palestinian areas and there is growing unease in Europe over the measures.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana called on the Palestinian leadership to fulfill its international commitments to pave the way forward.

"I hope very much that the national unity government will be part of the solution and not part of the problem," he said.

A senior EU official said earlier that Europe tended to take a more positive view of the Palestinian unity government than the United States but added that all saw the inclusion of Hamas in the government as problematic.

"But nobody wants to give money to Hamas, nobody," the official said.

Rice also emphasized the importance of continuing to support Abbas in his power struggle with Iranian-backed Hamas.

Abbas, long portrayed by Washington as the best "partner for peace" with Israel, has embarked on a diplomatic offensive of his own. He is touring Europe to defend the unity government deal.

He insists the agreement reached between his Fatah faction and Hamas should satisfy the Quartet principles since it obliges the new unity government to respect international resolutions and agreements signed by the Fatah-led Palestine Liberation Organisation -- meaning deals with the Jewish state.

Rice held an inconclusive summit Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

DOJ_NMG_0135161

Palestinians earlier urged the Quartet powers to give their incoming government a chance.

"We hope the Quartet will take a positive approach towards the government and not resort to pressure and boycott," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led government.

Israel has ruled out dealing with any government that includes Hamas.

It reiterated its hope that the Quartet will stick to the conditions imposed on the Palestinian government for the aid boycott to be lifted.

"It is important and critical that the international community continues to respect these conditions, which are not negotiable," Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told army radio.

Russia And US Split Over Palestinian Unity Government (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Russia and the US were at odds yesterday over relations with a planned Palestinian national unity government, revealing divisions that are likely to further hamper efforts to reinvigorate international backing for a Middle East peace initiative.

Ahead of a meeting in Berlin yesterday evening of the Middle East Quartet - comprising Russia, the European Union, the US and the UN - Russia's foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, said pressure on the Palestinian Authority should be eased by lifting an aid embargo imposed when Hamas won elections last year.

He told a Russian newspaper: "I hope the Quartet will favour a lifting of the financial and economic sanctions . . . that will be the position of Russia, the EU and the UN secretary-general."

In contrast, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, speaking in Berlin ahead of the Quartet meeting, repeated the US's tough stance against Hamas, which it lists as a terrorist organisation. She brushed aside suggestions of easing sanctions, arguing that the principles established by the Quartet after the Hamas victory remained "critically important".

These require any PA government to recognise Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept previous agreements, including those relating to the Quartet's own "road map".

The US and Israel have argued that a recent accord agreed in Mecca between Hamas and Fatah, led by Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, to establish a national unity government did not go far enough, as Hamas only agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel.

Ms Rice, who on Monday held largely fruitless talks with Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, and Mr Abbas, said she would not judge a unity government until it was formed, a process likely to take at least a month.

European politicians and the UN were more positive towards the Mecca agreement.

Ban Ki-moon, UN secretary-general, told journalists in Berlin it was "crucially important for the international community to encourage this Mecca deal".

Tony Blair, the British prime minister, said in London ahead of a meeting with Mr Abbas: "It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government . . I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas."

Blair Hints UK May Deal With Hamas (FT)

By Hugh Williamson And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The UK on Wednesday indicated it could be prepared to do business with the Islamic group Hamas, in comments that underlined the growing difference in approach between Europe and the US on how best to pursue peace in the Middle East.

Speaking in London ahead of a meeting with Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, Tony Blair, British prime minister, welcomed the agreement earlier this month to form a Palestinian government of national unity. He even anticipated working with officials from Hamas, which agreed during talks in Mecca to set up the government with Mr Abbas's Fatah party.

"It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government," he said. "I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas."

By contrast, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said earlier this month that her efforts to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian agreement had "been made more complicated by the unity government".

"We want to see this [unity] government in operation. We're not interested in the rhetoric, we're interested in its actions," said a British government official last night. "We have to find a way forward here, and if we find people we can do business with we have to work with that."

Many British and European officials say that their approach differs from that of the US and Israel, who are more focused on Hamas's anti-Israel programme and charter rather than on the possible behaviour of Hamas politicians while in government office.

After Hamas won parliamentary elections last year the international Quartet – comprising the European Union, the US, Russia and the United Nations – called for the Palestinian government to renounce violence, respect past peace agreements and recognise Israel.

Because of Hamas's failure to sign up to such principles, the US and the EU have refused to fund or establish contacts with the Hamas-led administration.

But some European officials now privately argue that the condition on recognising Israel was too stringent and that the US has an "unrealistic" attitude to negotiating with extremist groups.

Speaking ahead of a meeting of the Quartet in Berlin yesterday evening, Sergei Lavrov, Russia's foreign minister, added that the aid embargo should be lifted.

But Ms Rice repeated the US's tough stance against Hamas, which it lists as a terrorist organisation. She brushed aside suggestions of easing sanctions, arguing that the principles established by the Quartet after the Hamas victory remained "critically important".

The US and Israel have argued that the accord reached in Mecca to establish a national unity government does not go far enough, as Hamas only agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel.

Ms Rice, who on Monday held largely fruitless talks with Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, and Mr Abbas, said she would not judge a unity government until it was formed, a process likely to take at least a month.

Germany Urges Tamer Mideast Expectations (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 22, 2007

Germany's foreign minister warned Wednesday against building unrealistic expectations for a U.S.-backed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Still, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier cheered the effort led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who came to Europe to report on her meeting Monday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"We have to show a great deal of realism," and not get ahead of what is still a tentative but hopeful process, Steinmeier said following a meeting with Rice.

He acknowledged, as Rice has done, that peace prospects are clouded by uncertainty over the political role of Palestinian Hamas militants.

Asked about Britain's decision to pull some 1,600 troops from Iraq, Rice said the move is consistent with the U.S. plan to turn over more control to Iraqi forces when possible.

"The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits," Rice said at a press conference with Steinmeier.

"The coalition remains intact and, in fact, the British still have thousands of troops deployed in Iraq," she said.

Prime Minister Tony Blair said earlier in the day that Britain would withdraw around 1,600 troops from Iraq over the coming months and aims to cut its 7,100 troop levels to below 5,000 by late summer.

Rice and Abbas were holding separate meetings in Berlin on a new power-sharing deal between Hamas and the moderate, Western-backed Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0135163

The deal, although not final, falls far short of international demands that Hamas drop its signature anti-Israeli policies. Hamas has refused to bend despite a boycott of vital international aid.

Diplomats from the United States, Europe, Russia and the United Nations were conferring Wednesday on the changed circumstances since Abbas announced the agreement two weeks ago. The group, known collectively as the Quartet, are stewards of a mothballed 2003 peace plan that would eventually establish an independent Palestinian state.

The United States pointed to positive momentum from Monday's talks in Jerusalem, despite few obvious signs of progress. Israel balked at pursuing far-reaching peace proposals with Abbas, following his Fatah faction's power-sharing deal with Hamas, which refuses to recognize the Jewish state.

On Tuesday, Israel ruled out holding further Mideast peace talks with Abbas once he forms a coalition with Hamas militants, saying the new unity government must go along with international demands to recognize Israel's right to exist.

Rice and Abbas met separately in Amman on Tuesday with Jordan's King Abdullah II. Abbas said after the meeting that Monday's summit had been "tense and difficult" but "it was not a failure, and it will be followed by other meetings."

Abbas planned to fly to Germany, Britain and France on a campaign to convince European leaders — whom the Palestinians hope are wavering on the economic boycott — that the unity deal was a major victory that should be rewarded.

He said Israel may have "misunderstood" the coalition deal, which "was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," according to Jordan's official Petra news agency.

But Israel remained adamant.

"The agreements between Hamas and Abu Mazen disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Tuesday, referring to Abbas by his nickname.

Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokeswoman, ruled out holding any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he formed a new Cabinet that included Hamas.

Israel would continue to deal with Abbas, but only on such matters as improving Palestinians' living conditions and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel — not on a final peace deal.

Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just For Jews (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A manifesto argues that the nation's minority is entitled to share power in a binational state.

NAZARETH, ISRAEL — A broadly representative elite of Israel's Arab minority has rejected the idea of Israel as a Jewish state and demanded a partnership in governing the country to ensure that Arab citizens get equal treatment and more control over their communities.

In a manifesto that is stirring anger and soul-searching among Jews, Arab leaders have declared that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens are an indigenous group with collective rights, not just individual rights. The document argues that Arabs are entitled to share power in a binational state and block policies that discriminate against them.

Arab citizens, who make up about one-fifth of Israel's population, have always felt alienated by the Star of David on Israel's flag and a national anthem that expresses the Jewish yearning for a return to Zion. They have long protested the disproportionate Jewish share of budget resources, public services and land.

Until now, though, only small groups of Arab intellectuals had dared to advocate collective equality or the abolition of Jewish national symbols.

"The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel" is the first such sweeping demand by Israel's Arab mainstream. The manifesto was drafted by 40 academics and activists under the sponsorship of the Committee of Arab Mayors in Israel and has been endorsed by an unprecedented range of Arab community leaders.

As such, it has set off alarms.

As Jewish leaders learned of the document, which was issued in December but not widely circulated until last month, they seized on it as evidence of a growing militancy by a minority that, by and large, openly sympathized with Hezbollah guerrillas fighting Israel in last summer's war in Lebanon.

The document does not address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But critics argue that adoption of its proposal to redefine Israel as a binational state would undermine Jewish support for a separate Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a solution to which Israel's government is formally committed.

Commentators on the right have denounced the manifesto as the work of an internal enemy that threatens Israel's identity as a haven for Jewish self-determination. On the left, Jews who have advocated equal treatment of Arabs within a Jewish state say they feel disheartened.

"Is this the beginning of a new demand for the establishment of a state within a state?" Hagai Meirom, treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel, asked at a public forum last month. "Is it still possible to mend the Arab minority's feelings of belonging?"

The document's sponsors say most of the criticism misses the point.

Shawki Khatib, head of the 64-member Arab mayors group, said the manifesto was not an ultimatum but an effort to catalog Jewish discrimination against Arabs and provoke debate over how Israel's two largest communities should live together.

"The main message is that we do not accept our situation as second-class citizens," Khatib said in an interview at the group's headquarters here. "We want to change that situation, and we prefer to change it through dialogue."

He said he would invite Israeli officials to take part in an assembly next month to discuss the eight-chapter document.

The walls outside Khatib's office display mementos of Arab alienation. One poster reads "We will not forget" alongside portraits of 13 Israeli Arabs killed by riot police in October 2000 while demonstrating in solidarity with a Palestinian uprising.

Driving home from Nazareth, Khatib stopped his car to illustrate another grievance: entrenched discrimination that contributes to sharp inequalities between Israeli Arabs and Jews.

Across the highway from Yaffa a-Nasra, the Arab village he has governed for 16 years, Khatib pointed to a modern industrial park, home to electronic and biotechnology plants. It lies within the Jewish municipality of Migdal Emek.

"Whenever the central government builds a new industrial area, it gets located in a Jewish town instead of an Arab town," he said. "The Israeli towns get the local tax revenue and the jobs. Look, this highway separates our reality from theirs."

Central government allocations for public services further skew the income gap. In public education, for example, the state invests about twice as much per Jewish pupil as per Arab pupil.

Nearly half of Israel's Arabs live below the poverty line, and their rates of unemployment and infant mortality are twice the national average. They face obstacles securing residency permits for Arab spouses who are not Israeli. Exempt from military service, they do not qualify for thousands of higher-paying jobs reserved for veterans. They make up only 10% of Israel's university undergraduates.

In Israel, A Chasm Widens (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Growing mistrust between Israel's Jews and its 1.3 million Arab citizens is testing a political and social fabric already strained by six years of violence and war between Israel and its Arab neighbors, including the Palestinians.

The deepening divide has come into sharper focus here since an Israeli-Arab cleric sent chills across the nation last weekend by calling for a new "intifada," or uprising, in response to construction work near one of the most revered holy sites for both Muslims and Jews. As a result, controversy over Raad Salah, a bespectacled Islamist whose sharp jaw is framed by a white-tipped silver beard he wears sans moustache, is casting both a spotlight and a shadow on Israeli Arabs.

The nation's biggest minority group, long tolerated though neglected, has begun to buck what many feel is its second-class status in a state where public life is suffused with Jewish identity. Unlike Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and West Bank -- territories long controlled by Israel -- the Arabs within Israel itself are legally entitled to full citizenship and all the rights that carries.

Israeli Jews find questions about the fundamental identity of their state jarring, though. They are also increasingly fearful of growing religiosity and radicalism among Arab citizens.

"Most organizations dealing with coexistence are now motivated by a deep sense that things have gotten worse and are on the edge," says Avi Melamed, a former counterterrorism official who was an adviser on Arab affairs to two Jerusalem mayors, including Ehud Olmert, now Israel's prime minister.

More disturbing to others is what they don't see. "There is almost no institutionalized dialogue between the Arab community and the state of Israel," says Mohammad Darawshe, a director at the Abraham Fund Initiatives, an Israeli nonprofit group that works to bring Arabs and Jews together.

To many Jewish leaders, the rise of Mr. Salah, who heads a growing faction of the Islamist movement in Israel, confirms their worst fears about a "fifth column" attacking from within. This notion now seems to be part of the mainstream political dialogue, although it was once thought by some to be too impolitic to utter in polite conversation.

But Israeli-Arab leaders and many Jews working for coexistence recoil from the idea that roughly one-fifth of Israel's population could be broadly brushed as a security threat. They also say Mr. Salah and other Islamists are able to capitalize on decades of discrimination within Israeli society and the resulting inequities, which Islamists fill through their own social programs.

Leaders say tensions now appear to be higher than at any time since October 2000. That is when pressure swirling around the Temple Mount -- almost identical in nature, though not scope, to protests Mr. Salah has been leading for two weeks -- sparked what became known as the al-Aqsa Intifada, or the Second Intifada. The ensuing war between Palestinian militant groups and Israel left thousands dead. In the Galilee region of the north, where Arab cities are concentrated, a dozen unarmed Israeli-Arab citizens were killed by police gunfire during eight days of protests and riots as the intifada began. "It was a major break point, and things have gotten worse," Mr. Melamed says.

A government investigative panel looked behind the troubles, concluding in 2003 that Israel's relationship with its Arab minority was "primarily neglectful and discriminatory." It also said Israel, home to nearly five million Jews, didn't do nearly enough to allocate equal resources to Arab towns, where it said there were substantially defective infrastructures and "serious problems in the education system."

There was also a communal loss of faith, according to Mr. Darawshe and Baker Awawdy, who lives in an Arab village near Nazareth and is executive director of the all-volunteer Center for the Struggle Against Racism. Jews stopped shopping in Arab cities and villages, wounding local Arab economies and straining personal ties between the two communities. On a political level, Israeli Jews also increasingly saw Arabs as disloyal, says Mr. Melamed, because so many Arabs expressed sympathy with Palestinians in the territories during the intifada. Arabs remain outraged that no Israeli police officer ever faced charges for the killings of unarmed citizens in Galilee. Mr. Salah was arrested and imprisoned in 2003 for his own alleged disloyalty after authorities accused him of having contact with a foreign agent and giving money to Hamas, the Palestinian Islamist movement. Mr. Salah was released from prison in 2005 and immediately resumed his fiery condemnations of Israel.

While his venom was extreme, he was hardly alone among Israeli Arabs criticizing state policies. Divisions deepened last summer when Arabs objected to the 34-day war with Hezbollah in Lebanon, even as Arab towns in northern Israel were among those showered by Hezbollah rockets. Some Israeli-Arab politicians were even seen as backing Hezbollah, a Shiite Muslim group with political, militant and social-services wings.

Mr. Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, then seemingly confirmed the worst fears of Arabs. Politically weakened by the war, he formed a ruling coalition with the right-wing Yisrael Beiteinu party. It literally translates into, "Israel is our home," and the party's leaders have publicly advocated the forced removal of Israeli-Arab citizens to the Palestinian territories.

Last year, more than three dozen of the Israeli-Arab community's most prominent leaders fired a new salvo. In a rare show of unity, they issued a document called The Future Vision. It demanded that Israel shed its existence as a "Jewish state" in order to become a truly inclusive and consensual democracy for Arabs and Jews. "It was the first time we, as a community, came together -- not to say what we didn't want, but to declare what we did want," says Mr. Awawdy. The report almost immediately drew ire from Jews. Many condemned Arab leaders for rejecting the fundamental basis of the nation as a Jewish state.

But one prominent Israeli-Arab group publicly declared that the report didn't represent its views: Mr. Salah's Islamic Movement. More and more, his group is tending to social needs -- primarily in education and health care -- that the state of Israel has left unattended. "After years of our crying and wailing, we in the Islamic Movement moved to do something about this," explains Marwan Jabareh, a representative of the group in Tamra, a Galilee Arab city of roughly 30,000 people.

Evidence of that commitment stands at the bottom of a slope within the maze of the city's narrow streets: a 43,000-square-foot hospital built with $4 million of charitable funds, set to open in March.

Meanwhile, Mr. Salah is under investigation for alleged incitement for his fiery words. It seems highly unlikely that Israeli-Arab citizens will respond to his entreaty with violence akin to that experienced here during the height of intifada. Although there have been several instances of providing support for terrorists, the number of Israeli Arabs who have actually engaged in terrorist acts is negligible, according to Mr. Melamed and others.

US Lashes Out At Kremlin Over Missiles (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Hugh Williamson And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Tensions intensified on Wednesday over US plans for missile defence bases in Poland and the Czech Republic, as Washington called on Europe to take a tougher stance towards the Kremlin.

The Bush administration's two top foreign policy officials lashed out at Moscow's campaign against the bases, which Washington insists are aimed at possible threats from Iran rather than Russia.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said the suggestion this week by Russia's head of strategic rocket forces that Russia could target the two central European countries if they agreed to host the bases was "very unfortunate".

She also dismissed comments by Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Germany's foreign minister, who said this week Moscow should have been consulted more about the sites, given their proximity to Russia's borders.

Standing next to Mr Steinmeier at a press conference in Berlin, she said Washington had "10 formal contacts" with Russia on the plan since spring 2006, many at ministerial level.

Mr Steinmeier's spokesman said the minister was aware that "technical talks" had taken place between Moscow and Washington, but said he had been warning against a return to the type of security stand-offs of the cold war era.

Separately in Brussels, Stephen Hadley, US national security adviser, emphasised Washington's dismay at a speech this month in which Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, hit out at the missile defence plans and the US's "unilateral" use of force.

"You heard a set of comments in which quite frankly we were disappointed," Mr Hadley told the Financial Times and other European newspapers, between meetings with Nato ambassadors and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief.

"I think a lot of Europeans were disappointed and dismayed. And one of the things that Europeans need to do is they need to make that clear to Russia and they need to make that clear to President Putin."

The EU has consistently struggled to forge a common line on Russia. Countries such as Poland, which are suspicious of the Kremlin's intentions, are pitted against big western European states such as Germany and France, which are often keen to deepen ties with Moscow.

General Yuri Baluyevsky, Russia's army chief of staff, yesterday told Rossiiskaya Gazeta, a government newspaper, the missile defence system "cannot be viewed as anything other than a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence" in Europe.

Rice Slams Russian General Over Comments (AP)

By David McHugh

AP, February 22, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday called a Russian general's warning that Poland and the Czech Republic risk being targeted if they host U.S. missile defense bases "extremely unfortunate."

Rice also repeated assurances the system does not threaten Russia.

Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, head of Russia's strategic missile forces, said Monday that Russia might train its missiles on the two countries if they accept a U.S. proposal to base 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar in the Czech Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0135167

"I think that was an extremely unfortunate comment," Rice said at a news conference in Berlin, adding that the system did not threaten Moscow's forces "and we have had the opportunity to explain that to Russia."

She said the U.S. has made clear to Russia that the system would be to counter any missile threat from Iran. The system is too small to stop Russia's large nuclear arsenal, she said.

"Anyone who knows anything about this knows that there is no way that 10 interceptors ... are a threat to Russia or that they are somehow going to diminish Russia's deterrent of thousands of warheads," Rice said.

"I think everyone understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem," she added.

The missile dispute is chilling relations between Moscow and Washington already damaged by differences over NATO's eastward expansion and U.S. concerns over human rights in Russia.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow sees the establishment of the missile defense sites as a signal that the United States wants to gain nuclear superiority over Russia. He dismissed U.S. claims that it was to counter Iranian threats.

"If they talk about potential threats coming from Iran or North Korea, missile defense elements should be located in a different place," Lavrov said in an interview published Wednesday in the daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta. "We can't help noting that these facilities would be capable of intercepting missiles launched from Russia."

Lavrov said that having the ability to shoot down Russian missiles could allow the United States to consider the possibility of a nuclear strike on Russia without fear of retaliation.

He referred to the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty that Washington quit in order to develop missile defenses, saying that it banned missile defense systems on the assumption that the fear of retaliation would prevent each nation from launching a first strike.

"Since protection from the first strike would be guaranteed, as American strategists apparently expect, another temptation arises — to be the first to launch a strike, aware that a chance has emerged to go unpunished," Lavrov said.

The system consists of interceptor rockets that release a small kill vehicle which maneuvers into the path of oncoming warheads and destroys them in a high-speed collision. Critics say the system has not been convincingly shown to work.

The defensive shield would protect Europe and the eastern United States, complementing bases at Fort Greely, Alaska, and at Vandenberg Air Force Base in California, which are positioned to guard from any North Korean missile launch.

Russian President Vladimir Putin warned earlier this month that the U.S. plan risks provoking a new arms race.

Lavrov followed up on Putin's warning that Russia would take countermeasures in response to the U.S. missile sites deployment in Europe.

"We will respond, of course, but without any hysteria. We can't afford being entangled in an arms race once again," he said.

He said that Russia and the United States must negotiate new arms control agreements to improve mutual trust, particularly as a landmark Soviet-era nuclear arms reduction treaty expires in 2009.

Russian officials have called for negotiations on a replacement for START I, signed in 1991 by the United States and the Soviet Union, which limits the number of various types of vehicles and warheads that can be deployed by either side.

U.S. Tries To Ease Concerns In Russia On Antimissile Plan (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — Bush administration officials tried Wednesday to tamp down Russian concerns, voiced in strikingly harsh terms, over American plans to base missile defenses in Eastern Europe.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the missile defense proposal, which calls for deploying 10 interceptors in Poland and radar in the Czech Republic, was solely intended to counter the possible development of long-range Iranian missiles.

“I think everybody understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem,” she said, adding that the system would not “diminish Russia’s deterrent of thousands of warheads.”

The debate escalated this week when the Russian missile commander, Gen. Nikolai Y. Solovtsov, threatened to aim Russian weapons at states in Eastern Europe that might join the program.

"If the government of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision — and I think mutual consultations that have been held and will be held will allow avoiding this — the strategic missile troops will be able to have those facilities as targets," he said.

And on Wednesday, the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, who has a prickly relationship at best with Ms. Rice, was quoted in Rossiiskaya Gazeta, the Russian state newspaper, wholly contradicting the American position.

"We must acknowledge that these objects are fully suitable to intercept missiles fired from Russian territory," he said.

His colleague, the departing Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, has said that Russia could easily overwhelm the American defenses with a far cheaper system of countermeasures to blind or confuse an antimissile system.

During a stopover in Brussels on Wednesday on his way to Moscow, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said a missile defense system against Iran "is a reasonable thing to do, it's something Europe ought to be interested in, it's something that Russia ought to be interested in." Iran might even decide not to try to build long-range missiles once the system was in place, he suggested.

Ambassador Victoria Nuland, the United States representative to NATO, said Russia had no cause to express surprise, as representatives from Moscow and the European allies were briefed regularly on the project over the past year.

In November, the NATO-Russia Council received what Ms. Nuland called "a full technical briefing" from Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director of the Missile Defense Agency, and Eric S. Edelman, the under secretary of defense for policy.

But the administration is concerned about growing criticism of the program. Officials scheduled a briefing by General Obering on Thursday for foreign reporters based in Washington. Joining him will be Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs.

The antimissile interceptors, General Obering said last month, "are geared toward and are directed toward rogue nation capabilities, obviously not sophisticated ballistic missile fleets such as the Russians have." He said they "cannot physically catch the Russian ICBMs even if we were trying to target those missiles" because of the short distances and flight times from Russian silos in relation to Poland.

The debate began this month with a caustic speech by President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, who told an audience in Munich that the United States was provoking a new nuclear arms race. He also criticized the expansion of NATO.

Senior Bush administration officials attending the security conference in Munich and those back in Washington conferred on the proper response, and they decided to push back — but only gently.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates rewrote his own speech, delivered a day after Mr. Putin's, to say that the Russian president's comments brought a certain nostalgia for a simpler time, but that "one cold war was quite enough."

Angela E. Stent, director of the Center for Eurasian, Russian and East European Studies at Georgetown University, said the Bush administration had "already been reassessing our policy toward Russia, as we have understood at least since January of 2006 or even before that there is a newly self-confident Russia, a Russia that is awash in petrodollars and a Russia that really feels it can say no and pursue its own interests."

Ms. Stent said the Bush administration was well aware that the Russian agenda on Syria, Hamas, Venezuela and a number of issues parted with Washington's. But she said it was worth seeking cooperation, in particular on counterterrorism.

Before he left for Moscow, Mr. Hadley said there were "a number of areas where Russia and the United States and Europe can cooperate productively, where we have common interests, where we can cooperate and are cooperating." These include terrorism and nuclear proliferation.

But the administration is pressing Moscow on other issues of concern, including its use of its energy resources as a political tool, its crackdown on civil liberties and press freedoms and its pressure on Russia's southern neighbors, in particular Georgia.

Rice: Missile-defense Criticism 'Unfortunate' (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

DOJ_NMG_0135169

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The war of words between the United States and Russia over U.S. missile-defense plans in Central Europe escalated yesterday, with Western diplomats saying that Moscow's mistrust and suspicion of Washington -- and the West in general -- have changed little since the Cold War.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice rejected a threat by Gen. Nikolay Solovtsov, commander of Russia's strategic forces, against Poland and the Czech Republic as future hosts of a U.S. missile shield as "extremely unfortunate."

"I think it is unfortunate that the Russian head of strategic rocket forces would come out and say that somehow Poland and the Czech Republic would now be on the target list of Russia," Miss Rice said in Berlin yesterday.

Gen. Solovtsov's comments on Monday followed remarks by Russian President Vladimir Putin in Munich earlier this month, as well as by other Russian officials, lambasting U.S. foreign policy as destabilizing and threatening world peace and security.

Several senior U.S. officials said they have no idea where those belligerent outbursts are coming from, given what they described as a businesslike and professional attitude the Russians have been displaying in private meetings.

Although many of those sessions, especially the high-level ones, often begin with a laundry list of complaints about U.S. actions, the Americans usually answer all of the Russians' questions and concerns, and the Russians understand those answers even if they disagree with them, officials said.

A spokesman for the Russian Embassy did not return phone calls seeking a comment on the matter.

After Moscow accused Washington of not being transparent enough about its missile-defense plans, which Russia fears will target its territory, U.S. officials insisted that they have briefed their Russian counterparts repeatedly during the past year.

"These discussions go back to the spring of 2006. We have had no less than 10 formal contacts with the Russians about the missile-defense deployment and the prospective deployment in Poland and in the Czech Republic of interceptors in Poland and radar sites in the Czech Republic," Miss Rice said yesterday.

"These discussions have gone all the way to the level of minister of defense," she said. "I myself have discussed this with Russian officials several times in more informal settings. We've had briefings of the NATO-Russia Council."

U.S. officials also say that the system would defend against rogue states and terrorists -- not Russia.

"Everybody understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem and that we are talking about long lead times to be able to have a defensive counter to offensive-missile threats," Miss Rice said.

Diplomats and analysts said that the Russians' recent comments make sense in a domestic political context, but the question is whether the Kremlin really thinks the West is still trying to squeeze and intimidate Russia.

"The Russians are working hard to create this beautifully constructed, conspiracy-laden narrative that the West is on a mission to encircle them and weaken their global influence," said Julianne Smith, director of the European program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, who attended the Munich forum where Mr. Putin spoke.

"All that plays perfectly with domestic audiences, but the mystery is that Putin's ratings are extremely high, and he doesn't need this," she said. "I worry that [the tension] will escalate even more with no real substance to it."

N Korea To Reveal Extent Of Uranium Activity (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Suspicions over whether Pyongyang has been running a secret uranium enrichment programme are back in the spotlight after last week's apparent breakthrough in the long-running North Korean nuclear crisis.

Just as concerns about possible uranium enrichment triggered the current crisis, they are again threatening to undermine the agreement under which North Korea will receive step-by-step rewards in return for declaring and then disabling its nuclear weapons programme.

The issue could be a "deal breaker", says William Perry, the US defence secretary under President Bill Clinton. "Much more remains to be done. Two months from now, we will know whether we have a reasonable probability of completing the agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0135170

In an eleventh-hour deal forged in Beijing last week, North Korea agreed to shut and seal its main Yongbyon nuclear plant, provide a list of its nuclear programmes and disable all facilities as it moves towards total "abandonment".

But the details are to be ironed out by lower-level working groups, due to convene shortly. Among those, according to Chun Yung-woo, Seoul's nuclear negotiator, would be a disclosure by North Korea of "how much progress the country has made on its uranium programme".

The current nuclear crisis erupted in October 2002, when Washington charged Pyongyang with obtaining uranium enrichment technology from A Q Khan, the rogue Pakistani scientist, and operating a secret enrichment programme.

James Kelly, the chief US nuclear negotiator at the time, said the North Koreans admitted the charge but Pyongyang has denied having any such programme.

The stand-off led the US to cancel a Clinton-era oil-for-nuclear-freeze agreement and caused North Korea to expel international inspectors and withdraw from the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. North Korea has since separately reprocessed enough spent plutonium fuel rods to have fissile material to spare for last October's nuclear test.

With the US having staked the entire nuclear issue on the uranium claim and North Korea continuing to deny the existence of any such programme, diplomats are seeking ways to prevent the issue derailing the first signs of progress in years.

A senior Washington official said that North Korea objected to the uranium question being included in last week's agreement.

"Since they insisted they do not have a [highly enriched uranium] programme they did not want that in the agreement, but they have agreed to the working group," he said. "We want to run this [highly enriched uranium] thing into the ground."

The Bush administration had already "backed down" on the uranium issue, said Joel Wit, a former State Department official who helped negotiate the nuclear-freeze deal with North Korea in 1994. "This is not because the administration has become wimpish and has decided to put it aside, but because they did not have any information and started to wonder whether they had been accurate in the first place," he said.

There is evidence that North Korea acquired the centrifuges needed to enrich uranium to weapons grade from Pakistan.

"They probably have some centrifuges set up and they have certainly done some research but as far as having a large scale facility up and running, that is probably in the distant future," said Daniel Pinkston of the Centre for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey, California.

Jonathan Pollack, a professor at the US Naval War College, dismissed the concern that North Korea might ultimately use uranium as an alternative source of fissile material.

"Pyongyang pursued this option in transactions with A Q Khan; it also sought to procure substantial quantities of industrial materials needed for an enrichment programme through black markets in Europe," he wrote in the Asia Policy journal. "Yet there is still no definitive evidence of a proven production capability, and it is possible that North Korea long ago shelved major efforts to develop one."

¦ North Korea can make a nuclear warhead that can be mounted on missiles capable of hitting all of South Korea and most of Japan, according to a report by a Washington-based think-tank.

Two US nuclear experts from the Institute for Science and International Security who visited North Korea's atomic facilities said the country had separated enough plutonium for five to 12 nuclear weapons.

North Korea Accuses U.S. Of Fabricating Lies (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, February 22, 2007

North Korea accused the United States of fabricating lies that it was diverting U.N. aid money to develop nuclear weapons and said it would accept an outside audit of U.N. operations unless the aim was to politicize aid to the country, according to a letter circulated Wednesday.

In the letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon accused the United States of "hostile maneuvers" against his country in seeking an audit of the alleged misuse of aid money from the U.N. Development Program, known as UNDP.

DOJ_NMG_0135171

Last month, the United States accused UNDP of funneling millions of dollars in cash aid to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's government to be used for "its own illicit purposes" including possible nuclear weapons development. The U.S. demanded an outside audit, and Ban immediately ordered external audits of all U.N. programs in North Korea.

Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission, said he had no immediate comment because U.S. diplomats had not seen the letter.

Pak said aid projects conducted by UNDP and other U.N. agencies in the North "have been carried out in a fair and transparent way, in conformity with United Nations regulations."

"Therefore, we do not mind whether the external audit is being done or not," he said.

Pak also made clear that North Korea wants to continue cooperation with U.N. agencies, noting that Pyongyang has maintained "good relations and cooperation" with them for several decades.

"But if the above-mentioned external audit is to serve the attempt by the United States to politicize international aid to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, we will not tolerate it and the consequences will be severe," he warned, using the country's official name.

Neither the U.S. nor UNDP would give a figure of how much money was involved in the alleged diversion. UNDP said last month that from 1997 through 2006, the executive board authorized more than $59 million for North Korea but only about $27.7 million was delivered.

Pak noted that UNDP has denied the U.S. allegation that money was illegally diverted.

"Last January, from dirty political motives, the United States fabricated lies that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea might have used the UNDP aid funds for the development of nuclear weapons without foundation and demanded investigation of the UNDP aid activities in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea," he said.

"As UNDP has denied, the allegations of the United States are sheer fiction aimed at politicizing international aid to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea," Pak said.

Why US Is Now Turning To Diplomacy (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

A UN report expected to be issued Thursday, finding Iran undeterred in its pursuit of uranium enrichment, represents the kind of collective international action the Bush administration once scoffed at. Now, it's embracing it.

The change stems in part from the administration's disenchantment with the results of its earlier go-it-alone approach. But it also suggests a growing sense within the White House that once-maligned multilateralism is getting results – on issues ranging from Iran to North Korea.

The latest example is Iran. The International Atomic Energy Agency's report on nuclear activity in Iran will find that Tehran has ignored a United Nations Security Council deadline to cease uranium enrichment by Wednesday.

Instead, the IAEA report will show that Iran has installed additional centrifuges in enrichment facilities, sources close to the IAEA work say. It will also note Iran's continuing technical problems in perfecting the process.

The report is likely to set in motion renewed debate on Iran in the Security Council, perhaps next week. Pressure is building for a second, more punitive resolution, since the regime has apparently disregarded a Dec. 24 resolution approved unanimously by the Security Council – including Tehran's political and commercial partners, Russia and China.

Whether a second resolution is ever approved, the debate will highlight a change in the Bush administration, both specifically on Iran and more broadly on the diplomatic field.

"What we're witnessing is the return of the pragmatists to US diplomacy, and it's paying off," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "The Bush administration came in touting 'regime change' and a fundamental break with nonproliferation negotiations, but that backfired. In many ways the world ended up more dangerous."

But after a long campaign in Iraq, Iran's rise, and a nuclear test by North Korea, the US is putting new faith in diplomacy, hard bargaining, and multilateral action, he says. "It worked with Libya. It's working with North Korea. And it could work with Iran."

The change in the US approach comes amid mixed signals from the White House, on Iran in particular. Last week President Bush linked an uptick in US casualties in Iraq to more sophisticated weaponry coming from Iran, and said he planned to "do something about it." Such talk keeps alive speculation that the US may opt to move militarily against Iran's nuclear installations.

But the administration's growing reliance on diplomatic efforts is also evident on the international stage, with America's partners in particular taking note of the shift. "We have noted the evolution," says a senior European diplomat in Washington, who by protocol cannot speak on the record.

The US initially was unhappy with the Security Council resolution on Iran, which ended up with weaker sanctions than the US wanted. But after the resolution set off an immediate debate in Iran over the confrontational tactics of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, some US leaders began to have a change of heart.

"The debate it caused in Iran and the pressures inside the country on [President] Ahmadinejad changed things," says the European diplomat. "So now the feeling is, why not a second resolution?"

The Bush administration's apparent conversion to multilateralism can also be seen in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's efforts to revive the Middle East peace process and in last week's deal with North Korea on its nuclear program. Next week, Secretary Rice's new right-hand man, John Negroponte, is travelling to northeast Asia to try to build on the goodwill stemming from the nuclear accord.

The North Korea issue shows that the Bush team has had two tracks of diplomacy all along – the go-it-alone track and a less-noted multilateral track – but has recently switched which track it emphasizes, some experts say.

"The stereotype of the Bush administration was the go-it-alone approach, and it got stuck with that in the first term largely because of the war in Iraq," says Daniel Drezner, a foreign policy expert at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in Medford, Mass. "But there's always been this second track, albeit overshadowed, of trying to work in concert with others for common goals. Now that the US has become bogged down in Iraq, there is less it can do unilaterally."

The arrival of Rice, a trusted Bush aide, at the helm of State is part of the explanation for the shifting emphasis between the two tracks, Mr. Drezner says.

But the administration is also harvesting the fruits of an early diplomatic goal of tying rising world powers such as China and India into the world international system, he says. One result is an intense US effort to court India and cement its ties to the broader international community, he says.

India Wednesday said it will ban exports to Iran of materials that might be used in Tehran's nuclear program. India's statement is the latest sign of growing international alignment with the Security Council resolution.

Bush Administration Won't Change Approach To Cuba, Official Says (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez had some straight talk Wednesday for lawmakers and business groups pressing for a softer approach toward Cuba as the island prepares for a post-Fidel Castro era.

The Bush administration won't waver from its tough stance toward Havana, he said.

"The question is not when will the U.S. change its policy," Gutierrez told a Council of the Americas event on Cuba. "The question is when will the Cuban regime change its policy."

Gutierrez took aim at critics of the U.S. policy who say that, after 48 years of attempting to isolate Cuba politically and economically, the time has come for a different approach.

He dismissed the argument, long espoused by Castro, that the U.S. sanctions against Cuba are to blame for the island's hardships. The United States, Gutierrez noted, supplies one-third of the island's food and medicine, and millions of foreign tourists haven't improved the plight of the Cuban people.

Congress is expected to debate several bills that would relax travel and trade sanctions against Cuba. Democratic control of Congress for the first time since 1994 gives hope to opponents of U.S. policies toward Cuba that some restrictions will be relaxed. Also, the island is thought to be undergoing a transition after Castro fell gravely ill last summer.

In a jab at some Democrats who oppose free-trade agreements because they don't take labor rights into account, Gutierrez said foreign companies paid the Cuban government for their labor in dollars but that the workers received only a fraction of that money in pesos.

"And pity the worker who dares talk openly about the need to organize and operate unions," he said. "The topics of trade, globalization and the working conditions of foreign laborers are being discussed when debated regularly in Washington, D.C. But why do labor conditions lose relevance when it comes to Cuba?"

Gutierrez, the highest-ranking Cuban-American in the Bush administration, rejected the idea that the administration could relax its restrictions on Cuban-American travel to the island. "We believe our policy is correct," he said.

He also said President Bush "has no imperialist intentions. We have no military intentions to occupy the island."

"We will not confiscate property or support any arbitrary claims for property," he added.

Gutierrez Stands By U.S. Ban On Cuba (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez yesterday reiterated the Bush administration's steadfast belief in the U.S. embargo of Cuba, despite congressional moves to relax the policy.

Cuban leader Fidel Castro's hospitalization last year and ceding of power to his brother, Raul, as well as the election of Democratic House and Senate majorities in Congress have helped fuel speculation that U.S. policies could be eased.

Mr. Gutierrez, however, speaking before the Council of the Americas, said the United States must "stand firm" in its rejection of the Castro government and in efforts to deny revenue to the Cuban regime.

The question, he said, is not when U.S. policy will change, but when Cuba will change its policy.

"Years of foreign investment have not improved the lives of average Cubans, only the lives of those who hold power," he said.

He said foreign companies operating in Cuba must pay the government in dollars for Cuban labor, but the government then pays workers in "devalued pesos" and "pockets the difference."

Cubans, he said, "simply do not benefit from foreign investment under Castro."

Mr. Gutierrez also rejected comparing Cuba to China, another communist country but one with which the U.S. maintains trade relations.

China, has pursued economic liberalization, and although that country has not made all the changes the U.S. would like to see, it would be more appropriate to compare Cuba to North Korea, Mr. Gutierrez said.

Legislation has been introduced in Congress to weaken the Cuba embargo, and two House members who are part of that effort criticized the administration's stance after Mr. Gutierrez's speech yesterday.

"What the administration fails to understand is that these policies only inhibit trade that is beneficial to American producers, depriving them of what was once among their 25 largest export markets for agricultural goods," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican.

Mrs. Emerson, who is co-sponsoring legislation to ease payment requirements on farm exports to Cuba, said the U.S. traded with the Soviet Union during the Cold War and has given most-favored-nation trade status to China, which she described as "the single largest owner of the U.S. trade deficit."

"After 48 years, sanctions have yet to effect political change in Cuba. It is time to try something new," she said.

Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who introduced a bill last month to lift the ban on American travel to Cuba, said Cuba is experiencing an "all-too-smooth transition," adding that for all intents and purposes, that transition has been made, but the United States is "on the sidelines watching and having no influence, and that's a shame."

Cuba's Known For Cigars Now, But Oil Could Change That (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135174

One day soon — possibly before the end of this year — an oil rig will maneuver into position in waters less than 100 miles from the coast of Florida. A drill will plunge into the inky sea and begin chewing its way into the ocean floor, hunting for oil.

But the drilling rig won't belong to an American company, and any petroleum it discovers won't do a thing to curb the USA's addiction to foreign oil. Instead, any new sub-sea gusher will belong to Cuba.

That's right: Cuba. The island nation long has been known for its aromatic cigars and sweet rums. But after years of limited oil production on lands around Havana and in neighboring Matanzas province, Cuba is poised for a significant expansion of its oil program into the waters that separate it from the United States. And thanks to U.S. law, Cuba's drilling partners will be working closer to Florida beaches than any American company ever could.

"Our studies … have shown there is a great potential, especially offshore," says Dagoberto Rodriguez, the senior Cuban diplomat in the USA. "Basically, we know that there is oil. The problem is just where it is."

The U.S. Geological Survey (USGS) agrees. Two years ago, after reviewing available data on the subterranean structures in the region, the agency estimated Cuba can lay claim to 4.6 billion barrels of oil and 9.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

With oil prices hovering around $60 a barrel and global supplies persistently tight, any new supply source could benefit the USA, the world's top oil consumer. Likewise, Cuba, which relies on Venezuela for more than half of its daily oil consumption, craves self-sufficiency. "In economic terms, it could be a win-win," says Daniel Erikson, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

There's just one problem: politics. Since 1962, the U.S. has maintained an economic embargo of Cuba, aimed at toppling the communist government of Fidel Castro. The ailing dictator, who has outlasted nine U.S. presidents, last summer handed power temporarily to his brother, Raul, while he recovers from abdominal surgery. Companies such as ExxonMobil, Chevron and Halliburton, however, remain barred from the Cuban market, which a 2001 Rice University study said could be worth up to $3 billion annually.

The embargo also will increase the time and cost of the Cuban program by denying Havana access to the closest source of oil industry technology, spare parts and expertise. Likewise, U.S.-owned refineries in Aruba and St. Croix are off-limits for any of the heavy, sulfur-rich Cuban crude.

"The U.S. (embargo) presents them with significant barriers and obstacles," says Jonathan Benjamin-Alvarado, a political scientist at the University of Nebraska who studies Cuban energy issues.

Cuba is modernizing a dilapidated Soviet-era refinery at Cienfuegos with help from Venezuela's state-owned oil company, PDVSA, and refurbishing three other facilities, Rodriguez said. Within 18 months, Cuba will be able to satisfy all of its refining demand, he said. Independent analysts are less optimistic.

The Cuban oil fields were formed more than 50 million years ago in a slow-motion collision between Earth's tectonic plates, which entombed pulverized rocks, animals and plants. Over subsequent millennia, the resulting stew cooked into buried petroleum deposits, says Christopher Shenk, a geologist at the USGS in Denver.

Before Castro's 1959 revolution, U.S. oil companies such as Esso and Amoco carried out preliminary explorations. The following year, Cuba nationalized refineries belonging to Exxon, Texaco and Shell, and U.S. industry hasn't been back since.

In the modern era, Cuba's first significant oil find came in 1971 when Soviet engineers discovered the Varadero field, east of Havana. After the Soviet Union collapsed, Cuba opened its oil program to foreign investment in 1993. Today, companies from Spain, Norway, India, Malaysia and China are involved, either drilling wells onshore or using horizontal drilling to reach reservoirs in shallow coastal waters.

Canada's Sherritt is the most active foreign company with nine fields operating onshore and five exploration or appraisal blocs being drilled, says Michael Minnes, a company spokesman. Daily output from the company's wells averages a modest 30,000 barrels a day, down from about 43,000 in 2004.

"It's like any other foreign jurisdiction or developing nation. There are challenges, and there are opportunities," Minnes said. "We see Cuba as a great environment to do business in."

So far, only one offshore well has been drilled, in July 2004 by Spanish oil company Repsol. The company said it found oil at the site 95 miles southwest of Key West, though not in commercially viable deposits. Since then, the Spanish company has teamed with Norway's Norsk Hydro, one of a select number of global oil companies with expertise in deepwater exploration, according to Jorge Pinon, the former president of Amoco's Latin American operations.

In an interview this week, Rodriguez, the chief of the Cuban interests section in Washington, said widespread offshore drilling could start by the end of this year. Cuban exploration, like drilling ventures elsewhere, has been slowed by a worldwide shortage of drilling rigs that has increased daily lease rates by more than 60% since fall 2005.

Offshore wells aren't cheap: Those envisioned in Cuban waters will cost $40 million to $50 million, says Pinon, the former oil executive now affiliated with the University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies. "This is a very high-risk, high-reward area," R.S. Butola, managing director of India's ONGC, said on the company's website.

Since 1981, the U.S. has observed a moratorium on coastal drilling, except for a portion of the Gulf of Mexico and limited areas off of Alaska. The drilling ban was enacted after a series of high-profile oil industry environmental disasters. Perhaps the most notorious: the 1969 Santa Barbara spill that released 3 million gallons of oil in waters off of California, coating 35 miles of coastline with oil up to 6 inches thick.

Last year, the House voted to relax the prohibition on offshore drilling, but the measure died in the Senate. There may be close to 95 billion barrels of oil affected by the ban, according to the Interior Department.

The House-passed bill still would have allowed individual states to ban drilling up to 100 miles from their shores. But Cuba's wells could eventually be as close to the USA as 60 miles from Key West. The two countries agreed in 1977 to a maritime boundary that evenly divides the waters between them.

The prospect of foreign oil companies drilling Cuban wells so close to American shores has unnerved some on Capitol Hill. Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., last year introduced legislation to deny U.S. visas to executives employed by oil companies involved in the Cuban program. Dan McLaughlin, a spokesman for Nelson, says the senator plans to reintroduce the measure this year. Nelson also wants the United States to renegotiate the 1977 treaty that defines the U.S.-Cuban maritime boundary, a proposal Cuba's Rodriguez called "silly."

Others see the prospect of Cuban offshore oil rigs as a reason to relax the U.S. embargo. Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., co-authored legislation last year that would have permitted U.S. firms to sell their services to companies drilling for Cuba or to drill themselves.

"U.S. companies should be able to bid on these oil leases. … If there are going to be oil rigs within 50 miles of Florida, … I'd rather see U.S. oil rigs than Chinese oil rigs, given technological and safety considerations," Flake said in a telephone interview.

For now, Big Oil is staying out of the political fray. But, at a time when unexplored terrain is rapidly shrinking, the oil industry would eagerly jump into Cuban waters if given the chance.

One year ago, a U.S.-Cuba Energy Summit attracted representatives from Exxon and a handful of smaller oil service companies to three days of meetings in Mexico City. Attendees viewed PowerPoint presentations from Cuban government ministries including state-owned oil company Cupet that invited American companies to help exploit "several giant oil and gas fields."

Events since July, when Castro's illness forced him to step aside, have rekindled industry interest in Cuba's future. "U.S. oil companies would love to do business there as soon as this thing opens up," says Ron Harper, an analyst at IHS Energy in Houston. "They're looking at it quietly. They'd be short-sighted not to."

Earlier this week, Rodriguez reiterated that Cuba remains open to the U.S. industry's involvement and may hold a second summit this year, either in Mexico or Canada. But he said time may be running out for the U.S. to change course. "In my opinion, if the American companies are not able to get something, some changes before no more than one year, after that it will be too late," he said.

For now, any U.S. involvement remains only hypothetical. Houston oilman Antonio Szabo, president of Stone Bond Technologies, says U.S. companies likely would require greater transparency, a commitment to the rule of law and market economics in Cuba before investing significant money there.

Some in the oil industry also have long memories when it comes to Cuba. At the 1997 World Petroleum Congress in Beijing, a Cuban official approached Lee Raymond, then Exxon's chief executive, and asked in a jocular tone when the U.S. oil giant might return to Cuba. "When you give us back our (expletive) refinery," Raymond growled.

DOJ_NMG_0135176

Cuban officials note they already have willing partners from Canada, Spain, Norway, Brazil, India, Malaysia, Venezuela and China. Rodriguez made clear that the United States has no veto over Cuba's oil plans.

"Everyone knows how advanced is American technology," the Cuban diplomat said. "But we are going to continue with our programs — with American companies or without American companies."

U.S. Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

A U.S. congresswoman called on the Bush administration Wednesday to reconsider its ban on selling parts for U.S.-made F-16 fighter jets to Venezuela, urging improved ties between the two nations.

U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, a Texas Democrat, told reporters that she was making the first U.S. congressional visit to Venezuela since President Hugo Chavez's December re-election with the message: "I want an immediate repairing of the relations between the United States and Venezuela."

Jackson Lee described Venezuela as a friendly nation that the U.S. should cooperate with and said that the F-16 jets, which are built in Texas, was an issue of concern to her constituents in Houston.

Pledging to "personally go back and raise" the issue, she called for the U.S. Congress "to reconsider sanctions on the F-16s."

The U.S. State Department has banned arms sales to Venezuela, including parts necessary to maintain its fleet of F-16s, citing a lack of support by Chavez's government for counterterrorism efforts and its close relations with Iran and Cuba.

Venezuela has since begun receiving the first of 24 Russian-made Sukhoi fighter jets as part of approximately $3 billion in military deals that Chavez has signed with Moscow.

She said her fact-finding mission to Venezuela was part of an effort by a new Democrat-controlled Congress to show that "Venezuela has many friends in this new Congress."

"We're here to re-establish friendship," she said.

Paramilitary Scandal Takes Colombian Elite By Surprise (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia -- Col. HernÃ¡n MejÃ-a was among Colombia's most decorated officers, a young, strapping warrior with five medals for valor on his chest and a reputation for being a relentless adversary of the Marxist guerrillas who operated in the dusty hamlets of northeast Colombia.

But after disclosures that have astonished many Colombians, MejÃ-a has been removed from his post, and the attorney general's office is investigating him for having worked with right-wing paramilitary groups to kill peasant farmers and guerrilla sympathizers. The allegations, announced by Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos in January, mark the first time the military has turned over one of its own to civilian prosecutors on suspicion of collaborating with the death squads.

The MejÃ-a case comes as this country -- a linchpin in an unstable region, and the Bush administration's closest ally in Latin America -- is undergoing an imperfect but remarkable judicial process that has produced nearly daily disclosures of ties between death squad leaders and Colombia's political and military establishment.

Human rights groups have long contended that the military has used paramilitary groups as a proxy force in its war on rebels, but the depth of those connections -- and the degree to which senior political and military officials are being prosecuted -- has shaken the country. The disclosures also have provided a glimmer of hope for a genuine catharsis in a country that has been enmeshed in conflict for decades.

"We think there's a real possibility that this may reach the point where it's irreversible," said Ivan Cepeda, leader of a victims' rights organization and son of Manuel Cepeda, a senator killed by paramilitary gunmen in 1994.

As part of a pact between the government and paramilitary leaders of the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, a group notorious for trafficking in cocaine and murdering peasants by the thousands, one of its top leaders, Salvatore Mancuso, has been providing riveting testimony to prosecutors about slayings he had ordered. There are also investigations by the attorney general's office and the Supreme Court. Along the way, Colombians have learned how a group of 11 congressmen and regional lawmakers signed a pact with paramilitary groups to "re-found the fatherland" and "build a new Colombia."

On Monday, the widening scandal cost the foreign minister, MarÃ-a Consuelo AraÃºjo, her job. She resigned under intense public pressure after investigators arrested her brother, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo, for suspected ties to the paramilitary groups. In all, eight congressmen are now jailed, and investigators have questioned dozens of other national and local lawmakers about suspected ties to death squads.

In recent weeks, largely through Mancuso's testimony, Colombians have learned how top military officers helped paramilitary commanders organize assassinations, even flying paramilitary fighters aboard army helicopters and providing them with weapons. Mancuso has coolly admitted to ordering more than 300 killings, outlined for prosecutors in a colorful PowerPoint presentation.

The attorney general's office is now investigating dozens of colonels, majors, captains and other army officers who are believed to have collaborated with paramilitary groups, said Leonardo Cabana, chief of the attorney general's human rights unit. "This is not the only investigation," Cabana said in an interview, referring to MejÃ-a. "There exist more than 100 active cases where there are relations between the public security forces and illegal armed groups."

The government says the disclosures show that President Ãlvaro Uribe is serious about rooting out those with ties to the paramilitary groups.

"This is going to be the policy of the government for officers or officials who are in some way involved," Santos, the defense minister, said in a telephone interview. "The military man who commits these crimes is not a military man, but a criminal."

But Hector Abad, an author and political commentator here, says that this country, where even mass murder has largely gone unpunished, is still far from unraveling the whole truth. The attorney general's office has yet to go after generals long identified by human rights groups and opposition politicians as paramilitary collaborators. Even though Mancuso named generals and colonels in his testimony, all are now dead or in jail.

He has also said nothing of the so-called wise men, the cabal of civilian power brokers whom a former paramilitary leader, Carlos CastaÃ±o, identified as among the dark forces behind the paramilitary movement. CastaÃ±o, after writing a book detailing his role in founding the paramilitary groups, was murdered by his associates.

"The fact that they killed Carlos CastaÃ±o was because CastaÃ±o was going to talk, with Colombian and American justice," said Abad, whose father was killed by paramilitary gunmen in 1982. Abad said much of the onus is on the judiciary to ferret out how deep the paramilitary tentacles go.

"What we don't know is up to what point the paramilitaries will talk about it, and up to what point the judges, who are responsible for investigating, will be able to put together the puzzle," Abad said.

Investigating the paramilitary groups, or testifying about their operations, is still perilous. Shadowy gunmen believed to work for paramilitary commanders recently killed a handful of activists who were publicly pressing for the paramilitary groups to return stolen land and disclose their crimes. One was Yolanda Izquierdo, who had been at Mancuso's deposition.

"We confide in Colombian justice," she told The Washington Post the day Mancuso started testifying. A few weeks later, she was gunned down in front of her house.

What is different now, however, is that the paramilitary groups no longer enjoy the legitimacy they once had in some social sectors, thanks in part to the relentless news reports on abuses and the investigations by prosecutors.

"It's obviously positive that there's a housecleaning going on," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks Colombia for the Center for International Policy, a Washington group. "It means the system is at least trying to kick into motion a little bit and starting to work."

The disclosures about MejÃ-a and his role as commander of the army's Popa battalion in the city of Valledupar are significant, Defense Ministry officials say, because he was considered a rising star in Colombia's vast, U.S.-funded military. He had fought in some of the army's most tenacious campaigns against Marxist rebels and was assigned in 2002 to Cesar state, an important gateway for cocaine shipped to the United States.

To the surprise of veteran soldiers who could go months without killing a rebel, a 14-man team that MejÃ-a headed always seemed to come back to the Popa base with the bodies of what the colonel claimed were dead guerrillas, according to a key witness who detailed the crimes to Semana magazine.

"As commander of the Popa battalion, what he was really doing was operating with members of this illegal group," said Cabana, referring to paramilitary death squads. "The operations that these paramilitary groups carried out were also carried out by the units he commanded."

No one seemed to suspect that MejÃ-a, instead of going after guerrillas, was killing peasants and suspected rebel sympathizers. In one case celebrated in the press, he was said to have helped kill 19 rebels, making him something of a legend in the army. Instead, the 19 were paramilitary members whom MejÃ-a had helped kill in a purge.

Investigators said they also later determined that MejÃ-a was working closely with Rodrigo Tovar, known as Jorge 40, a powerful paramilitary commander in the region.

"The significant thing about him was he wasn't part of the Paleolithic, hard-core group in the military," said Isacson. "He seemed a modern officer who was a reformer. It didn't occur to people that he was having lunch with Jorge 40."

In China, Stern Treatment For Young Internet 'Addicts' (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

DAXING, China -- Sun Jiting spends his days locked behind metal bars in this military-run installation, put there by his parents. The 17-year-old high school student is not allowed to communicate with friends back home, and his only companions are psychologists, nurses and other patients. Each morning at 6:30, he is jolted awake by a soldier in fatigues shouting, "This is for your own good!"

Sun's offense: Internet addiction.

Alarmed by a survey that found that nearly 14 percent of teens in China are vulnerable to becoming addicted to the Internet, the Chinese government has launched a nationwide campaign to stamp out what the Communist Youth League calls "a grave social problem" that threatens the nation.

Few countries have been as effective historically in fighting drug and alcohol addiction as China, which has been lauded for its successes, as well as criticized for harsh techniques.

Now the country is turning its attention to fighting another, supposed addiction -- one that has been blamed in the state-run media for a murder over virtual property earned in an online game, for a string of suicides and for the failure of youths in their studies.

The Chinese government in recent months has joined South Korea, Thailand and Vietnam in taking measures to try to limit the time teens spend online. It has passed regulations banning youths from Internet cafes and has implemented control programs that kick teens off networked games after five hours.

There's a global controversy over whether heavy Internet use should be defined as a mental disorder, with some psychologists, including a handful in the United States, arguing that it should be. Backers of the notion say the addiction can be crippling, leading people to neglect work, school and social lives.

But no country has gone quite as far as China in embracing the theory and mounting a public crusade against Internet addiction. To skeptics, the campaign dovetails a bit too nicely with China's broader effort to control what its citizens can see on the Internet. The Communist government runs a massive program that limits Web access, censors sites and seeks to control online political dissent. Internet companies like Google have come under heavy criticism abroad for going along with China's demands.

In the Internet-addiction campaign, the government is helping to fund eight in-patient rehabilitation clinics across the country.

The clinic in Daxing, a suburb of Beijing, the capital, is the oldest and largest, with 60 patients on a normal day and as many as 280 during peak periods. Few of the patients, who range in age from 12 to 24, are here willingly. Most have been forced to come by their parents, who are paying upward of $1,300 a month -- about 10 times the average salary in China -- for the treatment.

Led by Tao Ran, a military researcher who built his career by treating heroin addicts, the clinic uses a tough-love approach that includes counseling, military discipline, drugs, hypnosis and mild electric shocks.

Tao said the clinic is based on the idea that there are many similarities between his current patients and those he had in the past.

In terms of withdrawal: "If you let someone go online and then he can't go online, you may see a physical reaction, just like someone coming off drugs." And in terms of resistance: "Today you go half an hour, and the next day you need 45 minutes. It's like starting with drinking one glass and then needing half a bottle to feel the same way."

Located on an army training base, the Internet-addiction clinic is distinct from the other buildings on campus because of the metal grates and padlocks on every door and the bars on every window.

On the first level are 10 locked treatment rooms geared toward treating teen patients suffering from disturbed sleep, lack of motivation, aggression, depression and other problems. Unlike the rest of the building, which is painted in blues and grays and kept cold to keep the teens alert, these rooms are sunny and warm.

Inside Room No. 8 are toys and other figurines that the teens can play with while psychologists watch. Room 10 contains rows of fake machine guns that the patients use for role-play scenarios that are supposed to bridge the virtual world with the real one.

Room No. 4 is made up to look like home, with rattan furniture and fake flowers, to provide a comfortable place for counselors to talk to the teens. The staff tries to blend into the artificial environment. Before meeting with a patient, one counselor swapped her olive military uniform for a motherly cardigan and plaid skirt.

Among the milder cases are those of Yu Bo, 21, from Inner Mongolia, and Li Yanjiang, 15, from Hebei province. Both said that they used to spend four to five hours a week online and their daily lives weren't affected but that their parents wanted them to cut their computer usage to zero so they could study. Yu said he agreed to come because he wanted to train himself. Li said it was because he just wanted to "get away from my parents."

Perceived as a more serious case is that of He Fang, 22, a college student from the western region of Xinjiang. The business administration major said his grades tanked when he started playing online games several hours a night. The clinic "has mainly helped me change the way I think," he said. "It's not about getting away from pressure but facing it and dealing with it."

Before Sun, the 17-year-old, who is from the city of Cangzhou, checked into the clinic about a month ago, he said, he was sometimes online playing games for 15 hours nonstop. "My life was not routine -- day and night I was messed up," he said.

In December, he concluded that school just "wasn't interesting" and stopped attending. His parents were furious and complained that he didn't have a goal. Exasperated, they eventually checked him into the clinic.

Since he's been there, Sun said, he's decided to finish high school, attend college and then work at a private company, perhaps becoming an "authority figure" one day. With the help of a counselor, he's mapped out a life plan from now until he's 84.

Sun's father and mother, Sun Fengxiang and Xu Ying, both 41 and accountants, say their son's counselors have told them he's behaving well -- playing basketball, reading books about success -- but they are unsure whether he's really been cured.

"His language shows that he has changed, but we'll see" when Sun gets home, his father said.

No one is comfortable talking about the third floor of the clinic, where serious cases -- usually two or three at a time -- are housed. Most have been addicted to the Internet for five or more years, Tao said, are severely depressed and refuse counseling. One sliced his wrists but survived. These teens are under 24-hour supervision.

Tao said he believes 70 percent of the teens, after one to three months of treatment, will go home and lead normal lives, but he's less optimistic about the third-floor patients. "Their souls are gone to the online world," he said.

Earlier this month, four teens fled their dorm rooms and jumped in a taxi. They made it to a train station before soldiers caught them, according to Li Jiali, a military guard. They were isolated and asked to write reports about why their actions were wrong.

Guo Tiejun, a school headmaster turned psychologist who runs an Internet-addiction research center in Shanghai, said the military-run clinic goes too far in treating Internet addicts like alcohol and drug addicts.

He said that he has treated several former patients of the Daxing clinic and that one mother told him it was simply "suffering for a month" that did not help her son. He advocates a softer approach. Guo said he believes that the root of the problem is loneliness and that the most effective treatment is to treat the teens "like friends."

"Our conclusion is that kids who get addicted in society have some kind of disability or weakness. They can't make friends, can't fulfill their desire of social communication, so they go online," Guo said.

Guo is especially critical of the use of medications -- which include antidepressants, antipsychotics, and a variety of other pills and intravenous drips -- for Internet addiction because, he said, that approach treats symptoms, not causes.

Tao and his team of 15 doctors and nurses defended the treatment methods. He said that while some clinics depend wholly on medications -- in one experiment conducted in Ningbo, a city south of Shanghai, suspected Internet addicts were given the same pills as drug addicts -- only one out of five patients at the Daxing clinic receive prescription drugs. Tao did agree with Guo that Internet addiction is usually an expression of deeper psychological problems.

"We use these medicines to give them happiness," Tao said, "so they no longer need to go on the Internet to be happy."

Still, for all the high-tech treatments available to Sun at the clinic, the one that he says helped him most was talking. He looks forward to returning to school and getting on with his life.

The first task on his agenda when he gets home: get online. He needs to tell his worried Internet friends where he was these past few weeks.

Farm Tariff Cuts Won't Help Africa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Richard Holbrooke and Stuart Eizenstat ("Africa's Last Best Chance1," editorial page, Feb. 15) are absolutely right that Africa needs a successful conclusion to the Doha Round for a number of reasons, but steep EU farm tariff reductions cut both ways for developing countries depending on their level of competitiveness.

EU farm tariff cuts will do little for most in the developing world for the simple reason that almost all their agricultural produce already enters the EU tariff free -- so tariff cuts won't help them. The EU has already almost fully implemented the 100% duty-free, quota-free market access for all exports from Least Developed Countries that we agreed back in 2001 -- others in the developed world have yet to match this.

The level of farm tariff cuts initially demanded by the United States were unsustainable both for the EU and for developing countries. They would have wiped out the tariff preferences on which, for better or worse, African countries still depend for agricultural export access in the face of the world's competitive farm exporters. The EU has agreed to come as close as possible to the level of tariff cuts demanded by developing countries themselves.

The real competitive gain for African farmers in the Doha Round will come from cutting trade-distorting farm subsidies and the elimination of export subsidies for farm goods -- both of which allow farmers in the rich world artificially to undercut farmers in developing countries. The EU has already offered to slash trade-distorting farm subsidies by 70% and eliminate export subsides altogether if others do the same. Combined with the tariff cuts we are offering, this reform adds up to the biggest liberalization of farm trade in history.

Peter Mandelson

EU Trade Commissioner

Brussels

Messrs. Holbrooke and Eizenstat were right to call the Doha Round "Africa's Last Best Chance." But they were wrong when they said the agriculture trade liberalization proposals currently on the table "far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds." They must have forgotten President Reagan's bold proposal to eliminate all agricultural trade barriers in the Uruguay Round. Just think how different Africa might be today had the developed world accepted Reagan's challenge to open its markets to agricultural exports from developing countries 20 years ago.

Africa's Last Best Chance (WSJ)

By Richard Holbrooke And Stuart Eizenstat

The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

The long-stalled Doha round of trade talks recently had, in the words of WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy, a jolt of "new energy" after the recent meeting of key trade ministers in Davos. What is not clearly understood is that if a successful agreement is reached, it will be especially good news for Africa.

Failure, conversely, would have tragic consequences for the continent. It would lead the United States and the European Union to negotiate more bilateral free-trade agreements with key countries, but not with sub-Saharan Africa and other poor countries, which offer few attractive markets for developed countries' manufactured goods and services. Africa, which has seen its share of world trade shrink in recent years, would fall even further behind.

Developing countries felt that previous multilateral trade negotiations like the Kennedy round, the Tokyo round and the Uruguay round primarily benefited the highly developed nations. While they undertook costly obligations to protect developed countries' intellectual property and impose sanitary and phytosanitary standards, the developed countries did not significantly open their markets to the labor-intensive manufactured goods and agricultural products of developing countries.

For the Doha round launched in 2001, however, there is a development agenda. At its heart is agriculture -- a politically sensitive sector in the EU and the U.S. but the largest employer in low-income countries, accounting for about 60% of their labor force and 25% of their GDP. The World Bank estimates that these agricultural products face what former U.S. Trade Representative Robert Portman observed is a practically insurmountable global average tariff rate of 62%, and that 93% of the benefits from a successful Doha round would come from improved market access for developing nations' agricultural products.

Farmers represent less than 5% of the labor force in industrial countries, but they have very substantial political power in the U.S., EU and Japan. These political forces, especially in the EU, led to the eventual derailment of the Doha round last summer. But as the Doha talks take on new life, Congress and the Bush administration need to stay true to the commitments of the Doha Development Agenda, especially in agriculture.

Two weeks ago the administration proposed ending subsidies for 80,000 wealthy farmers, substituting trade-distorting subsidies with cash payments to farmers, and trimming traditional agriculture programs by $4.5 billion over the next decade. These proposals, if approved, would directly benefit some of the poorest people on earth, save lives and ultimately reduce American foreign aid, while helping Susan Schwab, the U.S trade representative, put wind in the sails of the ministers' pledge in Davos to restart serious talks.

The promise for developing countries, and particularly the poorest African nations, is huge. In particular, Africa stands to gain significantly if sensitive product exclusions do not disproportionately target key African exports. Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, pledged recently that Europe will significantly improve its previous tariff reduction offer; he needs to make good on that promise. But even the current U.S. and EU proposals on the table far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds and offer real gains for developing countries:

• WTO members have agreed to provide duty-free/quota-free market access to the least developed countries for at least 97% of their products.

• An agreement has been reached to end the direct EU and U.S. export subsidies by 2013 that have squeezed out the products of farmers in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

• Assistance will be given to help poor countries streamline their customs procedures to help with the red tape and corruption that historically impeded engagement in significant international trade.

Developing nations also must make serious commitments to complete the Doha round. A growing percentage of trade is between developing nations, with more than 70% of the duties paid by developing countries to other developing countries. This makes no sense.

The World Bank has found a significant increase in per capita income of developing countries that lower their own trade barriers, and concluded that totally eliminating global trade barriers could lift 300 to 500 million of the world's poor out of poverty -

- growing their economies by $259 billion by 2015. Opening their trade arteries to manufactured goods and services is also important. It will help developing nations trade with each other, which is growing 50% faster than world trade overall, but where levels of protection on goods are four times higher than levels of protection in rich countries. Intraregional trade in Afric a was only 5.3% of GDP in 2002, in part due to self-destructive trade barriers between African countries.

As trade ministers make an effort to reach a Doha deal, they should recognize that it is the poorest nations, particularly those in Africa, that would be the biggest losers if Doha collapses. We hope this will be understood by everyone, on a bipartisan basis, as this crucial negotiation heads into its final phase. For Africa, this may be the last best chance.

Mr. Holbrooke is a former U.S. ambassador to the U.N. and vice chairman of Perseus, LLC. Mr. Eizenstat held several senior positions in the Clinton administration, including U.S. ambassador to the EU, and heads the international practice at Covington & Burling, LLP.

Canada Cautions U.S. On Pending Passport Rule (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

A planned U.S. rule that would require passports for anyone entering the country by land from Canada must be implemented with "clarity and flexibility" to avoid damaging the world's most dynamic bilateral trading relationship, Canadian Ambassador Michael Wilson said yesterday.

"Yes, we are very concerned about the rule. We have been urging our American counterparts to take the time to get it right," Mr. Wilson said in a luncheon interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

Canadian officials and many U.S. lawmakers from states along the border fear the abrupt implementation of the passport requirement could cause major delays at border checkpoints and impede the free flow of goods and tourists. Two-way trade totaled more than $740 billion last year, and Mr. Wilson noted that Canada is the leading foreign trade partner for more than 39 U.S. states.

"If there's major congestion at the crossing points, it quickly becomes an economic issue as well," Mr. Wilson said.

The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) have until June 1, 2009, to implement tougher documentation rules for travelers crossing by land from Mexico and Canada. DHS officials are pressing for a quicker implementation schedule, citing the smooth adoption of similar rules for air travelers last month.

"People have got the message" about the new passport requirement, "and that's good news," said Homeland Sec urity Secretary Michael Chertoff.

But Mr. Wilson noted there was a "huge surge" of Canadians applying for passports ahead of the traditional winter school break, when many Canadians head to Florida or other southern U.S. destinations.

Since air travel represents only about 15 percent of the total cross-border traffic, the pending rule for land crossings will have a far greater impact, Mr. Wilson said.

"We will need advance notice, clarity and flexibility in the implementation of this rule," Mr. Wilson said. "We have taken that message regularly to Homeland Security, but they are making it very clear they want to do this as quickly as possible."

Premiers from four Canadian provinces will visit Washington this month to argue against an early date for the passp ort mandate. Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, New York Democrat, has introduced a bill to force U.S. officials to accept new, high-tech driver's licenses in lieu of passports to ease checkpoint hassles.

While border security remains a major issue, U.S.-Canadian relations overall are very strong, Mr. Wilson said, particularly compared with frosty cross-border ties in recent years.

Tax-cutting Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government has proven a strong U.S. ally in the war in Afghanistan, boosting defense spending and putting Canadian troops on the front lines in the battle against fundamentalist Taliban forces. Almost three dozen Canadians have died in the Afghan war.

"It can't help but bring you closer together when you are comrades-in-arms, when you're sitting at the table and going to the same strategy sessions," he said.

He said ordinary Canadians have trouble understanding the "caveats" some NATO countries have adopted to limit their deployments in Afghanistan, leaving just a few nations to bear the brunt of the fighting.

Mr. Wilson, a leading Canadian banker and former finance minister, said that many of the legendary nasty trade disputes that marred bilateral relations in the past on goods from beer to wheat have largely subsided.

He called recent U.S. complaints about new Canadian provincial subsidies to struggling lumber producers a "brushfire" that was not likely to upset last year's carefully wrought compromise on overall lumber trade.

Mr. Wilson said he decided to take the Washington posting after Mr. Harper agreed that the envoy would balance bilateral issues with a broader push to work with the United States on joint priorities, from trade to nonproliferation to crises in such trouble spots as Haiti and Darfur.

"In that sense, it's a very easy place to be for me because the prime minister and the Canadian government share a larger view of our relations," he said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Two Chicago-area Men Arrested In Ohio Terrorism Case (ABJ)

By Mike Robinson

Akron Beacon Journal, February 22, 2007

CHICAGO - Two Chicago-area cousins were arrested Wednesday on federal charges out of Cleveland accusing them of conspiring to wage holy war against Americans overseas, including U.S. military forces in Iraq.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, of suburban North Chicago, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, of Chicago, were accused along with three other men from the Toledo, Ohio, area who already had been under indictment on charges of plotting acts of terrorism against Americans overseas.

The fresh indictment returned by a grand jury in Cleveland added the two Chicago-area men to the roster of defendants and brought additional charges against the three men from Ohio.

The cousins, both American citizens, appeared briefly in Chicago before U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown, who ordered them sent to Ohio for arraignment. Prosecutors asked her to order them held in custody and sent to Ohio as federal prisoners. Defense attorneys asked for bond.

A hearing on whether to permit bond was set for 2:30 p.m. Monday.

Defense attorneys Gerald Collins and Brian Sieve said they had just met the two defendants, knew little about them and had no comment on the case.

The indictment claims that, between June 2004 and February 2006, the cousins and the other three men - Mohammad Zaki Amawi, 27, and Marwan Othman El-Hindi, 42, both formerly of Toledo, Ohio, and Wassim I. Mazloum, 22, formerly of Sylvania, Ohio - conspired to "kill or maim persons in locations outside of the United States, to including U.S. armed forces personnel serving in Iraq."

The conspiracy allegedly included finding fresh recruits to commit terrorist acts and seeking out sites for training in firearms, hand-to-hand combat and the use of explosives. The men also allegedly agreed to raise funds for "jihad training" and download Internet information on improvised explosive devices (IEDs).

A shadowy figure was described in the indictment only as the trainer, a U.S. citizen with a military background. The indictment said the two cousins met with the trainer in July 2004 and discussed sniper tactics, counter-surveillance techniques and the use of heavy machine guns.

The three Ohio men, currently in federal custody, were charged in the original indictment with conspiring to provide material support to terrorists. Amawi was also charged with verbally threatening the president of the United States and unlawful distribution of a video concerning suicide bomber vests.

Wednesday's indictment charged Amawi with distributing information about explosive chemicals downloaded from the Internet and charged El-Hindi with distributing information about explosives and making false statements to officials.

The five men face a maximum penalty of life in prison if convicted of conspiring to kill Americans overseas, according to federal prosecutors.

Meanwhile, prosecutors in Cleveland said a separate indictment was returned charging Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania, Ohio, brother of Wassim I. Mazloum, with making a false statement to federal agents.

In addition, El-Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, Ohio, are charged in a separate, seven-count indictment with conspiring to commit theft of public funds, making false statements and wire fraud in connection with a $40,000 federal grant they obtained to operate clinics for low-income taxpayers.

The government contends that no clinics were ever operated.

Local Men Indicted In Terror Probe (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, February 22, 2007

Federal agents swarmed a suburban apartment complex and a house on the Northwest Side early Wednesday, arresting two cousins allegedly linked to a terrorism conspiracy to kill Americans overseas, including U.S. troops.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, of North Chicago, and his cousin, Khaleel Ahmed, 26, of Chicago, have ties to three Toledo men charged in the conspiracy last year, authorities said. Federal prosecutors said the cousins had spoken to at least one of the three about receiving training and at one point were headed to Afghanistan or Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135188

Zubair Ahmed allegedly wanted to learn to use a .50-caliber machine gun.

"Man, we've been waiting for this," he said, according to the indictment.

The Ahmeds were named in a superseding indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Ohio, joining the three Toledo men, whose indictment was announced by Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales in February 2006.

Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi and Wassim Mazloum have pleaded not guilty and are expected to go on trial in Cleveland in the spring. They were accused of gathering information on explosives and tactics, planning to send money and computers to the Middle East and recruiting others to attack American forces in Iraq.

Recruits were "to train for violent jihad against the United States and its allies in Iraq, and elsewhere, and would propose potential training sites for use in providing ongoing firearms, hand-to-hand combat, explosives, and other paramilitary training to prospective recruits," the indictment states.

Two of those who were recruited were the Ahmeds, according to court documents. They were allegedly brought into the conspiracy by El-Hindi, who has Chicago ties. The Tribune has reported that El-Hindi, who used to live in the suburbs, ran a travel agency in the Loop near the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse that opened in the late 1990s and closed a few years ago.

El-Hindi allegedly took the cousins from Chicago to Cleveland in 2004 to meet a man described in the document as "the Trainer," a man with military experience who was associated with the group.

"Zubair and Khaleel discussed sniper tactics with the Trainer and their desire to receive training in, among other things, firearms and counter surveillance techniques," the indictment states. It was El-Hindi who stopped the two from going overseas because he believed they needed more training, it states.

The document does not allege that the cousins actually received any substantive training.

Bill Edwards, first assistant U.S. attorney in the northern district of Ohio, said the men discussed sniper tactics and were willing to travel to carry out terror plots.

"We wouldn't have charged them if we didn't think they were serious," said Edwards.

A federal judge in Chicago ordered them transferred to Ohio during a brief hearing Wednesday.

Lawyers for the two men declined to comment.

FBI agents arrived at the family's one-story brick home about 5:15 a.m. Wednesday, said Khaleel Ahmed's father, who showed a reporter a warrant calling for the seizure of evidence of his son's Ohio trip, travel to Egypt and other evidence, including communication between him and co-conspirators in the case.

The agents left in the afternoon and gave the family a list of things that had been taken. It included computer hard drives, cell phones, Islamic books and a sword.

Khaleel Ahmed's parents, who did not want to be identified, said they did not believe the charges.

"As far as my family knows, he didn't do anything. He is not a terrorist," said his mother. "It's a sin to kill anyone."

She said she has never heard her son, who had been studying computer engineering at several local colleges, express anger toward Americans or the war. He wasn't interested in politics, she said.

Khaleel's mother said the cousins did go to Egypt for several weeks in 2004 for vacation but said she has no knowledge of her son's going to Ohio.

In North Chicago, a man who answered the door at Zubair Ahmed's apartment identified himself as his roommate but declined to give his name. He said that the two met online in recent months when each was looking for a roommate. Before Wednesday he "hadn't seen [Ahmed] in two or three weeks," the man said. "We barely talked."

He said he thought Ahmed was a student at a nearby college or university but he wasn't sure which.

Neighbors said they woke to FBI agents' banging on the door of Ahmed's third-floor apartment.

"I woke up, and they were knocking so hard on his door that it sounded like they were hitting our door," said Tim Johnson, 24, whose apartment is diagonally across the hall from Ahmed's.

"Finally when they opened the door, [the agents] shouted 'Freeze, don't move,'" said Johnson's roommate Bobby Watson, 21.

Tribune staff reporter Andrew L. Wang contributed to this report.

2 Chicago Cousins Are Charged With Plotting Overseas Attacks (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 21 — Two cousins were arrested here Wednesday on charges of conspiring to commit terrorist acts against American military personnel in Iraq, as well as others abroad, in an Islamic holy war against the United States and its allies.

The defendants, Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, were taken into custody at their Chicago homes after a federal grand jury in Cleveland returned a fresh indictment in a pending terrorism case in which three Ohio men are already awaiting trial in Toledo.

The new indictment accuses the two Chicago men of plotting with the Ohioans "to kill or maim persons in locations outside of the United States," including members of the armed forces serving in Iraq.

It says the cousins, both United States citizens, sought training in firearms and countersurveillance from a person with an American military background. The indictment identified that person only as the Trainer. It describes the Trainer as an American citizen who communicated extensively with the three original defendants about paramilitary training but who was not engaged in the conspiracy.

The original defendants are Mohammad Zaki Amawi, 27, and Marwan Othman el-Hindi, 42, both formerly of Toledo, and Wassim I. Mazloum 24, formerly of Sylvania, Ohio, a Toledo suburb. They have been in federal custody a year, having been charged last February with conspiracy to commit terrorist acts overseas and with providing material support to terrorists.

Mr. Amawi was also charged then with making threats against President Bush and with distributing a video depicting the construction and use of a suicide bomb vest. Wednesday's indictment included new charges against him and Mr. Hindi involving further counts of distributing information regarding the manufacture and use of explosives.

In addition, a second new indictment charged Mr. Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, another town in the Toledo area, with defrauding the government by claiming to have used $40,000 in federal grant money for charitable purposes when in fact, the government said, it actually went to their personal use.

And yet another indictment charged Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania with making false statements to federal agents by denying knowledge that his brother Wassim had participated in firearms training.

Al-Arian Supporters Lobby For Release As Hunger Strike Continues (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Supporters of former professor Sami al-Arian - now in the fifth week of a prison hunger strike as he refuses to testify in front of a federal grand jury - on Wednesday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to deport al-Arian prior to his scheduled release from prison.

Al-Arian, a former computer science professor at the University of South Florida, was accused by prosecutors of being a leader of a terrorist group called Palestinian Islamic Jihad. He is being held at a medical prison in North Carolina.

After a six-month trial ended in an acquittal on some counts and a hung jury on others, al-Arian struck a plea bargain in May 2006 and admitted to conspiring to aid Palestinian Islamic Jihad, specifically by helping a family member with links to the group obtain immigration benefits and by lying to a reporter about another individual's ties to the group.

Al-Arian would be up for release in April, but his prison term is being extended indefinitely after a judge found him in civil contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury in Alexandria, Va., investigating a cluster of Islamic charities in northern Virginia that has ties to al-Arian.

Al-Arian believes his plea deal specifically exempted him from cooperating with authorities. But two federal judges have ruled that al-Arian must testify.

Al-Arian began his hunger strike Jan. 22 to protest of the subpoena and contempt citation. His family says he has been drinking only four glasses of water a day. Last week he fainted and hit his head. He has since been transferred to a medical prison in Butner, N.C.

Al-Arian's lawyer, Peter Erlinder, said it is only fair that Gonzales release al-Arian now because prosecutors initially recommended to the judge that al-Arian receive time served when he struck the May 2006 plea deal. A judge rejected that recommendation and sentenced al-Arian to an additional 11 months.

"Mr. Gonzales, you have the power ... to release Dr. al-Arian for voluntary departure from the U.S. with the stroke of your pen," Erlinder said in an open letter to Gonzales.

Erlinder was joined at a press conference outside the Justice Department by representatives of the Muslim American Society, the American Muslim Alliance and the ANSWER Coalition, an anti-war group.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the attorney general does not have the power to unilaterally free al-Arian. Deportations are handled by the Department of Homeland Security rather than the Justice Department.

Typically, immigration officials deport an individual only after they have served their entire sentence. Erlinder said there is precedent for deporting an individual before their prison time is up.

Judge Rules Terror Suspect Held Without Bond (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

A U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government will remain behind bars until his trial, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado was ordered held without bond. U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley also found federal authorities were justified in arresting Maldonado on charges related to his alleged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Somalia.

"These activities, in the court's judgment constitute crimes of violence," Botley said. "Mr. Maldonado is a danger and a flight risk."

During a two-day probable cause and detention hearing, FBI agents and prosecutors painted a portrait of a violent young man who willingly trained alongside al-Qaeda operatives to learn firearms and bombmaking skills. He was also accused of working to turn Somalia into another Iraq where insurgents would come in and terrorize the country and of recruiting others for this cause.

But defense attorneys described Maldonado as a man who, driven by anti-Muslim sentiment in America since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, moved out of the country with his family so they could live at ease as Muslims.

Botley said while the evidence showed Maldonado received weapons and bomb making training, it wasn't clear if al-Qaeda was in charge of the camp.

Maldonado faces charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a weapon of mass destruction, specifically a bomb. If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, is accused of traveling in November to an al-Qaeda terrorist camp in Somalia, where he was trained to use firearms and explosives in an effort to help another group, the Islamic Courts Union, topple the government and install an Islamic state. He was captured by the Kenyan military while trying to flee Somalia on Jan. 21.

Maldonado grew up in Pelham, N.H., and lived in Houston from August 2005 to November 2005 before moving with his wife and three children to Cairo, Egypt.

In a statement he gave to FBI agents in Kenya after his arrest, Maldonado said while living in Egypt he heard about an emerging Islamic state in Somalia and decided to move there with his family.

"I did intend to open up a bookstore to generate some money," Maldonado said in the statement, parts of which were read in court Wednesday by defense attorney Brent Newton.

But prosecutor Abe Martinez said Maldonado lied in his initial statements to FBI agents, later saying he forgot to mention he also went to Somalia to fight a jihad or holy war against the government there.

Newton said Maldonado didn't seek out al-Qaeda members and eventually changed his mind about fighting a jihad.

"I was never sure in my heart whether it was worth my life or not," Maldonado said in his statements to FBI agents. "I was asked to join jihad but I was worried about my family."

After he and his family tried to leave Somalia and go to Kenya, Maldonado became separated from his wife and kids. She later died of malaria. His children are being cared for by his parents in New Hampshire.

Maldonado had earlier contracted malaria, which stopped his training. He also became malnourished, losing 60 pounds while in Somalia.

Martinez said Maldonado also tried to recruit a friend in the United States to join him at the camp in Somalia, telling his friend in coded language that he was at a culinary institute.

"But what that really meant is he was at a terror training camp learning how to kill people," Martinez said.

Prosecutors and FBI agents said a confidential informant who is a U.S. citizen and was also at the training camp confirmed for authorities that Maldonado received firearms and bombmaking training and was aware al-Qaeda members were also being trained at the camp.

U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle said prosecutors plan to present evidence against Maldanado to a grand jury before March 13.

American Said To Have Ties To Al Qaeda Is Denied Bail (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 21 — An American convert to Islam who the government says took his family on jihad to Somalia and then lied to the F.B.I. was ordered held without bond Wednesday after a federal judge found sufficient evidence that he had been trained in weapons and bomb making by Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0135191

The defendant, Daniel J. Maldonado, also known as Daniel Alijughaifi, recently lived in Houston and Boston. Mr. Maldonado was "a flight risk and danger to the community" and must remain in jail pending trial, the judge, Calvin Botley ruled.

But Judge Botley granted a defense request that Mr. Maldonado, 28, gaunt from malaria and malnutrition, be given extra rations in jail.

Mr. Maldonado was arrested in Kenya on Jan. 21 after Islamist insurgents in Somalia were routed by Somali and Ethiopian forces, and he was flown to Houston by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Feb. 12. His wife had died of malaria in Somalia, and their three children were flown by the F.B.I. to Mr. Maldonado's parents in Londonderry, N.H., where Mr. Maldonado grew up. His mother, Rena Maldonado, said the family was too distraught to comment.

The government's case is laid out in an F.B.I. affidavit based on statements attributed to Mr. Maldonado and corroborating information from a confidential witness, another American said to have been with him in Somalia. It portrays Mr. Maldonado as "angry with America," supportive of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and "willing to become a suicide bomber if he were wounded and could not otherwise fight."

The United States attorney in Houston, Don DeGabrielle, said he would ask a grand jury for an indictment before March 13. If convicted, Mr. Maldonado, one of at least 15 Americans charged with aiding Al Qaeda since the Sept. 11 attacks, could receive life in prison.

Brent E. Newton, the public defender for Mr. Maldonado, said his client had gone to Somalia to support a legal faction, the Islamic Courts Union, not Al Qaeda, and had trained only with "a hodgepodge of mujahadeen groups." As for bomb-making, Mr. Newton said, "he watched some old man do this stuff, but merely watching someone do something is not conspiring with someone to do it." Mr. Newton also questioned whether Mr. Maldonado had been properly advised of his rights.

At a two-day detention hearing that was unusual for the explicitness of the evidence disclosed, Mr. Maldonado was said to have given the F.B.I. false information, then admitted that he "wrote or told many dishonest statements" and revised his account while still falling short of the truth, an F.B.I. agent testified.

The agent, Lucille Eglen-Anderson, who questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, said he had also tried to recruit an American friend to join the Islamist insurgents battling the Somali and Ethiopian government forces. In a coded call, Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified, Mr. Maldonado said he was "at the culinary institute leaning how to make P.B.J."

She and other agents testified that Mr. Maldonado was at a terrorist training camp run by Al Qaeda, where he was learning to shoot an AK-47 and make bombs. The government charges that he "conspired to use a weapon of mass destruction, that is, a bomb" and received "military-type training from Al Qaeda."

Mr. Maldonado's allegedly conflicting statements to the F.B.I. came out after his lawyer, Mr. Newton, said Tuesday that he needed to see the statements in order to question Ms. Eglen-Anderson, whom he had called as an adverse witness.

Judge Botley then recessed the hearing until the government could provide them Wednesday morning.

Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified that other F.B.I. agents happened to be in Kenya when Kenyan authorities notified American officials that Mr. Maldonado had been captured, along with several British citizens and a Swede. They began questioning him on Jan. 27, 2007, she said, driving him to a safe house with a kitchen and a well-stocked refrigerator.

Although he was in the legal custody of the Kenyans, she said, Mr. Maldonado was read his Miranda rights about remaining silent and requesting a lawyer.

For reasons Mr. Newton did not explain, he read into the record large parts of Mr. Maldonado's statements to the F.B.I., beginning with a four-page document based on statements made on Jan. 27, in which Mr. Maldonado said he had gone to Somalia with his family "to open a bookstore" and to pursue other "business opportunities."

But in a second document read in court, Mr. Maldonado told the F.B.I. the next day that he had lied and "today I feel the need to tell the truth."

Two days later, on Jan. 30, Agent Eglen-Anderson testified, Mr. Maldonado went back over his original four-page statement to make and initial corrections. "I left out the fact that I wanted to fight jihad," he wrote.

He had told of meeting a certain sheik in Mogadishu, Somalia, but on Jan. 30 he added, "I left out the fact that he gave me a gun and magazine."

But he still did not reveal the full story of his activities, Ms. Eglen-Anderson testified. She said the F.B.I. knew this because of what agents had been told by an informant, another American who was described only as a confidential witness before agents first questioned Mr. Maldonado on Jan. 27. The informant was so trusted by the mujahadeen, the F.B.I. said, that they had asked him to return to the United States to recruit English-speaking women for terrorist missions.

The informant's identity remained secret, Mr. DeGabrielle, the United States attorney, said. "But if there's a trial," he added, "it will come out."

The Spanish Connection (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0135192

By Edward Jay Epstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The 9/11 Commission relied on information derived from two captured al Qaeda perpetrators for much of its picture of the conspiracy leading up to the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The interrogations of these men -- Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or "KSM," who masterminded the plot and got Osama bin Laden to finance it, and Ramzi Binalshibh, who acted as KSM's liaison with lead suicide terrorist Mohammed Atta -- were performed by the CIA at secret locations.

KSM claimed that he left almost all the tactical details to Atta, and therefore could not say where Atta went, or whom he visited, in the final months of the plot. Binalshibh claimed he was Atta's only contact with al Qaeda during this period and that, other than himself, Atta never met with anyone on his trips abroad in 2001.

If these accounts are true, it follows that the conspiracy was a contained one, and the 9/11 Commission could preclude outside collaborators, including the participation of foreign countries. Thus, although the CIA was unable to trace the origin of the money supplied to Atta, the commission deemed this gap "of little practical significance" since the CIA's prisoners established that no one else was involved in the plot. Thus, too, when the CIA found that Iran had "apparently facilitated" the travel of eight of the 9/11 muscle hijackers in flights to and from Afghanistan (by not putting the required stamps on their passports, and by having a top Hezbollah official accompany their flights in and out of Iran), the commission could nevertheless rule out the possibility Iran or Hezbollah were "aware of the planning." The basis for this conclusion was the information provided by KSM and Binalshibh.

But what if these CIA prisoners -- who after all are diehard jihadists -- were lying?

Enter Judge Baltazar Garzon, Spain's terrorism magistrate, who has been for many years investigating the links between al Qaeda and a Spanish Islamic cell headed by one Imad Eddin Barakat Yarkas (who Mr. Garzon arrested in November 2001 and is currently in prison on a conspiracy conviction). The Spanish security service secretly had this cell under scrutiny since the mid-1990s; Mr. Garzon was thus able to draw on wiretaps, surveillance reports and other intelligence, as well as his own interrogations of suspects and captured documents from Afghanistan.

Mr. Garzon has produced a 697-page investigative report for Madrid's central court in September 2003, which charges that the Spanish cell -- through its connections to Mohammed Atta's Hamburg cell and some of the pilots it recruited -- helped plan, finance and support the 9/11 attacks.

In an interview, Mr. Garzon explained to me through an interpreter that the support of the Spanish cell began in the early days of the plot and continued up until the attack. He described evidence that ranged from video tapes that Spanish police had confiscated from the home of one of the Spanish conspirators, which methodically surveyed the twin towers of the World Trade Center from five different angles in the late 1990s, to a phone call intercepted by Spanish intelligence in August 2001 (at a time when the hijackers were buying tickets on the planes they planned to commandeer), in which an operative in London informed Yarkas that associates in "classes" had now "entered the aviation field," and were beheading "the bird." After drawing a diagram for me on a blackboard of how the Spanish cell connected to Atta's and Binalshibh's recruiters in Germany, he said it was "supporting the operation at every level."

Consider the unexplained activities of Atta and Binalshibh in Spain in 2001. Atta made two trips to Madrid, paid for with al Qaeda funds at critical points in the plot. The first one was in January, just after he finished his flight training classes in Florida and qualified as a pilot. The second one was just after most of the contingent of muscle hijackers had arrived in Florida in July. During that second trip, July 7 to July 19, Atta clocked 1,908 kilometers on his rented Hyundai and changed hotels frequently -- except for five nights, where he vanished from all hotel registries.

Atta's 9/11 co-conspirator, Binalshibh, also made two trips to Spain: The first, July 9 to July 16, was to the Terragona resort region near Barcelona, where he met up with Atta and then, during the same period, also vanished from the hotel registries. Binalshibh's second trip, Sept. 5 to Sept. 7, was to Madrid, where he obtained a bogus passport which he used to fly to Pakistan and make his escape to Afghanistan.

Why did Atta and Binalshibh make these trips? The 9/11 Commission turned to the CIA, which reported that Binalshibh (captured in 2002) said in his interrogation that neither he nor Atta had contacted anyone else in Spain. Thus the commission stated, "According to Binalshibh, they did not meet with anyone else while in Spain."

The problem here is that Atta and Binalshibh made independent trips to Spain. Atta went to Madrid in January when Binalshibh was in Germany; Binalshibh went to Madrid in September when Atta was in America. And when Atta arrived in Madrid on July 8, Binalshibh was in Hamburg. They were never in Madrid at the same time. On July 9, Atta did meet up with Binalshibh in the resort area of Terragona, but Atta then stayed in Spain three days after Binalshibh returned to Hamburg.

Presumably, they made separate trips because they had separate business, but the critical fact is this: Binalshibh was not in a position to know whom Atta did (or didn't) contact in Madrid or during his final three days in Spain.

Mr. Garzon argues that his extensive investigation of the Spanish cell directly contradicts Binalshibh's story that he and Atta had seen no one else.

Take, for example, the week they were together, July 9 to July 16. Both Atta and Binalshibh dropped from sight, leaving no hotel records, cellphone logs or credit-card receipts. Mr. Garzon reasons that someone organized a safe house for them to conduct their business.

That person, according to Mr. Garzon, is Mohamed Belfatmi, aka "Mohamed the Algerian," a man who had worked closely with the Spanish cell in getting its operatives in and out of Afghanistan for terrorist training. About a month before Atta's arrival in Spain, Belfatmi rented a house in Terragona very near to where Atta's rented car was last seen parked.

Mr. Garzon says that Belfatmi's house was used for the 9/11 "final planning sessions." From telephone intercepts, Mr. Garzon has established that Binalshibh was in contact with Belfatmi after the latter had returned to Germany. And in a brief call Belfatmi made to Yarkas on Sept. 1, Yarkas, correctly suspecting that his phone was being tapped, abruptly cut Belfatmi off, telling him not to continue with "that theme."

Later that week, Belfatmi flew to Karachi with Binalshibh's and Atta's Hamburg roommate and fellow al Qaeda cell member Said Bahaji, staying with him at the same hotel. Binalshibh arrived in Karachi on a separate flight. So did other members of the Hamburg cell, who along with Belfatmi and Bahaji escaped to Afghanistan (and have not been yet apprehended).

Mr. Garzon concluded that Binalshibh knew both Yarkas -- whose private number he had in his address book -- and Belfatmi. According to Mr. Garzon, Binalshibh "was clearly lying to the CIA to protect those he and Atta saw in Spain."

Baltazar Garzon, known for his prosecutorial zeal, is a controversial figure in Spain, having investigated everything from Basque terrorism to the Madrid bombing investigation whose alleged perpetrators are currently on trial in Madrid. But even many who don't agree with his methods -- or his politics -- agree he is on solid ground in his relentless pursuit of the connections between the Spanish cell and al Qaeda.

Yet if Mr. Garzon is correct about the Spanish connection to 9/11, it is not only the effectiveness of the CIA's interrogation of its al Qaeda prisoners that is called into question. The information from Binalshibh, KSM and other detainees was used to fill in the missing pieces of the jigsaw, and those gaps concerned the contacts the 9/11 conspirators might have had with others wishing to harm America. By saying that no one else was involved -- not in Spain, Iran, Hezbollah, Malaysia, Iraq, the Czech Republic or Pakistan -- these detainees allowed the 9/11 Commission to complete its picture of al Qaeda as a solitary entity.

Yet to come to its conclusion on this most fundamental issue, the commission was prohibited from seeing any of the detainees whose accounts it relied on. Nor was it allowed even to question the CIA interrogators to determine the way that information was obtained. The commission's joint chairmen themselves later acknowledged that they "had no way of evaluating the credibility of detainee information." So when Judge Garzon comes up with evidence that runs counter to detainees' claims, cracks begin to emerge in the entire picture.

Affirming Military Tribunals (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals decision on Tuesday upholding the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress last year is a welcome victory for common sense in the war on terror. Now we'll find out if the Supreme Court meant what it said last year about deferring to the two elected branches on the handling of enemy combatants.

We never had a problem with the Bush Administration's plan to set up military commissions shortly after 9/11. It is the duty of the executive branch -- which can act with dispatch and be held accountable by voters -- to conduct wars. And military tribunals have been successfully employed by past Presidents, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR.

Nevertheless, the Administration's critics kept insisting that enemy combatants captured in the war on terror were entitled to due process considerations while hostilities continued. And they took their arguments all the way to the Supreme Court.

The result was last year's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. That 5-3 ruling (Chief Justice John Roberts was recused) did not, as many on the left believe, question the government's right to set up military tribunals or hold unlawful combatants for the duration of the war. Rather, the Court held that the Pentagon's tribunals in place at the time violated certain rules in the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Furthermore, the Court invited Congress to revise these rules. In his concurring opinion, Justice Stephen Breyer reiterated that the majority took issue not with the existence of these tribunals, but with the way they had come into being. "Nothing prevents the President from returning to Congress to seek the authority he believes necessary," wrote Justice Breyer.

In a separate concurrence, Justice Anthony Kennedy said that "as presently structured, Hamdan's military commission exceeds the bounds Congress has placed on the President's authority." But he added, "Because Congress has prescribed these limits, Congress can change them."

That's exactly what lawmakers did in passing the Military Commissions Act that President Bush signed into law last October. The appellate court's 2-1 ruling this week, which held that Guantanamo detainees don't have the right to challenge their imprisonment in federal courts, affirms the constitutionality of that law. A Supreme Court appeal is likely. But a reversal would require the Justices not only to defy the will of the other two branches but also to ignore their own instructions to Congress in Hamdan.

Not that some won't be urging such a course of action. In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers argues that the Military Commissions Act, which effectively suspends habeas corpus for terrorist detainees, is unconstitutional. But the majority opinion, written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, is solidly anchored in Supreme Court jurisprudence. And the Court has long held that aliens held overseas have no constitutional rights unless Congress decides to confer them statutorily.

"Precedent in this court and the Supreme Court holds that the Constitution does not confer rights on aliens without property or presence within the United States," wrote Judge Randolph. He cited as the "controlling case" the Supreme Court's Johnson v. Eisentrager decision, the 1950 ruling rejecting the proposition that aliens are entitled to Fifth Amendment rights outside of the U.S.

The Court in Eisentrager went on to explain why it's prudent not to confer constitutional rights on enemy combatants: "If the Fifth Amendment confers its rights on all the world . . . [it] would mean that during military occupation irreconcilable enemy elements, guerrilla fighters, and 'werewolves' could require the American Judiciary to assure them freedoms of speech, press, and assembly as in the First Amendment, right to bear arms as in the Second, security against 'unreasonable' searches and seizures as in the Fourth, as well as rights to jury trial as in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments."

We don't doubt that antiwar activists and lawyers at the ACLU would have no problem granting such protections to suspected al Qaeda members and their allies. And such critics in Congress of tribunals as Senate Judiciary Chairman Pat Leahy have every right to try to rewrite the Military Commissions Act, if they have the political nerve. But we're also sure that prosecuting a war on terror would be significantly more difficult as a result. Having so ostentatiously invited Congress to act in Hamdan, the Supreme Court could also now help the country and its own reputation by agreeing with Judge Randolph.

American Liberty At The Precipice (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

In another low moment for American justice, a federal appeals court ruled on Tuesday that detainees held at the prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, do not have the right to be heard in court. The ruling relied on a shameful law that President Bush stampeded through Congress last fall that gives dangerously short shrift to the Constitution.

The right of prisoners to challenge their confinement — habeas corpus — is enshrined in the Constitution and is central to American liberty. Congress and the Supreme Court should act quickly and forcefully to undo the grievous damage that last fall's law — and this week's ruling — have done to this basic freedom.

The Supreme Court ruled last year on the jerry-built system of military tribunals that the Bush Administration established to try the Guantánamo detainees, finding it illegal. Mr. Bush responded by driving through Congress the Military Commissions Act, which presumed to deny the right of habeas corpus to any noncitizen designated as an "enemy combatant." This frightening law raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. And it gives the government the power to take away habeas rights from any noncitizen living in the United States who is unfortunate enough to be labeled an enemy combatant.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which rejected the detainees' claims by a vote of 2 to 1, should have permitted the detainees to be heard in court — and it should have ruled that the law is unconstitutional.

As Judge Judith Rogers argued in a strong dissent, the Supreme Court has already rejected the argument that detainees do not have habeas rights because Guantánamo is located outside the United States. Judge Rogers also rightly noted that the Constitution limits the circumstances under which Congress can suspend habeas to "cases of Rebellion or invasion," which is hardly the situation today. Moreover, she said, the act's alternative provisions for review of cases are constitutionally inadequate. The Supreme Court should add this case to its docket right away and reverse it before this term ends.

Congress should not wait for the Supreme Court to act. With the Democrats now in charge, it is in a good position to pass a new law that fixes the dangerous mess it has made. Senators Patrick Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, have introduced a bill that would repeal the provision in the Military Commissions Act that purports to obliterate the habeas corpus rights of detainees.

The Bush administration's assault on civil liberties does not end with habeas corpus. Congress should also move quickly to pass another crucial bill, introduced by Senator Christopher Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, that, among other steps, would once and for all outlaw the use of evidence obtained through torture.

When the Founding Fathers put habeas corpus in Article I of the Constitution, they were underscoring the vital importance to a democracy of allowing prisoners to challenge their confinement in a court of law. Much has changed since Sept. 11, but the bedrock principles of American freedom must remain.

A War Under Law (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Smith

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Congress Must Address U.S. Detainee Policies

In November, Americans voiced their frustration with the war in Iraq and gave control of Congress to the Democrats. The voters rejected the president's swaggering, go-it-alone approach and the administration's contemptuous attitude toward the Geneva Conventions, which led to the abuses at Abu Ghraib, actions that so damaged our credibility that other nations are much less willing to cooperate in the war on terrorism. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and her able legal adviser, John Bellinger, have pushed for reforms that have begun to reverse this trend -- but much more must be done.

Sens. Christopher J. Dodd and Patrick J. Leahy introduced legislation last week that will move us further in the right direction. But there are three things Congress should do.

First, Congress should reconsider the detainee legislation passed last fall. Last-minute changes rammed through by the White House watered down many of the bill's key provisions. On the treatment of detainees and interrogation techniques it created two standards -- one for the military and another for the CIA. The standards for the military are in an Army Field Manual, but the CIA standards are to be enumerated in a presidential executive order. Rumors suggest that the White House is struggling to develop those rules. Congress should relieve the president of that task before he makes a bad situation worse.

If Vice President Cheney has his way, a good dunking may be among the approved CIA techniques, even though "waterboarding" is prohibited by the Army Field Manual. Cheney's October remarks that dunking a detainee was " a no-brainer" were irresponsible and added to the confusion in the field (and around the world) about the rules for treatment of detainees.

It is not clear why the military and the CIA should have different standards for the treatment and interrogation of detainees. All U.S. agencies should use the techniques best able to elicit information that is vital to our security. And why should the CIA once again be asked to take risks not knowing whether, when the political winds change in Washington, its officers will be left facing charges that they violated the law?

Hearings should be held to determine which interrogation techniques have produced useful intelligence. Lawmakers should review the recent report of the government's Intelligence Science Board, which concluded that there was no scientific evidence that coercive techniques produced good intelligence. Congress should also consider the requirements of international law and develop a single standard that will apply equally to all agencies.

Second, Congress should repeal the provisions that stripped detainees at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere of the right of habeas corpus and that instead gave them an extremely limited right to challenge their detentions. A federal appeals court, interpreting lawmakers' last effort, ruled Tuesday that detainees do not have the right to use a habeas petition to challenge the basis of their detention. The case will surely be appealed to the Supreme Court because detainees must have the right to argue to a federal judge -- not a military officer, as in the current law -- that the factual basis on which they are being held indefinitely and without criminal charges is not accurate. Detainees' right to habeas corpus could be limited, as was suggested by Sens. Arlen Specter and Patrick Leahy, to prevent frivolous lawsuits over conditions at Guantanamo. But detaining men with no hope of a fair hearing ensures that, if they weren't terrorists when they were detained, they probably will be when they are finally released.

Third, Congress should also examine the practice of "rendition," or sending detainees to countries for trial or detention where, it is alleged, they can be mistreated or tortured. Before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, rendition was a valuable but selectively used tool of U.S. law enforcement and intelligence agencies. Since Sept. 11 it has been used extensively, and its continued viability has been questioned. Congress should establish a solid legal footing for renditions, including measures to ensure that anyone sent to another country is not mistreated.

The administration should listen, really listen, to the American people and to those in Congress and the military who understand that adhering to international law and our core values will help us win the war on terrorism. It will take years to get out of the hole we're in, but if Congress leads and the president understands, we can begin climbing out.

Drop This Case (WP)

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

"FOR THE rule of law to prevail, litigation must have a beginning and an end." So wrote Judge Bruce Einhorn in a federal case that has become the Jarndyce and Jarndyce of immigration law-- it passed the 20-year mark last month. The saga of the

Los Angeles Eight, though their number is now down to two, involves Palestinians whom the government has been seeking to deport for their activities on behalf of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) -- activities such as raising money, holding meetings and distributing magazines in the mid-1980s. Six of the group have since been granted residency status, and the government hasn't moved against them. But two, Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh, remain the subject of deportation proceedings, though they were legal permanent residents at the time of their activities. They have never been accused of any terrorist action or criminal violation, and the government concedes that their actions would be constitutionally protected if they were U.S. citizens.

The PFLP is a loathsome group that has carried out terrorist activities. It was an important and legitimate policy change, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to tighten the law to make raising money here for terrorist groups a crime. But that law was not in place when Mr. Hamide and Mr. Shehadeh were allegedly involved with the PFLP; they say they were never members but only distributed its magazine. At this point, if not from the outset, the pursuit of two law-abiding, middle-aged men with roots and families in this country is misplaced and even self-defeating on the part of the government. The case of the Los Angeles Eight has become an unnecessary flash point for Arab Americans convinced that the government is discriminating against them.

In addition, the government's behavior undercuts its argument for deportation. "A reasonable argument could be made that if Hamide and Shehadeh have engaged in terrorist activity, particularly in the context of today's world, then the government would be prepared to move heaven and Earth -- not to mention some mounds of paper -- to complete the trial and deportation" of them, Judge Einhorn wrote. Instead, the government has delayed presenting its case and ignored court orders to turn over potentially exculpatory evidence. "The repeated actions of the government in not complying with the court's orders have prevented" the two men "from obtaining fair hearings and closure in their case," Judge Einhorn concluded, calling the government's behavior "an embarrassment to the rule of law."

It's well past time for this to end. The government has until the end of the month to appeal the judge's ruling. It should, instead, drop this case, as it should have done years ago.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Safe (AP)

By Chase Squires, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE, Colo. -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured a federal prison holding some of the nation's most violent and disruptive inmates on Wednesday and said the facility is secure, but he conceded that it could be improved.

"Are there challenges? Yes," said Gonzales, the nation's top law enforcement official. "Can we do better? Yes."

Gonzales agreed to visit the prison, known as Supermax, after Colorado's two senators raised concerns about staffing and security.

He stopped short of promising to increase the number of guards or build an additional fence around the compound, as some state and local officials have advocated. Instead, he said he was willing to listen.

"The question is reaching a general consensus on what is needed," Gonzales said. "There may be additional staffing that we can provide to the facilities here."

Supermax, 90 miles southwest of Denver, houses 474 of the nation's most notorious convicts, including Olympic bomber Eric Rudolph and Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui.

Security at the 490-bed prison, built in 1994 for $60 million, has been under scrutiny for months. Last year, an arbitrator found that staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail.

The Justice Department says that all mail and phone calls to and from inmates labeled as terrorists have been monitored since October, and that perimeter security has been beefed up.

Sens. Wayne Allard, a Republican, and Ken Salazar, a Democrat, accompanied Gonzales.

John Gage, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees, also took the tour. He said prison officers are not asking for more money, just more staff.

Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, also on the tour, said Supermax staffing is higher than it was five years ago and enough to safely manage the facility.

AG Rates Supermax Up To Par (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 22, 2007

After tour, Gonzales "comfortable" with prison setup

Florence - A battle over how to run the nation's booming federal prison system intensified Wednesday as U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, guard-union leaders and lawmakers toured the ultra- high-security Supermax facility and held an unofficial summit.

Gonzales emerged two hours later and pronounced Supermax up to par, lauding recent efforts to make sure mail and phone calls from terrorist prisoners are monitored.

"I'm comfortable with where we are at today on this issue," he said after a Supermax tour that was off-limits to reporters.

But guard-union leaders bristled, warning that thin staffing has put prisons on the brink of disastrous riots as the nation's federal inmate population approaches 200,000.

Supermax union president Barbara Batulis, who accompanied Gonzales, said terrorists housed there still are able to communicate with followers in Spain and Iraq.

Union leaders have begun mobilizing a lobbying blitz to demand $500 million from Congress to hire more guards nationwide, said John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees.

New surveillance technology at Supermax and other prisons ignores the core issue of inadequate staffing, Gage said. "Those cameras will not replace correctional officers. And electric fences? We're not talking about escapes here. We're talking about safety within the walls," he said.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, who accompanied Gonzales along with U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, also raised questions.

Federal prison chiefs "have to do more. They have to recognize ... we need to have much more linguistic capability in Arabic" in order to understand and assess terrorist-prisoner communications, said Salazar, D-Colo.

Allard, R-Colo., praised Gonzales for being "willing to sit down and listen" in what he and Salazar cast as a continuing dialogue about prison conditions.

Gonzales runs the Justice Department, which oversees some 114 federal prisons. After meeting with guards and supervisors Wednesday, he acknowledged their anxieties. But he made no commitment to hire more guards here or build an outer-perimeter fence.

Improvements in the future are possible. "We're always evaluating what we do," Gonzales said, flanked by Bureau of Prisons director Harley Lappin at a news conference. It's up to Lappin to identify problems in prisons such as increasing assaults, Gonzales said.

In recent days here, outbreaks of violence prompted tower guards at the high-security U.S. Penitentiary adjacent to Supermax to fire lethal and nonlethal rounds to stop inmates from killing one another, said Ken Shatto, union president at the penitentiary.

"Today I'm trying to head off full-blown riots," he said. "That's where I think we are headed. This is no good for the safety and security of staffers and inmates alike."

In Supermax, assaults on guards have increased and convicted terrorists seem to be communicating more by shouting between their cells, while three new interpreters struggle to monitor phone calls and recreation-area communications as well as screen mail, guards and union officials said.

Threats to kill staff members have increased to about 110 last year, double the number in 2005, said chief union steward Bob Snelson, who represented guards last fall before an arbitrator who found dangerous understaffing.

Guards lament that, after a Justice Department inspector general's report and lawmakers focused attention on problems at Supermax last fall, federal prison chiefs began moving staff from the neighboring penitentiary and medium-security prison to Supermax.

"It's a shell game with bodies," Batulis said. These moves increased pressures at the other facilities, where riots in January left several guards injured.

The inspector general's report last fall indicated that three terrorists convicted in the World Trade Center attacks of 1993 wrote more than 90 letters to Islamic extremists outside the prison.

A Bureau of Prisons document made available Wednesday said that newly hired language specialists have not received sufficient intelligence training and that "BOP's intelligence capability ... is not well-developed."

Attorney General Tours Supermax (PUEBCHF)

By Tracy Harmon

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison - Supermax - Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety.

Gonzales toured the prison with U.S. Sens. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., and Wayne Allard, R-Colo., as well as Federal Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin and U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colo. Gonzales is the second of the nation's chief law enforcement officers to visit the prison - former U.S. Attorney Janet Reno helped dedicate Supermax in January 1995.

"I heard from Senators Salazar and Allard their concerns about the facility here in Florence and what we could do," Gonzales said. "We had good discussions with staff today and are committed to a safe facility here and at facilities throughout the nation.

"I want to ensure we are doing everything we can for the wonderful people who work here and the safety of the community," Gonzales said.

Salazar said since he and Allard took separate tours of Supermax late last year that additional staff have been added, technology has been improved and in lieu of perimeter fencing being added, a control tower has been enhanced to provide a 360 degree view of the complex and an armored vehicle has been added to patrols.

"We are committed to making sure this is the safest and most secure for the protection of the people who work and live here," Salazar said.

Guard towers loom over the Supermax facility, the highest security area at the Federal Prison in Florence. Officials there told U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that perimeter security for the federal prison complex had been increased in recent months.

Allard said the tour Wednesday was fruitful.

"This is a great complex with employees that do a great job. We probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the concerns at least right away, but more employees and more security could be coming in the future," Allard said.

Since the Inspector General's office issued a report last year detailing relaxed inmate phone and mail monitoring, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the general mail being sent to or from inmates designated as terrorist inmates since October of last year. Mail is not delivered to or sent from terrorist inmates until after it is read and translated if necessary.

Lappin said the bureau has added additional translator analysts. As a result, 100 percent of phone calls for terrorist inmates are monitored; however, because language translators may not always be available, the prison records the conversations for later translation.

According to a Bureau of Prisons press release, the Supermax prison is at 92 percent staffing level with 327 staff members. Lappin was questioned about a bureau report which indicated that a minimum 240 correctional officers are needed at the prison.

"There were 185 correctional officers at this same time last year. It may have been that 240 were needed years and years ago, but with the current population, we can safely manage with the number of officers we have - staff numbers coming down at a prison after it has opened is not uncommon," Lappin said.

Gonzales was questioned about union officials' characterization of a general deterioration of all federal prisons.

"I have heard the anxiety and I would like to know the source. Have there been an increased number of assaults and if in fact there have and those concerns exist, we have good communication in place to resolve the issues," Gonzales said.

"There is anxiety with any change and how to manage an increasing prison population," Lappin said. "Are there challenges? Yes. Can we do better? Yes. This is what this (tour) is all about."

Technology improvements at Supermax include the addition of 96 cameras over the past two years, replacing 64 older cameras for a total of 400 cameras in operation in the prison. A complexwide armed mobile patrol vehicle was added in December to provide additional perimeter security.

A beefed-up command tower has been made taller and outfitted with an encrypted monitoring system which provides ground-level and overhead views of all four prisons at the complex. In addition, plans are in place to further enhance the abilities of the tower.

In terms of future spending and oversight of additional funds being funneled to the Department of Justice, Allard said he and Salazar will continue to work with the bureau and participate in budget hearings to ask tough questions.

Supermax Security Concerns Are Being Addressed, AG Says (RMN)

By Dick Foster, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain (CO) News, February 22, 2007

Staffing levels adequate; mail, calls monitored

FLORENCE - All the mail and telephone calls of terrorists housed at Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison, are being monitored under new tighter security procedures, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday after touring the prison.

Less certain are other security improvements sought by the prison's staff and the townspeople of Florence, including more corrections officers and a perimeter fence around the four-prison federal complex that includes Supermax.

Supermax's 475 inmates are considered the most dangerous in the country's federal prison system and include a roster of international and domestic terrorists: Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef, shoe bomber Richard Reid, Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, and Olympic and abortion clinic bomber Eric Rudolph.

Security troubles cast the prison into the national spotlight last fall after a Justice Department inspector general's report found that a shortage of Arabic translators prevented the screening of dozens of letters from convicted terrorists to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004.

That problem has been solved, said Gonzales, who toured the prison with Colorado's two U.S. senators, Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, and Rep. Doug Lamborn, whose congressional district includes the prison.

"I am confident that we're doing what we should be doing monitoring communications in and out of the facility," Gonzales said.

About 30 Supermax prisoners have been designated terrorists by the courts, making them subject to special security measures.

Federal Bureau of Prisons officials said that since last October it has monitored 100 percent of the mail and phone calls of the designated inmates.

The Bureau of Prisons also has beefed up its counterterrorism unit to enhance monitoring of terrorist inmates' communications and two FBI agents have been assigned to the prison, officials said.

Other prison security improvements may not come about as quickly.

The Supermax staffing level was 15 percent to 25 percent below what the Bureau of Prisons defined in a 2005 "mission critical" report as the minimum staffing level to operate the prison safely, officials of the prison employees' union said last summer.

Since then, the staff has been increased from fewer than 180 to 193, with several of the new employees coming from the neighboring high-security and medium-security prisons in the Florence complex.

"It's robbing Peter to pay Paul," said Barbara Batulus of the Association of Federal Government Employees, which represents the federal prison staffers.

But Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, who accompanied Gonzales Wednesday, said he was comfortable with the current Supermax staffing level.

No Promises For Supermax Fence, Guards (COLOSG)

By R. SCOTT RAPPOLD

Colorado Springs (CO) Gazette, February 22, 2007

U.S. attorney general says security has been improved

FLORENCE - The nation's top law enforcement official said Wednesday that recent changes have improved safety at the federal Supermax prison, home to terrorists and many of the nation's most dangerous criminals.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales didn't pledge to hire more staff or build a perimeter fence — two of the concerns that have been voiced by local officials and the union representing Supermax employees — but said such measures are still options.

"There has been additional staffing. We've got additional technology in place," Gonzales said during a news conference after touring the prison. "We've provided additional tools to deal with the concern about perimeter fencing."

Gonzales visited the prison at the request of U.S. Sens. Wayne Allard, a Republican, and Ken Salazar, a Democrat, who accompanied Gonzales on Wednesday, along with U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colorado Springs.

The prison has been under fire since last fall, when a federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail and an arbitrator ruled staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees.

Officials said more mail screeners have been hired, and new hires have brought the number of correctional officers to 193. There were 240 when the prison opened. Officials said 92 percent of authorized positions have been filled.

"We believe we can safely manage this institution with the current population and the current procedures with the number of correctional staff we have," said Harley Lappin, director of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons, who also toured the prison.

Officials also touted the addition of 96 cameras, an armed mobile patrol vehicle, a new communications tower with an overhead view of the entire complex and other "technological advances" to improve security.

The senators praised the changes at the prison, though they said more new officers may be needed — something Gonzales said would be considered if deemed necessary.

"We're not able to hit 100 percent of what we want to have here," Allard said. "We're probably not going to be able to take care of all of these concerns, at least immediately."

Gonzales said a perimeter fence, estimated to cost $20 million, is still on the table, though it doesn't appear necessary.

"The question is, is that a wise use of taxpayer dollars going forward?" Gonzales said. "That's something the senators and I will be engaging in a dialogue about.

"I am committed to ensuring that we have safe and secure facilities, not just here but throughout all of our federal facilities," he said.

State Rep. Liane "Buffie" McFadyen, whose district includes Supermax and 11 other prisons, has been one of the most vocal Supermax critics. She said more officers are still needed.

"If I have to choose between the increased staff from the bureau or the fence, I would like the staff," McFadyen said.

Supermax Tour (KXTU)

By Christina Salvo

KXTU-TV, Fox 21, Colorado Springs/Pueblo, February 22, 2007

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the Supermax Prison in Florence Wednesday along with Senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard to see what steps have been taken to improve the safety and security of the facility.

The prison has been criticized by state and federal officials because of staffing levels inadequate monitoring and security measures. Supermax houses some of the most harden criminals including both foreign and domestic terrorists, which is what raised so many eyebrows when a report came out last year faulting the facility for among other things not reading all incoming and outgoing mail from the highest-risk prisoners and not monitoring telephone calls.

"I am confident were doing what should be doing to monitor communication both in and out of these faculties," said Attorney General Gonzales.

Big words following big steps that have been taken in the last few months to address security and safety issues in what should be the nation's most secure penitentiary.

"The issue of additional staffing: there are now some additional correctional officers that have been added to this facility," said Sen. Salazar.

Presently the Department of Justice reports 92% of authorized positions are filled putting the inmate-to-staff ratio at 1.5:1, the lowest of its kind in comparison.

But is that enough for a prison housing some of the world's most dangerous criminals?

"I think we have additional funding and one of the things we will look at is should there be additional staffing," said the Attorney General.

While he has pledged his commitment and obligation to addressing any additional security needs, the question the Attorney General said will be reaching a consensus on what is absolutely needed. A perfect example is the debate over what some said is the need to replace the "cow fence" that currently lines the perimeter with a hardened one. Since the issue was 1st raised additional steps have been taken to address that concern . We now have armed mobile patrol, now have a tower with additional surveillance. So the question now is whether that is a wise use of tax payers dollars," said Gonzales.

With regard to the concern over monitoring inmate communication the Department of Justice reports that the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100% of mail sent and received by inmates designated as terrorists as well as their phone calls.

While the Attorney General Gonzales said he is satisfied with the steps that have been taken, more can be done to continue to safeguard those who work inside Supermax and those that live in the surrounding area.

US Attorney General Addresses Supermax Security (KRDO)

By Stephanie Wurtz

KRDO-TV, ABC 13, Colorado Springs, February 22, 2007

It houses some of the most dangerous criminals in the world, but is Colorado's Supermax Prison secure? The nation's top law enforcement official toured the complex Wednesday. After his tour, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he's confident in the security of the prison complex and is satisfied that steps have already been taken to address safety concerns. But he and Colorado's lawmakers agree: work at Supermax is not done. "We all care, in a very united way, that we have safe and secure facilities," says Sen. Ken Salazar, (D) Colorado, "there are issues that have been raised and we have addressed some of those." Addressing concerns by adding some staff and security cameras.

The complex has also employed translators and increased the monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls. "Whether or not they have any terrorist connections, whether or not they've been ordered to subject to any administrative restrictions, will dictate the level of monitoring that does occur," says Gonzales, "but we've had some good discussions about that and I'm confident we're doing what we should be doing." One item still unresolved-- the question of whether the complex needs more perimeter fencing. "We now have armed mobile patrols, we now have a tower that provides additional surveillance," Gonzales says of increased perimeter security, "so the question is whether or not [perimeter fencing] is a wise use of taxpayers' money going forward."

Lawmakers and law enforcement will continue to discuss that issue and any future changes may be needed at Supermax. "Not only is this a great complex that does a great job, but also," says Sen. Wayne Allard, (R) Colorado, "we understand that we're probably unable to meet 100% if the needs of what we want to do here." But Gonzales says the tour was a step forward in what he calls an ongoing process. "We're always evaluating what we do; not just in this area, but everything we do in fighting crime and fighting terrorism," says Gonzales. The attorney general didn't offer any specifics about what may be next in the future of Supermax, but did reiterate the fact that discussions will continue.

Guard Union Calls 'new' Staffers Shell Game By Feds (PUEBCH)

By Tracy Harmon, THE PUEBLO CHIEFTAIN

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 22, 2007

FLORENCE - Union officials on Wednesday accused the Federal Bureau of Prisons of taking correctional staff intended for other prisons to help staff the Supermax penitentiary.

The Supermax, which is referred to by prison officials as the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary, houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including convicted terrorists.

"We got our 18 (additional officers), but they are taking staff from other institutions and funneling them to ours," said Barb Batulis, American Federation of Government Employees Local 1302 president for the Supermax. "It is like robbing Peter to pay Paul and they are trying to put it back on me because I told them they had to do something about the staffing."

Union officials suspect that the 18 new officers put on staff at Supermax actually were supposed to go to work at the lower security Federal Correctional Complex prisons in Florence. The complex houses four prisons - Supermax, the high-security United States Penitentiary, the medium-security Federal Correctional Institution and a low-security camp.

"Even with the additional staff, we are still below 'mission critical' levels of at least 20 correctional officers," Batulis said. "And we haven't gotten any additional (Arabic) translators. We still have just three and that is not a lot to monitor all the calls and mail for the (terrorist) inmates."

Holly Pruyne, who is the Local 1300 president representing the medium security and camp prisons, said five correctional officers intended for the Federal Correctional Institution were reassigned to Supermax.

"The FCI has a maximum rated capacity of 794 inmates. We are at 1,174 inmates now and are going up to 1,300. We have 79 percent of the staff we need for the basic mission critical status," Pruyne said.

Union officials said on Jan. 3 and Jan. 9, when disturbances were occurring at the high-security penitentiary, staff from both Supermax and the FCI responded to help. With a total of 42 staffers responding, the incidents left the FCI with few officers and inmates who were not on lock-down status.

"These inmates know this," Pruyne said. "Another example is that there will be four people at the front gate (Wednesday) for the (Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez's visit) dog-and-pony show and two of them were pulled from phone call monitoring at the FCI."

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees national union of Washington, D.C., was among high-ranking union officials in town Wednesday to bring a voice to the short staffing problem, which he said exists across the nation.

"The reason we are here is because there is a storm occurring in the correctional industry," Gage said. "The Bureau of Prisons is trying to replace correctional officers with technology, in a minimalist approach that is certainly not working."

Gage said the federal inmate population is growing by nearly 9,000 inmates a year, while staffing is down. He said prison problems have increased as a result.

In the two-year period from February 1999 to January 2001 federal prison assaults on staff numbered 2,095; between 2003 and 2005, the assaults on staff increased by 778.

Another alarming statistic, Gage said, is that the instances of tower officers taking shots into prison compounds has gone up 500 percent.

"This is simply about cutting money and risking safety. It is disingenuous of the administration to say cameras or electric fences are improving safety in the prisons. There is never a replacement for the professional correctional officer," Gage said.

Gage said union officials believe it would take $500 million to correct the problem. He said Congress has dedicated an additional $143 million in the budget for the U.S. Justice Department for 2007.

"Now the Justice Department has to put that money into staffing," Gage said.

Batulis said she and other union officials will return to the nation's capital next week to lobby Congress and "follow where the money goes to make sure it goes where it is supposed to go."

Volunteer Group Lags In Replacing Gulf Houses (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton And Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAY ST. LOUIS, Miss. — In the two years following the 2004 tsunami in the Indian Ocean, Habitat for Humanity International, the nondenominational Christian ministry, built or repaired 8,500 houses in Indonesia, Thailand, India and Sri Lanka.

Habitat for Humanity seemed poised to do the same thing along the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina hit in 2005. Just days after the storm, its chief executive appeared on CNN, promising to build and repair as many homes as it could pay for, "hopefully in the thousands." The organization quickly mustered 50,000 volunteers, raised $127 million, and attracted prominent backers like President Bush and the New Orleans jazz luminaries Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis.

But almost 18 months after storms destroyed more than 250,000 homes, Habitat for Humanity says it has built just 10 houses for poor hurricane victims here, 36 in New Orleans, and a total of 416 along the entire coast, from Alabama to Texas. More are under construction, for a total of 702.

That slower pace reflects, in part, the more complex houses that Habitat builds in the United States, as well as the mind-numbing issues — involving insurance costs and government regulations — that seem to have bogged down efforts to rebuild after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But Habitat International is starting to face criticism that its procedures are slow, rigid and perhaps unsuited to helping disaster victims, however rewarding its efforts are for its volunteers. The organization is working through its independent local affiliates, which function like franchises and which have tended to build a dozen houses a year each.

"I don't think they were prepared to undertake the massive rebuilding efforts required after Katrina," Fred Carl Jr., who was the Hurricane Katrina housing coordinator for Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, wrote in an e-mail message.

"I think they're very good at building a few homes through their local chapters," Mr. Carl continued, "but this was a whole new ballgame and I think they may have underestimated the vast challenge this involved."

This criticism is echoed by some leaders of charitable and housing groups who are reluctant to be quoted because they work with Habitat. Some suggest that Habitat's insistence on working through affiliates has slowed it. The group has spent $61.5 million of the $127 million it raised for the Gulf Coast. Nearly three dozen of the houses it has built were paid for by other charities.

Even within the organization, some have questioned its continued emphasis on building from scratch, rather than on helping people repair and rebuild damaged houses.

Habitat for Humanity officials say they hit the ground running after the storms and are pleased with the pace of building. The group says it will meet its goal of 1,000 houses under construction or completed by the end of August, the second anniversary of Hurricane Katrina, and it plans to build 1,000 more.

Along the Gulf Coast, "we had built 57 homes a year, now we're building 57 a month," said Kenneth J. Meinert, a volunteer who left his job running a building company in Canada to coordinate Habitat for Humanity's storm response. "In these conditions, to have built 700 homes, it's an absolute work of God," he added.

Habitat, with more than $1 billion in annual revenues, is based in Atlanta and Americus, Ga., and has operations worldwide. Its mission often seems as much about providing spiritual fulfillment to its volunteers as it is about improving new homeowners' lives.

"Habitat really taps into this American ethos, this real barn-raising sensibility," said Jerome P. Baggett, a professor at the Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley, who has written a book on the group. "But building many houses is more complex than building the occasional barn."

Traditionally, Habitat volunteers raise money and use donated materials to build $60,000 houses in their own communities. In the region today, most of the volunteers come from "away," as Mr. Meinert put it, and the group has used some factory-built modular houses.

In an interview here, Mr. Meinert said that about 400 of the 700 houses were what the group calls House in a Box projects, framed outside the Gulf Coast by volunteers and then trucked south for assembly.

Habitat for Humanity lent volunteers to house-gutting groups, he said, and has given some of its money to other organizations working on the Gulf Coast, including $3 million to help finance home repairs.

So far, Mr. Meinert said, of the $61.5 million spent, about $15 million has gone to Louisiana affiliates and $15 million to those in Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0135203

Critics have questioned Habitat's continued emphasis on building new homes rather than on rehabilitation. They note that other groups have done more with this approach: volunteers from Southern Baptist churches mucked out 12,000 houses in Mississippi alone, and have rebuilt or repaired 3,000, while volunteers from Mennonite congregations have repaired hundreds of houses and built 31 new ones last year. Even the small Southern Mutual Help Association, a nonprofit that reported revenues of $3.3 million in 2005, has helped rehabilitate or rebuild more than 500.

In one successful variation on the national group's procedures, Habitat's Northern Virginia affiliate has rebuilt two dozen houses in East Biloxi, Miss., and plans to build 50 more this year. Karen Cleveland, the executive director of the Virginia group, said it paid $10,000 to $15,000 a house.

Like others urging Habitat International toward flexibility, Ms. Cleveland traveled to its offices in Americus to make the case for a similar approach across the organization. She was told the group was committed to the House in a Box strategy.

Ronnie McBrayer, the former director of Habitat for Humanity's affiliate in Walton County, Fla., said his group's efforts to help rebuild the town of Pearlington, Miss., had been met with indifference and then hostility from some organization officials. Habitat insisted its name be removed from that project, which was focused on providing interim housing for people living in tents, he said.

Mr. Meinert of Habitat International said the Florida affiliate was doing work that was not traditionally part of the group's mission. "We would not take donors' money and send it there in large quantities to build temporary housing," he said.

Mr. McBrayer, now a hospital chaplain, said there was a conflict of values between his affiliate and national leaders. "Our grass-roots group values speed and putting a roof over heads," he said.

The organization had some experience in disaster recovery before the tsunami. But the wave of donations that followed it prompted the group to create a special unit that has spent about $42 million of the more than $71 million it collected for building and repairing 8,500 houses overseas, said Mike Carscaddon, the organization's executive vice president.

The money went farther there in part, he said, because houses in developing countries are typically smaller than homes here and cost about $5,000 apiece.

Habitat for Humanity does not give houses away; it provides 20-year no-interest mortgages and uses the payments to finance more houses. To qualify, families must have incomes well below the median for their areas, but steady enough to cover mortgages. (Traditionally, 90 percent of applicants are rejected.)

They must also have good credit, agree to contribute several hundred hours of "sweat equity," attend classes on finances and homeownership and in some areas, including New Orleans, come up with several thousand dollars for taxes and insurance.

Those strict requirements have frustrated some applicants for one Habitat project, Musicians' Village, set on eight acres in the Upper Ninth Ward of New Orleans. The project was publicized as a way to bring back the city's displaced traditional jazz and blues musicians, though it will include nonmusicians, too. It will also have several duplex apartments for older musicians and a community center.

Some musicians have complained that Habitat has rejected them, and others that its processes discouraged them from applying.

Tanio Hingle, the bass drummer with the New Birth Brass Band, said he had applied for the program but was not pursuing it. He said he thought Habitat should provide housing first and worry about the paperwork later.

Complaints like his started surfacing in the New Orleans news media last year. Mr. Connick and Mr. Marsalis recently asked Jackie Harris, a music producer who now works for them, to help musicians through the process for the Habitat project, which will eventually include more than 70 houses on-site and 150 in the area.

Ms. Harris said the musicians and Habitat had misunderstood one other but were adjusting. "It's been a learning curve for both," she said.

Habitat officials say that in New Orleans and in Covington, which is across Lake Pontchartrain, their efforts have encouraged homeowners and private developers to build or rehabilitate nearby houses.

And they say they have been flexible after the hurricanes, reducing the hours of required sweat equity, for example, and allowing musicians to use performance records rather than pay stubs to prove income.

Along the Gulf Coast, those fortunate enough to qualify for Habitat housing call it a blessing. Sylvia Ragan, a dialysis technician, is moving into a house here on Union Street after living in a trailer for 18 months with her daughter, Denetra Shelley, who is 11.

"I couldn't pay anybody for the blood, sweat and tears that went into this house," Ms. Ragan said. "I will cherish this forever."

Post-Katrina Baton Rouge Struggles With Its Identity (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0135204

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BATON ROUGE — The tables are dressed in crisp, white linen. Many of the signature dishes that made Galatoire's restaurant an institution on New Orleans' Bourbon Street — the Oysters Rockefeller, the Salad Maison, the Trout Amandine — are on the menu.

But outside this Galatoire's, there's no bawdy street scene. Instead, Galatoire's Bistro — opened hastily in late 2005 after the flooding from Hurricane Katrina forced the Bourbon Street location to close for several months — is the unlikely anchor of a shopping center in suburban Baton Rouge.

It's a taste of New Orleans wrapped in suburban sprawl, a symbol of the post-Katrina migration that continues to redefine daily life in this city 80 miles northwest of New Orleans. Perhaps no other city was affected more by the hundreds of thousands of people who fled New Orleans after Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005. Within days, Baton Rouge, a city of 225,000, was an overwhelmed mass of about 500,000.

Many evacuees were just passing through, but city officials say that today, Baton Rouge's population remains 275,000-325,000. From the Los Angeles-style gridlock on Interstate 10 to the overcrowded schools and the escalating real estate prices that have fueled a housing crunch, Baton Rouge has the look and feel of a place grappling for control of its direction.

And although the influx of new residents hasn't dramatically increased crime rates, many residents sense that Baton Rouge has lost some of the small-city civility it enjoyed during what they call "Pre-K" — before Katrina. Last spring, a Louisiana State University survey examining Katrina's impact found that 30% of Baton Rouge residents believed that "rude and unfriendly" people were a serious problem in the city.

Residents' most common complaint? The traffic, by far. More than two-thirds of those surveyed by LSU said it was a serious problem.

Baton Rouge's population has reached the mark that pre-Katrina projections estimated for the year 2030. Government officials say their planning for a range of projects has had to be accelerated by up to a quarter-century.

Since Katrina, voters have approved a $500 million road-building plan that is being funded by sales tax receipts. Meanwhile, the police department is scrambling to add 100 officers to its 600-member force at a time when police and fire units are being stretched by emergency calls.

The expansion of public safety units is being funded by a benefit of Baton Rouge's growth: a $25 million surplus from sales tax revenue from 2005 and 2006.

The financial picture isn't as clear in the Ascension Parish and East Baton Rouge Parish school systems, which need dozens of buildings to handle the addition of more than 4,000 students since Katrina. It's unclear when the schools could be built or how they'd be funded.

"We'll never be the Baton Rouge we were prior to Katrina," Mayor Melvin "Kip" Holden says.

Evacuees "changed the landscape of this region forever," Baton Rouge police Sgt. Don Kelly says. "None of us really knows what the long-term impact will be."

The message on the electronic billboard on westbound I-10 on a recent afternoon warned drivers that a 3-mile stretch toward downtown would take nearly 20 minutes to travel.

On Baton Rouge-area highways and roads where congestion was rare less than two years ago, lengthy, grind-it-out trips often are the norm — regardless of the time of day.

To make sure she arrives at her Postal Service job in New Orleans for the start of her 11 p.m. shift, hurricane transplant Kathleen Lucien sometimes leaves her home in Baton Rouge at 8 p.m.

Unlike many other urban areas, Baton Rouge does not have a highway loop around it to help ease congestion on local streets.

Holden credits his election in November 2004 to a campaign that emphasized transportation improvements. However, it wasn't until after Katrina that voters approved the $500 million plan to improve roads. Three dozen congestion spots are targeted for improvements; about 80% of the work will be done in the next decade.

Holden says the city needs at least another $1 billion to rebuild 50 miles of the sewer system, build and fix sidewalks and expand I-10.

"The city has changed," Holden says, adding that state and federal assistance will be needed.

Ascension Parish schools Superintendent Donald Songy says he'll never forget the scene at Dutchtown Middle School when students returned to the suburban Baton Rouge campus after the summer break last September.

The first day of school always involves some chaos, Songy says, but this was ridiculous. Nearly 2,000 children converged on a campus that normally had about 1,100. A gym was converted into three sixth-grade classrooms.

"We got hit with 10 years of growth overnight," Songy says.

DOJ_NMG_0135205

Before Katrina, school officials in Ascension Parish had estimated the area's deliberate growth would put their system's enrollment at about 16,000 students from 2010 to 2015. In the fall of 2006, a year after Katrina, 18,000 students were registered in Ascension Parish schools. Songy says the growth occurred so quickly that the "personality of the district" changed instantly, from rural to "booming suburbia."

Next year, the first of five new schools is scheduled to open. Songy says that even if it could open now, it would be overcrowded.

A similar surge in enrollment occurred in the urban East Baton Rouge Parish school system, on a much larger scale.

After Katrina, enrollment jumped from 46,212 to 52,923. It has declined since then, as some families who fled New Orleans for Baton Rouge have moved on. Enrollment in East Baton Rouge Parish now is about 48,465, Superintendent Charlotte Placide says.

To help the school system handle the growth, Placide says, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) built 78 temporary classrooms on 39 campuses. Placide reopened two schools that had been closed. She says that when the schools opened less than a month after Katrina, every student and teacher in them was an evacuee.

The FEMA classrooms helped, but Placide says the district needs more permanent buildings. She says that even if more classroom space can be arranged, she worries about the system's ability to help students scarred by the trauma surrounding the flooding and evacuation of New Orleans.

"Many of these children had difficult experiences in that hurricane," she says. "How that will play out as they get older, I don't know. I'm concerned about the unknown."

When the first wave of evacuees washed into Baton Rouge, fear spread across the city, Kelly says. There were reports — nearly all false — of looting, rioting and armed gang members running wild, he says.

"There was a genuine fear that the city would be overrun," Mayor Holden says.

To Holden's relief, fears that Katrina evacuees would spark a sustained crime wave in Baton Rouge have not been realized.

The month after the storm, robberies and car thefts did rise by nearly 50%, according to Baton Rouge police records. Homicides increased from 47 in 2004 to 56 last year, but given the rise in Baton Rouge's population, the total from 2006 actually represented a lower homicide rate per capita than the city had the year before Katrina.

The experience has been different in other cities with significant numbers of hurricane evacuees —notably Houston, where an estimated 150,000 evacuees fled. Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt says his department linked evacuees to 24% of the slayings there during the first five months of 2006.

In Baton Rouge, Kelly says, perhaps a few of the 56 slayings last year involved evacuees. "There is a perception to this day that evacuees are driving (an) increase in crime," he says. "That is not necessarily so."

Kelly says there is anecdotal evidence that evacuees who settled in Baton Rouge were likely to have family or friends here, perhaps making the evacuees less likely to resort to crime than those who went elsewhere. Even so, the police department is rushing to boost personnel to keep up with the demands of the population increase. The 100 new cops planned for the department will be hired over the next four years.

The hiring is "related to the population increase," Kelly says. "We're still seeing growth."

In Springbrook, a new subdivision of homes southeast of Baton Rouge, move-in days have a non-traditional look.

Many buyers show up to take possession of their new homes without any moving vans or trucks loaded with furniture. Eric Dudley, a salesman for KB Homes, says that generally, a car pulls up with all of a family's possessions packed in a few suitcases or plastic bags.

"A lot of the people we see are people who have lost everything," Dudley says. "They are just trying to get their lives back together."

At least 40% of the people moving into the 55-acre development were displaced by the storm, says Clint Szubinski, KB's Gulf Coast region president. Those who settle there are fortunate: Because of the rising demand for homes here, prices are escalating beyond the reach of many potential buyers, creating what real estate analysts say is a crisis in affordable housing.

The average home price in East Baton Rouge Parish in 2006 was $15,000 more than in 2005. In Ascension Parish, the average home price was $201,846 last year, up from $161,673 in 2005.

Rents increased after the storm by about 12%, according to D. Wesley Moore, an adjunct professor at LSU's Real Estate Research Institute. Before the storm, a typical two-bedroom apartment rented for $627 per month. Afterward, the average was $703.

David McKey, incoming president of the Baton Rouge Board of Realtors, says the most urgent need is for affordable homes costing $100,000-$150,000. The city's goal is to boost the supply of such housing by 5,000 units within five years.

DOJ_NMG_0135206

In Springbrook, where homes sell for $160,000-$180,000, the price was right for Kathleen Lucien, her daughter, Nina, and Lucien's 6-year-old grandson, Jadon, all formerly of New Orleans' heavily damaged 9th Ward. Lucien says she bought in Baton Rouge so "we'll never have to run from a hurricane again."

She still thinks of rebuilding her home in New Orleans, if she can reach a settlement with her insurance company. On her daily commute to and from New Orleans, she often drives by her old place. "A lot of people I know are staying here," Lucien says. "The people of Baton Rouge greeted us with open arms, mostly. I like it in Baton Rouge. But I still love New Orleans."

WAR NEWS:

Britain To Remove 1,600 Troops From Iraq By Spring (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

LONDON -- Britain's decision to pull 1,600 troops out of Iraq by spring, touted by U.S. and British leaders as a turning point in Iraqi sovereignty, was widely seen Wednesday as a telling admission that the British military can no longer sustain simultaneous wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

The British military is approaching "operational failure," former Defense Staff chief Lord Charles Guthrie warned this week.

"Because the British army is in essence fighting a far more intensive counterinsurgency war in Afghanistan, there's been a realization that there has to be some sort of transfer of resources form Iraq to Afghanistan," said Clive Jones, a senior lecturer in Middle East politics at the University of Leeds, who has closely followed Britain's Iraq deployment.

"It's either that, or you risk in some ways losing both," he said. "It's the classic case of 'Let's declare victory and get out.' "

Prime Minister Tony Blair's government has been pressed to add 800 new troops to Afghanistan to halt a resurgent Taliban and a worrying escalation of drug trafficking, at the same time that it is beset by criticism for joining the United States in an unpopular invasion and prolonged war in Iraq.

The decision to draw down forces by more than 20 percent in the southern city of Basra means that Britain will significantly shrink its military footprint at a time when the Pentagon is increasing U.S. forces to battle militants to the north, in Baghdad and Anbar province.

The Bush administration hastened to present the British decision as an indication that the U.S.-led military operation was succeeding. Vice President Dick Cheney called the reduction "an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," and White House press secretary Tony Snow said the U.S.-led coalition "remains intact" despite a roster that has fallen from 35 countries in 2004 to 25 now.

But the Pentagon, in its most recent quarterly report to Congress, listed Basra as one of five cities outside Baghdad where violence remained "significant," and said the region is one of only two that are "not ready for transition" to Iraqi authorities.

Once a promising beacon, Basra suffers from sectarian violence as well as Shiite militia clashes over oil smuggling. Ferocious street battles have broken out between rival Shiite groups in provincial capitals such as Samawa, Kut and Diwaniyah over the last year.

Democratic leaders in Congress denounced the Bush assessment as misleading.

"No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. "This should be a wake up call to the administration. Prime Minister Blair's announced redeployment of British troops is a stunning rejection of President Bush's high-risk Iraq policy."

U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said the British decision "confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people" about the decision to boost the U.S. force.

"The president's escalation plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq is out of step with the American people and our allies," Pelosi said in a written statement. "Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?"

In Britain, Blair's opponents quickly painted the withdrawal as an admission of failure. "The unpalatable truth is that we will leave behind a country on the brink of civil war, in which reconstruction has stalled and corruption is endemic, and a region that is a lot less stable than it was in 2003," Liberal Democratic leader Menzies Campbell said in Wednesday's parliament debate on the troop drawdown.

"That is a long way short of the beacon of democracy in the Middle East that was promised some four years ago," he said.

For Blair, the decision to begin reducing Britain's 7,100 troops in the south to 5,500, with possible further withdrawals later in the year, was almost a political necessity. His Labor Party is trailing in the polls ahead of crucial regional elections in the spring, and Blair is preparing to hand over the country later this year to his likely successor, chancellor of the exchequer Gordon Brown, who favors a phase-out of Britain's deployment in Iraq.

In announcing the troop reductions, Blair said they coincide with the increasing assumption of security responsibilities by Iraqi military and police forces. He said British troops will continue to patrol the border with Iran and remain at their main base in Basra through at least 2008, to assist Iraqi forces if needed.

"It is important to show the Iraqi people that we do not desire our forces to remain any longer than they are needed; but whilst they are needed, we will be at their side," Blair told Parliament.

Most analysts say the prime minister's assertion that significant progress has been made in securing southern Iraq stretches facts on the ground. Though the south is not nearly as violent and chaotic as the capital and the Sunni heartland, it remains jittery, unstable and frequently bloody. Shiite militias and armed gangs lord over cities like Basra and Amara, as well as the long desolate stretches of roadway through the marshlands and deserts of the south.

British bases in Basra regularly come under mortar fire. British troops engage in almost daily gunfights with militiamen. In recent months, the British offices all but evacuated their downtown base and moved to a more secure site on the grounds of the city's airport.

A study on the south issued this week by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, a think tank that has been sympathetic to the administration's foreign policy goals, describes southern Iraq in dire terms. It notes that Basra itself, once one of Iraq's more liberal and cosmopolitan cities, has become a bastion for Islamists who use the south's vast oil wealth to "fill their war chests."

"The province has suffered one of the worst reversals of fortune of any area in Iraq since the fall of Saddam's regime," said the report.

Times staff writers Borzou Daragahi in Baghdad, and James Gerstenzang, Paul Richter and Peter Spiegel in Washington contributed to this report.

Ally's Timing Is Awkward For Bush (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

As the British announced the beginning of their departure from Iraq yesterday, President Bush's top foreign policy aide proclaimed it "basically a good-news story." Yet for an already besieged White House, the decision was doing a good job masquerading as a bad-news story.

What national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley meant was that the British believe they have made enough progress in southern Iraq to turn over more of their sector to Iraqi forces. To many back in Washington, though, what resonated was that Bush's main partner in Iraq is starting to get out just as the president is sending in more U.S. troops.

No matter the military merits, the British move, followed by a similar announcement by Denmark, roiled the political debate in Washington at perhaps the worst moment for the White House. Democrats seized on the news as evidence that Bush's international coalition is collapsing and that the United States is increasingly alone in a losing cause. Even some Republicans, and, in private, White House aides, agreed that the announcement sent an ill-timed message to the American public.

"What I'm worried about is that the American public will be quite perplexed by the president adding forces while our principal ally is subtracting forces," said Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), a longtime war supporter who opposes Bush's troop increase. "That is the burden we are being left with here."

The notion that the British pullback actually signals success sounds like bad spin, added Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). "I think it's Alice in Wonderland looking through the looking glass," he said.

White House officials said they had known for a while that the British were moving in this direction and that Prime Minister Tony Blair informed Bush of his decision during a secure videoconference Tuesday. But the rest of Washington was taken by surprise, and Republicans were put back on their heels, just as they were beginning to feel more confident that the fight over war strategy was shifting their way.

The House last week approved a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's planned deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Baghdad and Anbar province in western Iraq. But Republicans have since been on offense, hammering a House Democratic plan that would tie war funding in a supplemental spending bill to strict new standards for resting, equipping and training troops.

The strategy, championed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and endorsed in principle by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), was supposed to neutralize GOP charges that Democrats plan to "de-fund" the war, while forcing Republicans to defend the deployment of troops who are not rated fully trained and equipped. But Republicans labeled it a "slow bleed" strategy that would leave troops in harm's way by blocking their reinforcements.

Vice President Cheney was the latest to jump on Murtha's plan, yesterday calling it "a huge mistake" and a "policy of defeat" that would embolden terrorists.

"If we were to do what Speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all we'll do is validate the al-Qaeda strategy," he told ABC News in Japan, where he is traveling. "The al-Qaeda strategy is to break the will of the American people."

Pelosi bristled at the attack, issuing a statement complaining that Cheney was besmirching her patriotism and calling on Bush to "repudiate and distance himself from the Vice President's remark."

The news of Britain's partial withdrawal, though, swamped the funding debate for at least a day. "The timing of the British announcement is very unfortunate," said Nile Gardiner, a scholar at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "The British decision is going to be used as a political football by opponents of the president's Iraq plan."

Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.) said the move will undercut Republicans in Congress trying to stave off attempts to limit what Bush can do in Iraq.

"It's probably not going to bode well for those of us who want to make a case against what Murtha and Pelosi plan for the supplemental," LaHood said. "It does not help."

Blair's announcement could also boost calls by Democrats and some Republicans for a serious change in Iraq policy -- not just in the number of troops fighting but also in what those troops should do. The British plan to withdraw 2,100 of 7,100 troops by summer's end and to redeploy the remainder away from combat toward more training of Iraqi troops and patrolling the Iranian border. That mirrors bipartisan Senate proposals for U.S. forces that are spelled out in two stalled nonbinding resolutions, including one co-sponsored by Warner.

"What the British are doing, and what we really need to do, is to tease out the cultural complexities of this thing," said Rep. Wayne T. Gilchrest (R-Md.). "On the one hand, they are signaling to all the Iraqi people, whatever sect they are -- Sunnis, Shias, Kurds -- they are not going to be an occupying force. That's a powerful signal to send. And the other signal is that they are passing the torch to the Iraqis, who are the only ones who can handle this ancient -- I'd say primitive -- sectarian dispute."

The White House argued that comparing the British situation in Basra and the U.S. position in Baghdad fundamentally distorts reality. The south, where the British have been in charge, has no Sunni insurgency and far less violence than Baghdad or Anbar. The coalition plan all along has been to pull out foreign troops when an area is ready for Iraqi control, the White House said.

"The fact that they have made some progress on the ground is going to enable them to move some of the forces out, and that's ultimately the kind of thing that we want to be able to see throughout Iraq," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. He said no consideration was given to asking the British to instead redeploy those departing troops to help their U.S. counterparts in Baghdad or Anbar.

Hadley, speaking to reporters in Brussels, where he was traveling, said he did not mean to suggest the British departure signals "an unalloyed picture of progress," but he rejected a more negative interpretation. "I didn't want people to think it reflected a lack of confidence by the British in the mission or a turning away from the mission," he said. "It is not."

Still, other administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity so they could talk candidly about political strategy, expressed frustration that the British decision will look bad to everyday Americans, and acknowledged that it will provide ammunition to domestic opponents.

"It's a brick in the hands of folks who want to take cheap shots," one official said. "But I think it's unfair."

Britain To Withdraw Troops In 'Coming Months' (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 22, 2007

LONDON — Prime Minister Tony Blair said Wednesday that Britain will pull 1,600 of its 7,100 troops in Iraq out of the southern part of the country in coming months.

ON DEADLINE: How Fleet Street is covering the news of Brits and Danes pulling out | AUDIO

The number could be cut even more — to below 5,000 — by August if Iraqi forces demonstrate that they have secured the southern part of the country, he said.

However, Blair said, British forces would remain in Iraq into next year or "for as long as we are wanted and have a job to do."

This is the first time that Britain has set a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, although Blair has said that British troops would pull out when Iraqi army and police were able to maintain order themselves. Britain had 9,000 troops in Iraq two years ago.

The British withdrawal comes as President Bush is sending 21,500 U.S. troops to try to secure the violence-racked area around Baghdad farther north.

DOJ_NMG_0135209

In Najaf, a Shiite holy city about 95 miles south of Baghdad, a suicide car bomber struck a police checkpoint today, killing at least 13 people. Najaf is in the spiritual heartland of the militia factions led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Blair and Bush talked by secure video link Tuesday about the proposals, U.S. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said. Bush views Britain's troop cutbacks as "a sign of success" in Iraq, he said.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow, on a trip with Bush to Tennessee, said Britain's decision was not made on a timeline of the sort the president has rejected for American troops. "What you had is progress first, and then the removal," Snow said.

"The president's made clear all along, we want to move as rapidly as we can to build capability on the part of the Iraqis so they can in fact assume, first, primary responsibility and then eventually sole responsibility," he said.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said there was no thought that the British were abandoning the United States when it is struggling to send thousands more troops into Iraq. He said the British "have been steadfast allies in Iraq and they will continue to be."

Blair's announcement, made in a noon-hour speech in the House of Commons, followed an earlier announcement by Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen that Denmark was withdrawing its 460 troops from southern Iraq.

The Danish force, which has been under British command, will pull out in August, Rasmussen said.

Lithuania, too, said it was "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said.

In Tokyo, Vice President Dick Cheney called Blair's announcement good news. "I look at it and see it is actually an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Cheney told ABC News.

In Berlin, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said today that the U.S.-led coalition of international forces in Iraq is still intact.

"The coalition remains intact and in fact the British will have thousands of soldiers deployed in Iraq in the south," she said at a joint news conference with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier. "It is the plan that as it is possible to transfer responsibility to the Iraqis, that coalition forces would no longer be needed in those circumstances," she said.

Blair said the withdrawal was possible because the Iraqi army and police have increasingly demonstrated that they can secure and patrol most of the Basra area. That allows British troops to pull back into a supporting role and allow the size of force to be reduced.

On Tuesday, Britain handed over control of an Iraqi army division based in Basra. The 10th Iraqi Army Division, which was trained by British troops, now takes its orders from Iraqi military commanders in Baghdad.

Violence in Basra has decreased in recent months. Basra province is experiencing 5 attacks a day, opposed to nearly 40 a day for Baghdad, according to the latest Defense Department quarterly report.The biggest threat in Basra, and the south in general, is escalating Shia-on-Shia violence between rival Shia militias.

British defense analyst Eric Grove saw both military and political pressure behind the announcement, which he says represents the beginning of the end of British military presence in Iraq.

The Ministry of Defense, he said, is under pressure with troops deployed both in Iraq and Afghanistan. To ease it, military commanders have pushed hard in the last year to build up and train Iraqi army and police so that it could draw down its troops there and reinforce those in Afghanistan.

"We do want to run down the commitment (in Iraq), if for no other reason than our commitment in Afghanistan," said Grove, director of the Center for International Security and War Studies at the University of Salford in Manchester.

At the same time, he said, Blair would like to draw down the number of troops in Iraq before elections in Scotland in May and before his likely successor, Chancellor Gordon Brown, takes over.

Brown has said he would like to see troop levels in Iraq reduced by several thousand by the end of this year.

Democrats Seize On UK Troop Cuts (FT)

By James Blitz, Daniel Dombey And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The Bush administration on Wednesday welcomed Tony Blair's decision to withdraw nearly a quarter of the British troops in Iraq over the next few months, saying the move showed that in parts of the country "things are going pretty well".

But although the British prime minister told parliament that the withdrawal of 1,600 troops would allow Iraqis to "write the next chapter in their history", prominent Democrats in Congress said the move was a sign that Britain was now giving up on the US in Iraq and contrasted it with the surge in US troop numbers deployed to contain the violence in Baghdad.

Mr Blair announced to parliament that the 7,100 troops serving in Basra would be cut to 5,500 "over the coming months", with hopes that 500 more would leave as early as late summer.

Mr Blair said that some soldiers stationed at Basra air base would remain into 2008 to help secure supply routes, the Iran border and to support Iraqi forces.

Downing Street officials said the decision to cut troop numbers to 5,500 was broadly in line with plans drawn up by the Ministry of Defence at the end of last year.

However, there were strong indications earlier this year that the British had initially been looking to announce a deeper cut at this stage – to about 4,500 troops. Some British officials concede that these plans have been disrupted by the continuing violence in Basra.

Mr Blair on Wednesday admitted that "the problems remain formidable" in the south of Iraq.

"What all of this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be but the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by the Iraqis," he said.

In Washington, meanwhile, the White House and leading Democrats differed fiercely over the implications of the UK move.

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, said the British "have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole which is to be able to transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqis as conditions permit". But Edward Kennedy, a senior Democratic senator, said the British redeployment was a "stunning rejection" of the president's decision to increase US troop numbers around Baghdad by 21,500.

"No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq," Mr Kennedy said.

Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the UK move "weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US".

"This is a war of perceptions, as well as military power, and the influence of British cuts will be negative," said Mr Cordesman. "The British cuts will in many ways simply reflect the political reality that the British 'lost' the south more than a year ago. The Shia will take over, Iranian influence will probably expand, and more Sunni, Christians, and other minorities will leave."

Rice Calls Iraq Coalition 'Intact' (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The Bush administration maintained yesterday that its Iraq coalition was still in good shape despite announcements by Britain and two other countries that they would withdraw all or some of their troops by the end of the year.

"The coalition remains intact," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said during a visit to Berlin. "It is the plan that -- as it is possible to transfer responsibilities to the Iraqis -- coalition forces would no longer be needed."

Miss Rice spoke just hours after British Prime Minister Tony Blair announced in Parliament that Britain would cut 1,600 troops from its 7,100-strong force in southern Iraq in the coming months.

He said several hundred more could come home by late summer if conditions permit. There were 40,000 British troops in Iraq when the war began, and roughly 9,000 in place two years ago.

Denmark said it planned to withdraw its 460 troops from southern Iraq by August. A Lithuanian Defense Ministry spokeswoman said her country was "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from the same area in August.

The United States put the best face on the announcements, declaring the withdrawals were evidence of the improved security situation in southern Iraq.

But analysts on both sides of the Atlantic disagreed.

British military analysts said the decision to reduce troops in Basra was not warranted by conditions on the ground. Rather, they cited domestic politics, an overstretched military and fears of being caught in a struggle between the United States and Iran.

Mr. Blair's decision, said Toby Dodge of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, was based on his desire "to clear the decks so that he is remembered for something a bit better that the invasion of Iraq and its bloody aftermath.

"This 'mission accomplished' stuff is rubbish. Basra is incredibly dangerous," said Mr. Dodge.

The troop cut also reduces the likelihood that Prince Harry, son of Prince Charles and third in line to the throne, will find himself as a soldier in Iraq.

The prince, a second lieutenant in the Household Cavalry, reportedly has threatened to quit the military if his unit is sent to Iraq without him in April. But military brass worry that he would become a "bullet magnet" for insurgents hoping to make a public relations splash.

Mr. Blair said Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki had agreed to his plan, under which British troops will remain at least through next year, increasingly focusing on support and training of Iraqi forces.

If those forces show themselves capable of maintaining order, he said, the British commitment could fall to fewer than 5,000 troops by late summer.

DOJ_NMG_0135211

British army Maj. Chris Ormond-King, a spokesman for the British-led multinational force based in Basra, said in a briefing last month that the overwhelmingly Shi'ite Muslim south did not have the same sectarian problems that have spurred fighting in Baghdad and other parts of the country.

"The militias are not a problem for us," he told reporters traveling with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates. "What is a problem are some of the rogue elements in those militias."

He acknowledged that a small British garrison in the heart of Basra is routinely hit by mortar fire and small arms attacks from groups protesting the multinational force's presence in the country.

In addition to the political pressures, Mr. Dodge said, the British army "is incredibly overstretched" and can no longer effectively operate both in Iraq and Afghanistan at the same time.

"They are wonderful soldiers who are grievously understaffed and underfunded, stretched way too thin and with almost no modern equipment to speak of," agreed Robert Killebrew, a U.S. national security analyst who follows Iraq closely.

British troops have obligations around the world, and have a significant presence in Afghanistan, where they are working with U.S. and NATO troops to beat back the Taliban and create a viable Afghan state.

Mr. Dodge said that behind closed doors in the British Foreign Office, there was a strong sense that the attacks against British troops in southern Iraq were backed by Iran, rather than the result of the local security situation.

Maj. Ormond-King said Iran's influence was palpable among Shi'ite groups in the south, who are receiving money, logistical help, military training and arms.

Washington has accused elements of the Iranian government of providing radical Shi'ite militias with sophisticated bomb technology that has killed some 170 U.S. soldiers.

If tensions between the United States and Iran were to worsen and Washington decided to attack Iranian facilities, British forces in southern Iraq would be on the front lines of any Iranian retribution, Maj. Ormond-King said.

Mr. Dodge said there was "the real fear that British troops will get caught between the United States and Tehran on this."

Iraqi forces have already taken over from British-led troops in two of the south's four provinces. Plans to transfer control of a third province, Maysan, have been put on hold over recent security concerns.

But Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the British had long ago lost the political fight and ceded Basra and Maysan to Shi'ite Islamist factions.

"The British were not defeated in a military sense, but lost in the political sense if 'victory' means securing the southeast for the central government and some form of national unity," Mr. Cordesman said.

Democrats Seize On British Iraq Withdrawal Plan (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 22, 2007

Congressional Democrats, seizing on an announcement from Great Britain that it would begin withdrawing troops from Iraq, said Wednesday that the White House should take a cue from its closest ally and get U.S. soldiers out of Iraq instead of sending in more.

"Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?" asked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) after Britain's Prime Minister Tony Blair announced earlier Wednesday that a large part of the British force would withdraw from southern Iraq.

Blair said 1,600 of the 7,100 soldiers would withdraw in the coming months, with further troop reductions already planned later this year. He added that Iraqis would be able to take care of their own security in areas where British soldiers were stationed. Denmark also announced that it would withdraw its smaller contingent, which is working in cooperation with the British.

"The president's escalation plan has been rejected by bipartisan majorities in the House and Senate and opposed by Americans all across the country," Pelosi said, referring to votes last week in the House and the Senate. "The announcement by the British government confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people about the president's decision to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq."

But the administration said Blair's announcement is welcome news because it shows that Iraqis are increasingly able to take care of their own security needs.

"It indicates that there's been some progress in Basra," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters aboard Air Force One. "The fact that there has been progress in a couple of areas - one is training up Iraqis to take over some of the responsibilities that the Brits and the Danes have been handling within Basra - has made it possible for Britain to remove some of the forces."

DOJ_NMG_0135212

In an interview with ABC News, Vice President Cheney, who is traveling in Asia, said he sees Britain's plan as "an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well."

But Democrats offered a different take on Britain's decision.

Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) said, "America's leading ally in Iraq has decided that a timetable for the phased redeployment of troops is the only responsible policy to help force Iraqis to stand up for Iraq."

Kerry has decided not to seek the presidency again in 2008 and instead said he would focus his energy on getting U.S. troops out of Iraq. "After years of touting Prime Minister Blair's resolve, the [Bush] administration should now pay attention to his new policy," Kerry stated, adding it is "inexplicable" why Bush is seeking to send additional troops to Iraq at this time.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said the decisions by Britain and Denmark "leaves us increasingly isolated in Iraq," adding that "the coalition, which was never sufficiently robust to begin with, has all but disappeared."

Democrats Hail British Pullout (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Democrats yesterday cheered the news that Britain will begin withdrawing troops from Iraq as proof that the rest of the word sees reducing troops as the best solution to the war, but the White House defended the action as a sign of how well things are going.

"The British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair announced he will bring home 1,600 of Britain's 7,100 troops now serving in Iraq in the next few months. Meanwhile, Denmark announced plans to withdraw its troops, which number in the hundreds, this summer. Lithuania also is considering withdrawing its contingent of dozens of troops.

Acknowledging that Basra, where British forces are stationed, is not "how we want it to be," Mr. Blair said the time is ripe to let the Iraqis take over security.

The move is bound to get wrapped up in the debate in Congress.

Last week, the House passed a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan to send 4,000 more Marines to Anbar province to pursue al Qaeda terrorists, and about 17,500 soldiers to Baghdad to try to end sectarian violence. Republicans have blocked a similar resolution in the Senate.

Democrats argued that Mr. Blair's decision proved the major U.S. partner in Iraq has come to the conclusion that the way to prod Iraq is with fewer troops, not more.

"America's leading ally in Iraq has decided that a timetable for the phased redeployment of troops is the only responsible policy to help force Iraqis to stand up for Iraq," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. "After years of touting Prime Minister Blair's resolve, the administration should now pay attention to his new policy."

Although Mr. Blair said his troops are leaving without having accomplished what they had hoped, the White House said it was a good sign.

"What I see is an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Vice President Dick Cheney, traveling in Japan, told ABC News.

Mr. Cheney said a friend, "a guy who knows the region very well," recently drove from Baghdad to Basra and "found the situation dramatically improved compared with where it was a year or so ago, sort of validated the British view that they have made progress in southern Iraq, and that they can therefore afford to reduce their force posture."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said the British are basing their decision on benchmarks, not timetables.

He ruled out asking British troops to transfer to Baghdad or Anbar province to help ease the burden on U.S. troops.

"There has been a division of labor within Iraq and people do have separate responsibilities," he said.

Britain Cuts Its Losses (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

Spin it any way you like, Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement that Britain will be withdrawing up to 1,600 of its 7,100 remaining troops in Iraq can't be welcome military or political news for President Bush.

This isn't the first reduction in the British contingent, which originally numbered 40,000. But it comes at a time of spiraling violence in Iraq and emboldened opposition in Washington to Mr. Bush's disastrous war. It also comes as Mr. Blair is preparing to leave office, painfully aware that popular fury over the war threatens to overwhelm his entire legacy.

The British announcement has already served as the catalyst for other departures. Denmark, with 460 troops under British command, announced yesterday that it would leave by August. With the Pentagon already straining to find enough soldiers for

Iraq, a troop drawdown by its most militarily capable ally can only add to the strain — and to the clamor for bringing American forces home as well.

The White House strove to cast Mr. Blair's political necessity as a sign of "some progress in Basra," Iraq's second-largest city, which British forces have had military responsibility for since the invasion. Vice President Dick Cheney — even more disconnected from reality — chimed in that the British pullback shows that there are some parts of Iraq where "things are going pretty well."

Mr. Blair knows better, and candidly acknowledged that Basra is not "how we want it to be," but said that it was time for the Iraqis to write "the next chapter in Basra's history." Mr. Blair also insisted that the situation there is "very different from Baghdad," where, he said, an "orgy of terrorism" has been unleashed — his out-the-door endorsement for President Bush's troop buildup in the capital.

But if there is comparatively more calm in Basra, that is only because the outnumbered British forces have ceded control to Shiite sectarian militias and local police forces controlled by rival armed factions.

Just two months ago, British and Iraqi soldiers stormed a Basra police station, rescuing 127 prisoners from what British officials said was almost certain execution. There is so far little evidence that Iraq's national armed forces on their own will be able to protect Basra's innocent civilians or even that they mean to try.

Whether it is Basra with fewer British troops or Baghdad with more Americans, nothing in Iraq is "going pretty well."

Lithuania Mulling Iraq Troop Withdrawal (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

Lithuania is "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said Wednesday.

Defense Ministry spokeswoman Ruta Apeitkyte told The Associated Press that the Baltic country was considering not replacing the contingent when its mission ends in August.

It was the first time that Lithuania, a staunch U.S. ally, indicated it would reduce its commitment in Iraq.

Blair Plans To Withdraw 1,600 Troops From Iraq (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 21 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday that 1,600 British troops would return home from Iraq in the coming months and that a further 500 soldiers may be withdrawn by the end of summer.

Even though Britain has only 7,100 troops in Iraq, compared with the 135,000-strong U.S. contingent, they carry symbolic importance as the largest allied presence. British forces make up half of the roughly 14,000 non-U.S. troops in the coalition in Iraq.

Vice President Cheney, in an interview with ABC News during a visit to Tokyo, called the planned withdrawal "an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well." Democratic leaders noted, however, that the British are withdrawing as President Bush is sending an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq.

Iraqi leaders generally welcomed the withdrawal plan, although Sunni officials said they feared the departure of British troops from Shiite-dominated southern Iraq would lead to increased sectarian violence that Iraqi security forces would be unable to stop.

Blair's plans allow him in the final months of his administration to show a measure of independence from Washington on Iraq policy. Battered in public opinion polls because of his support of the war, Blair has said he will step down by September.

At the same time Blair was speaking in London, the Danish prime minister, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, announced in Denmark that its 460 troops under British command in Iraq will return home by August. In Lithuania, a Defense Ministry spokeswoman said the country is "seriously considering" withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq in August.

Blair said the British reduction in troops was possible because security conditions were better in southern Iraq, where British troops patrol, than in Baghdad, where many U.S. troops are located. He said that "80 to 90 percent of the violence" is in Baghdad, which is enduring an "orgy of terrorism."

British troops just completed an operation to turn over control of security to Iraqi forces in the southern city of Basra, Blair said. "What all of this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be. But it does mean that the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis," he said.

But military and political analysts disputed Blair's upbeat description of the situation in the Basra area. They also said they believed the timing of the British drawdown may have more to do with plunging polls for Blair's Labor Party, pressure from British military officials and Blair's desire to begin an endgame for Iraq before he leaves office.

DOJ_NMG_0135214

A poll this week showed that only 29 percent of respondents would vote for Labor, while 42 percent favored the opposition Conservative Party, the worst showing by Labor since 1992.

British military leaders are increasingly complaining of overstretched forces and low morale, and there has been growing military pressure on Blair to reduce the presence, said Michael Williams, head of the transatlantic program at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies.

"While the British zone is much quieter," he said, the Basra area "still has a number of security issues" and it "is foolhardy" to believe that Iraqi forces are ready to assume total control of the area. He also noted that if Blair had the political will, he could deploy some troops to help out the Americans in Baghdad instead of sending them home.

Coalition troops have handed over security control to the Iraqis in three southern provinces: Najaf, Muthanna and Dhi Qar. The 15 other provinces are still under the control of U.S.-led forces. American military officials have said they expect the Iraqis to take operational control of all Iraqi army divisions by this summer and to take security control in all provinces by fall.

"The Iraqi government feels very comfortable about the southern provinces and especially Basra; we have good security forces there," said Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Askari said he expects that after two months, the British troops will have moved out of the city center, restricting themselves to their bases, and that by the end of August 2008 there will be a full withdrawal of British troops.

"Now, the Iraqi security forces are not prepared. There will be a big security gap" when the British leave, said Naseer al-Ani, a Sunni member of parliament.

Ani and other Iraqi politicians saw the general trend of departing Western troops, whom they consider occupiers, as beneficial in the long term.

"Originally, the British forces, the American forces were coming to solve the situation and then they will leave. But we've seen the opposite: Wherever they stay for a long time . . . the situation keeps getting worse and worse," he said.

Iraqi forces in some cases have relied on coalition troops to bail them out in areas under their responsibility. In late January, a month after Iraqis took control of Najaf province, the Iraqi army needed the help of U.S. air support and ground troops to defeat an armed Shiite cult.

Still, officials in Najaf, which has a population of about 1.4 million people, said the departure of U.S. troops has been a political benefit.

"When the multinational forces were in Najaf, we had a lot of legal violations," said Najaf's governor, Asad Sultan Abu Gillel. Military operations were "carried out without legal notification, without an order from a judge," he said.

"This caused many problems for us with the local people," Abu Gillel said. "We live in a country filled with problems and terrorism, but at least we have full control."

At top strength, Britain had 40,000 troops in Iraq during the 2003 invasion. As of Feb. 9, 132 British military personnel in Iraq had died or were missing and believed killed since the invasion, said Lt. Col. Simon Etherington, a British military spokesman in Baghdad.

Blair declined to give any clear date for total withdrawal, saying the remaining troops would stay "into 2008 or as long as we are wanted and have a job to do." He added, "Increasingly, our role will be supporting and training, and our numbers will be able to reduce accordingly." He delivered his speech in the House of Commons.

Conservative leader David Cameron embraced the cuts, saying, "That news will be welcomed in this House, in the country and especially to the families of those serving in Iraq over the coming months."

Liberal Democrat leader Menzies Campbell, whose party opposed the war, said: "The unpalatable truth, Mr. Speaker, is this: that we will leave behind a country on the brink of civil war, where reconstruction has stalled, where corruption is endemic, and a region that is a lot less stable than it was in 2003."

Besides the United States and Britain, only five countries have 500 or more troops in Iraq: South Korea has 2,300, Poland and Georgia each have 900, Romania has 600 and Australia has 550, according to the Associated Press.

West European countries have remained largely opposed to the war, while East European countries, including former Soviet republics, have been more enthusiastic. The parliament in Bulgaria voted Wednesday to extend the mission of its 120 noncombat troops in Iraq until the end of March 2008. It also has 35 support personnel there.

Iran, Militias Could Gain From British Pullout (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD — Britain's planned reduction in its force in southern Iraq could empower Iran and lead to more bloodshed between rival Shiite Muslim groups, analysts warned Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0135215

The area around Basra is less violent than Baghdad, and sectarian killings are rare, in part because it is overwhelmingly Shiite. But the government's authority there is rivaled by armed groups that are "thoroughly intertwined with criminal enterprises," according to a report from the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"In the coming year, the drawdown of British forces in the deep south will likely be accompanied by an upsurge of factional violence as the long-delayed fight for local supremacy begins in earnest," said the report, written by Iraq security specialists Michael Knights and Ed Williams.

The militias already engage in regular street battles over lucrative oil smuggling. The region has 70% of Iraq's oil fields.

Vice President Cheney said Wednesday that the planned British withdrawal was a response to improved security in the area. "What I see is an affirmation of the fact that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," Cheney told ABC News.

Late last year, Basra province was experiencing an average of five attacks a day against troops and civilians, compared with nearly 40 a day in Baghdad, according to a Defense Department quarterly report in December.

On Tuesday, Britain handed over control of an Iraqi army division based in Basra. The 10th Iraqi Army Division, which was trained by British troops, now takes its orders from Iraqi military commanders in Baghdad.

Questions linger, however, about the Iraqi security forces in the area. In late December, more than 800 British soldiers raided a police station housing Basra's "serious crime unit," where police were accused of arresting, torturing and killing rival clansmen. The British soldiers killed seven gunmen, rescued 127 prisoners and ultimately reduced the two-story building to rubble.

"The Iraqi security forces in Basra are not equipped or qualified to take on responsibility," said Abo Amar al-Mayahi, head of Basra's Badr Organization, a Shiite group. "If they took over now, there will be a lot of chances for bad things to happen."

A spokesman for the British military in Basra could not be reached for comment.

Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, said the British withdrawal will "leave a vacuum that will be filled by Shiite militias backed by Iran." The Bush administration has recently accused Iran of providing weapons to Shiite militias in a drive to bolster Iranian influence in Iraq.

Smuggling across the nearby Iranian border, currently patrolled by British troops, could also soar with fewer British soldiers in the area, said Juan Cole, a University of Michigan history professor and expert on Iraq's Shiites.

Cole said militias often steal oil after it leaves refineries, load it on boats and then sell it on the black market in other Persian Gulf countries. "It's really dangerous in so many ways," Cole said of the British withdrawal. "Basra is not under control."

U.S. commanders may also need to find other ways to escort fuel and supply convoys running between Basra or Kuwait and the rest of Iraq, Cole said. That security has been handled by British troops, he said.

"This idea that the British could leave because the local authorities have things under control is just completely false," he said.

"The indications are now that it was brought down by small-arms fire and … rocket-propelled grenades," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told CNN.

Seven American helicopters, including two operated by aprivate security company, have gone down in Iraq since Jan. 20.

·In Baghdad, insurgents blew up a pickup carrying chlorine gas canisters. It was the second such attack in two days. The explosion killed at least five people and sent more than 55 to hospitals gasping for breath and rubbing stinging eyes, police said.

Chlorine causes respiratory trouble and skin irritation in low levels and can be fatal with heavy exposure. "Terrorists are using dirty means," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, an Iraqi military spokesman.

Britain To Trim Iraq Force By 1,600 In Coming Months (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday that up to 1,600 of the roughly 7,100 British troops in southern Iraq would begin to withdraw in coming months, a sharp contrast to the continuing American troop buildup in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0135216

The British withdrawal was more modest than government ministers had suggested in recent weeks, and Mr. Blair offered no clear timetable for the drawdown, during which Iraqi forces will take over some of the responsibility for patrolling Basra and the surrounding area.

The announcement was made after months of public criticism of Mr. Blair's government over a war that has become increasingly unpopular at home. At the same time, senior British commanders have complained that their forces are stretched thin by their twin deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan, and military analysts have said a reduction in the Basra force could free troops to meet growing responsibilities in Afghanistan.

A British opposition politician, Sir Menzies Campbell, said the move would leave Iraq far from being the "beacon of democracy" that Mr. Blair had once promised. And in his speech on Wednesday, the prime minister acknowledged that conditions in southern Iraq were not what he had hoped.

"What all this means is not that Basra is how we want it to be," Mr. Blair said, "but it does mean that the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

The city, he said, "is still a difficult and dangerous place." But he drew a clear distinction between the perils facing British forces in southern Iraq and conditions for American troops farther north.

The "situation in Basra is very different from Baghdad," he told Parliament, because there was no Sunni insurgency there, little sectarian violence and "no Al Qaeda base," while "an orgy of terrorism" had been unleashed on Baghdad. Even so, he said, British troops, whom he described as "brave beyond belief," were regularly coming under fire in southern Iraq.

Word of the planned withdrawal received widespread publication here on Tuesday, and the White House released a kind of public blessing of the idea then, saying it pointed to increased stability in the south.

On Wednesday, Bush administration officials reiterated that the announcement of the British withdrawal had been expected for months, and they played down the potential security risks of having fewer troops in and around Basra.

"This moderate reduction that the British are doing is possible because they have been able to achieve success in Basra," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman. He acknowledged that attacks in the city had actually increased over the last year but said a withdrawal was possible because the British had handed over responsibility for security to Iraqi security forces. British troops would continue to patrol near Iraq's border with Iran, he said.

Another senior Defense Department official said that, if security conditions deteriorated in the south, American commanders might need to send in their own forces to help remaining British units and Iraqi troops. He noted that the United States also usually keeps reserve forces nearby in Kuwait that could be sent into Iraq as well.

"If something flares, we will react to it with the forces on the ground," the official said. He added: "We always plan for contingencies. However, we do not expect trouble."

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said the British decision shows that "they have made some progress on the ground." He said that "is going to enable them to move some of the forces out, and that's ultimately the kind of thing that we want to be able to see throughout Iraq."

Democratic leaders in Congress saw it differently.

"By announcing its decision to redeploy troops from Iraq, the British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept," said Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the majority leader. "There can be no purely military solution in Iraq."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, said, "the announcement by the British government confirms the doubts in the minds of the American people about the president's decision to increase the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq."

Other European governments with troops in Iraq also announced Wednesday that they were pulling out or thinking about it.

Around 460 Danish soldiers under British command in southern Iraq will be withdrawn by August, the government in Copenhagen said, and Lithuania said it was considering pulling out a small contingent of 53 soldiers in the south.

But it was Britain that has long been the most prominent United States ally in Iraq, with most of its forces deployed in and around Basra. At the time of the 2003 invasion, Britain committed about 40,000 air force, naval and army personnel to the fight, but that figure was reduced to about 9,000 two years ago and 7,100 now.

On Wednesday, Mr. Blair said that further withdrawals could reduce the British force level to less than 5,000 by late summer, but that British troops would remain "for as long as we are wanted and have a job to do," at least into 2008.

In essence, the reduction in British forces will mean British troops pulling back to a support and training role to two bases, mainly one at the Basra airport, to support Iraqi forces patrolling the city, Mr. Blair said. British troops will also patrol the border with Iran, which Britain accuses of supporting Shiite militias in southern Iraq.

Mr. Blair indicated that the timing of the withdrawal would hinge on the levels of conflict in southern Iraq, depending "in part on what we do, what the Iraqi authorities themselves do, but also on the attitude of those we are together fighting."

He denied suggestions by political opponents that British troops would be leaving what one antiwar opposition legislator, Charles Kennedy, called a “quagmire.” And he rejected accusations from antiwar politicians that the 2003 invasion itself had inspired Iraq’s bloodletting. “We did not cause the terrorism,” Mr. Blair said. “The terrorists caused the terrorism.”

On Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice denied suggestions that the British withdrawal plans meant the coalition forged to topple Saddam Hussein had crumbled. She said the British “have been terrific.”

“The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits,” she said during a visit to Berlin to conduct Middle East peace negotiations. “The coalition remains intact and, in fact, the British still have thousands of troops deployed in Iraq.”

Mr. Blair also used his announcement on Wednesday to deliver a broad review of Middle East policy and went on to meet in London with Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority.

Speaking to Parliament, Mr. Blair drew a distinction between Iran and Syria. “They should not be treated as if the same,” he said. “There is evidence recently that Syria has realized the threat Al Qaeda poses and is acting against it. But its intentions towards Iraq remain ambiguous and, towards Lebanon, hostile.”

“But both countries — though very different — have a clear choice: work with the international community, or defy it,” Mr. Blair said.

As US Surges, British Start Exiting Iraq (CSM)

By Mark Rice-Oxley And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

British prime minister Tony Blair announced Wednesday the beginning of the end of British military involvement in Iraq, starting with a 25 percent drawdown before summer.

Denmark also said it would pull all of its 460 ground troops from Iraq by August.

Mr. Blair's decision is, in part, an acknowledgment of the British public's anger over the war and a desire to focus on Afghanistan. Southern Iraq, where British troops operate, is not yet "how we want it to be," Blair said. "But ... the next chapter in Basra's history can be written by Iraqis."

Blair's move isn't likely to help the Bush administration. Fewer British troops in Basra will leave Iran in a stronger position and puts at risk US military supply lines in Iraq, say analysts, at a time of an escalating US-Iranian standoff.

"This is more about Tony Blair's legacy than the situation on the ground," says Toby Dodge, an Iraq historian at Queen Mary, University of London. After 10 years in office, Blair is expected to step down some time in the summer, and analysts say, he is eager to say that he finished what he started in Iraq.

From 7,100 to 4,000 in 2007

Blair said Wednesday that 1,600 of the 7,100-strong force will leave in the coming months, with hundreds more to pull out throughout the summer. In all, 3,000 could be gone by year's end, by which time all four southern provinces that were under the British should have been handed over to Iraqi control. The remaining troops will shift roles, taking a more discreet, remote approach inside their base at Basra airport, as the Iraqi security forces take on day-to-day security matters.

This is "a recognition that the British forces have done whatever good they're going to be able to do in southern Iraq," says Michael Clarke, a defense expert at King's College, London. "It's not the same as saying the job is done."

But removing British troops will not please the White House, coming as it does on the heels of President Bush's decision to "surge" 21,000 more US troops into Baghdad and Anbar Province and the president's assertions that Iran is responsible for much of the violence inside Iraq.

"There is no doubt that any British troop reduction that is not coordinated with a US reduction weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US," Anthony Cordesman, the former director of intelligence analysis for the Defense Department and now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, wrote Wednesday. "This is a war of perceptions, as well as military power, and the influence of the British cuts will be negative."

Basra's problems are very different from Baghdad's. In the southern port city, British troops have seen bullying and execution of political opponents by the dominant Shiite militias in the city rather than the sectarian civil war that rages in the capital. There is no city in Iraq where Iran has more influence, which means the Islamic Republic may be better placed to strike out at American assets through local proxies. One concern: US military supply lines running north from Kuwait could be at greater risk, especially if the bellicose rhetoric between Tehran and Washington escalates.

A spokesman for Mr. Bush's National Security Council said that "we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis." But some analysts say that is largely political spin, pointing out that Basra is as troubled today as it was a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0135218

In the nearly four years that British troops have been responsible for Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, Shiite militias have co-opted the police and many of the city's political institutions while British forces have been increasingly confined to their bases.

There are two major political militias in the city – one close to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, another to the Fadila Islamic party of his rival Muhammad Yaqubi – as well as a number of smaller gangs that engage in tribal extortion and kidnap for ransom.

"The British certainly aren't doing what the Americans want them to," says Mr. Dodge.

But senior British officers have been arguing that Britain's commitment to Afghanistan, which many see as a more important mission than Iraq, is stretching their forces thin. Last fall, the British general, Sir Richard Dannatt, said he supported withdrawal from Iraq because the British presence in Basra appeared to be aggravating the local population.

In September 2005, British forces assaulted the main jail in Basra to release two soldiers detained by the Basra police. Basra's governor called Britain's actions "barbaric and irresponsible." Though extreme, that is not the only case of enmity between the British and Iraqi security forces they're training.

In his speech Wednesday, Blair appeared to agree with General Dannatt's point. He said that unlike Baghdad, relatively homogenous Basra – it has many Sunnis, but not in sufficient numbers to challenge the Shiites – has little sectarian violence, no Al Qaeda presence and no Sunni insurgents. "The bulk of the attacks are on the multinational force," he said, the inference being that the removal of troops would stem the violence.

Britain's approach for more than two years has been one of conciliation and compromise with local militia leaders. British officers in the south have said privately that approach was largely dictated by the small size of their force – making the option of going to war with the Shiite militias unattractive.

At the moment, Britain's 7,100 troops in the south equal one soldier for every 451 residents of Basra and the neighboring Maysan Province, also under British control. A new manual for counterinsurgency written by senior US generals argues for about 20 troops for every 1,000 residents, which in the case of southern Iraq would mean about 70,000 British troops.

"The British long ago essentially ceded the two provinces they control ... to Shiite Islamist factions," writes Mr. Cordesman. "The British cuts will in many ways simply reflect the reality that the British 'lost' the south more than a year ago. The Shiites will take over, Iranian influence will expand, and more Sunnis, Christians, and other minorities will leave."

Dodge argues that Britain is well aware of this and is deciding to simply get out of the way of what looks to be a messier conflict.

"The big fear is that the British in the south will be hostages to US policy toward Iran," says Dodge. "There is a link between [British] casualties in the south and rising tensions with Iran. What Iran has effectively done is infiltrate its people and bought influence and kept the pan boiling."

Rising British casualties

British casualties have been light compared with American ones: the British have lost 34 troops in the past two years, compared to 996 US deaths. But the trend has inched upward since last fall, according to statistics compiled by Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent website that tracks Iraq casualties.

In the past six months, 17 British troops have been killed. In the six months prior to that period, 12 British soldiers were killed. And in the six months prior to that, 10 were killed.

Mr. Clarke of King's College says that Britain is less worried about expanded US conflict with Iran and more concerned about what's possible given the small size of its Army. "What is at the forefront," he says, "is the idea that keeping major forces in Iraq for the long-term future is impossible."

The End Of The Alliance (NYT)

By Bartle Breese Bull

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

YESTERDAY'S announcement by Prime Minister Tony Blair that Britain will cut its troops in Iraq by 30 percent over the next six months and perhaps fully withdraw in 2008, followed by the news that the Danish contingent is also heading home, may seem like the death knell of the so-called coalition of the willing and a severe blow to American hopes.

Still — and I am well aware of how unpopular the presence of British troops in Iraq is among his electorate — Mr. Blair's decision may have as much to do with strategic good sense as it does with domestic politics.

The truth is that the British gave up trying to win their war in southern Iraq a long time ago, and they probably accomplished as much as they could. Contrary to the grumbling among many Americans, they have done a lot of good work in southern Iraq. I have seen British troops on patrol in the marshes and countryside, watched grateful Iraqis rush to ask for their help in mediating tribal disputes or providing more protection from the militias.

Thanks to British oversight and protection, Saddam Hussein's cruel efforts to drain the country's southern marshes have been completely reversed. The marshes are now back to about 40 percent of their original size, with parts visibly flourishing. (With 75 percent of the water of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers now siphoned off by neighboring countries before it gets to Iraq, it is unlikely that the marshes will ever recover fully.)

When I visited a date palm plantation near Basra last year, Iraqi farmers told me that British aircraft had sprayed almost 100,000 trees with insecticide, helping their production to double since the days of Saddam Hussein's rule. (One of the men also insisted that I visit the old British cemetery in Baghdad. It was beautiful, he said: a sanctuary, a paradise. "And the gravestones are safe," he assured me. "I have removed them, so no one will destroy them.")

The British successes have also been political. In the south, Iraq's elections and constitutional processes have been far more successful in terms of security and turnout than almost anywhere else in the country. There was never a popular uprising against the British presence.

True, after the Coldstream Guards stormed a Basra police station in 2005 to free two special operations troops being held captive, a photograph of a guardsman on fire atop his armored vehicle led newspapers around the world, giving the impression of a city and a region in flames. But the reality was quite different: that day, the angry crowd numbered only 200 — this in a city of two million, after two years of war.

Even over the last 12 months, the British military posture in the south has not been as passive as has widely been perceived outside of Iraq. One night last December, in a successful effort to capture weapons caches and terrorist leaders, more than 1,000 British troops in Basra, using high-speed landing craft and dozens of armored vehicles and tanks, carried out the largest coalition "strike operation" since the invasion.

But despite these successes, it seems the British never intended to "win" the war in southern Iraq. The British withdrawal from Iraq began almost immediately after the invasion. The British presence in the south, which was 46,000 troops in April 2003, has been under 10,000 since May 2004.

Unwilling or unable to rid the streets and farmland of Maysan, Dhi Qar, Muthanna and Basra of the militias who are the main threats to order in the largely Shiite south, the British troops' goal has been to keep a lid on things until they could leave. They have not had the resources or the mandate to win a war against either the Iran-backed Badr Brigades or the more nationalist Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr. And if those rival Shiite forces were to begin a fratricidal conflict, there is little the Britons would be able to do to intervene.

Americans must bear in mind that the situation in the south is very different from Baghdad and the Sunni triangle. In bloody Anbar Province the game is changing, and an American presence is helping convince local tribes to turn against the bleak worldview offered by Al Qaeda. In Baghdad, residents frequently express a wish for the Americans to return after they have declared a neighborhood cleared and moved on (as the current initiative in the capital is supposed to do). But there is no large constituency in Basra calling for the British to stay in force.

The "moral hazard" argument — the idea that the longer coalition troops stay, the longer we simply allow the Iraqis to avoid sorting out their own problems — is perhaps the most powerful claim for coalition troops to leave Iraq altogether. To some extent this is too simplistic: in Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle, the problems are too severe to be left to the country's nascent security services immediately. But in the Shiite-dominated south, the centrifugal forces are less threatening than anywhere else.

Iraq's historical state is one of constant internal violence. It is also, contrary to the claims of those who feel the country is a false concept of Western imperialism, one of territorial integrity within the current borders, which existed for 400 years of loose federalism under the Ottomans.

The priority now is to give Iraqis the best possible conditions to achieve the best feasible Iraq: one that stays whole; suffers less internal violence than it has historically; is not a threat to its neighbors or the rest of us; and that through a few good internal examples and a modicum of representative government has hope and mechanisms for improving itself.

This is an approach that will have to be adapted to suit each region. And in southern Iraq, it seems clear, it is time for the Iraqis to succeed or fail on their own.

Cheney Slams Iraq Plan Advocated By Dems (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, February 21, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday harshly criticized Democrats' attempts to thwart President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying their approach would "validate the al-Qaida strategy." House Speaker Nancy Pelosi fired back that Cheney was questioning critics' patriotism.

"I hope the president will repudiate and distance himself from the vice president's remarks," Pelosi said. She said she tried to complain about Cheney to President Bush but could not reach him.

"You cannot say as the president of the United States, 'I welcome disagreement in a time of war,' and then have the vice president of the United States go out of the country and mischaracterize a position of the speaker of the House and in a manner that says that person in that position of authority is acting against the national security of our country," the speaker said.

The quarrel began in Tokyo, where Cheney used an interview to criticize Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., over their plan to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the Iraq war to make it difficult or impossible to send 21,500 extra troops to Iraq.

"I think if we were to do what Speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all we will do is validate the al-Qaida strategy," the vice president told ABC News. "The al-Qaida strategy is to break the will of the American people ... try to persuade us to throw in the towel and come home, and then they win because we quit."

In the interview, Cheney also said Britain's plans to withdraw about 1,600 troops from Iraq — while the United States adds more troops — was a positive step. "I look at it and see it is actually an affirmation that there are parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well," the vice president said.

Pelosi, at a news conference in San Francisco, said Cheney's criticism of Democrats was "beneath the dignity of the debate we're engaged in and a disservice to our men and women in uniform, whom we all support."

"And you know what I'm going to do? I'm going to call the president and tell him I disapprove of what the vice president said," Pelosi said. "It has no place in our debate." Bush had previously urged her to call him when a member of his administration stepped over the line by questioning Democrats' patriotism, she said.

Later, Pelosi said she had tried to reach the president but was only able to get through to White House chief of staff Josh Bolten.

Bolten said he was certain no one was questioning her patriotism or commitment to national security, she told reporters.

"I said to him perhaps when he saw what the vice president said he might have another comment," Pelosi said. White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said Cheney "was not questioning anyone's patriotism." But she said Bush and Cheney believe that Pelosi and Murtha's "position to immediately pull out our troops would be harmful to our national security and that it is the wrong strategy to pursue."

As for Cheney's assertion that the partial British pullout is a sign that things are going well in Iraq, Pelosi said: "If it's going so well, we'd like to withdraw our troops as well."

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Armed Service Committee, said Britain's withdrawal, coupled with a Denmark's announcement to pull out its 460 troops by August, "accelerates the breakup of the coalition in Iraq."

He said the United States should reduce its forces "as a way of pressuring the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future and to reach the political settlements that are essential to end the sectarian violence and defeat the insurgency."

Administration leaders, however, said Britain's decision was good news.

"The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said at a news conference in Berlin, where she was in meetings on the Mideast peace process.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley, at NATO headquarters in Brussels, said the decision "reflects the progress that has been made on the ground in Basra and in the south," where British troops were stationed.

"So this is basically a good news story, an indication that progress is being made, and that events on the ground permit this kind of adjustment in forces," Hadley said. Still, he acknowledged the violence in Baghdad and said, "I'm not saying this is an unalloyed picture of progress."

Cheney Says Democrats Won't Be Able To Stop Surge (HILL)

By Chris Good

The Hill, February 22, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Wednesday he does not think Democratic congressional leaders will be able to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq.

Asked in an interview with ABC News whether Democrats had the power to stop the surge, Cheney said: "I don't think so. The question is whether or not they have the votes."

The vice president said he believes the strategy on Iraq that Democrats are pursuing is a "policy of defeat" and indicated that he views the passage of a non-binding resolution in the House last week as political posturing. However, Cheney, who is on a trip to Asia and Australia and was speaking on board the USS Kitty Hawk in Yokosuka, Japan, also said it is important that Congress debate the issue.

Some anti-war Democrats are exploring options on how they can prevent the troop surge and begin bringing soldiers home. While Democrats have maintained they support the troops serving in Iraq and would not cut off any funds if such a move could endanger the soldiers, considerations are under way whether Congress can use its constitutional power to prevent Bush's plan.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, support a plan that would place conditions on some war funds. Murtha wants to withhold funds if the Pentagon fails to meet standards of equipment, training, and time at home for newly sent troops.

Cheney asserted that, if Congress were to prevent the "surge," it would validate al Qaeda in its attempts to "break the will of the American people."

The vice president said Pelosi's plan of getting troops out of Iraq would have "devastating long-term consequences in the global war on terror.

"You can't look at Iraq in isolation," Cheney stated. "You can't quit in one place and then persuade all your allies who are helping you in all those other theaters, if you will, to continue the fight."

A Lack Of Courage In Their Convictions (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Indiscriminate criticism of President George W. Bush is an infectious disease. Some conservatives seem to have caught it, but congressional Democrats might be crippled by it.

Consider some conservatives' reflexive rejection of the administration's achievement -- with China, Russia, South Korea and Japan -- of an agreement that might constrain North Korea's nuclear weapons program. Voicing the obvious with a sense of originality, critics exclaim that North Korea is a serial liar. And, echoing the equally reflexive disparagement of the agreement by some liberals, these conservatives say it is not significantly different from President Bill Clinton's 1994 agreement, which failed.

The new agreement might not bring Pyongyang to heel. It is, however, unlike that of 1994, in three particulars.

First, China was infuriated by North Korea's October nuclear test, which fizzled but expressed defiance of China. So now China seems amenable to serious pressure on its mendicant neighbor, which is substantially dependent on China for food and energy.

Second, the new agreement, like the 1994 pact, is an attempt to modify behavior using bribery. But under the 1994 agreement, North Korea got the bribe -- energy assistance -- before being required to change its behavior. Under the new agreement, North Korea will receive just 5 percent of promised oil -- 50,000 of 1 million tons of heavy fuel oil -- before it must fulfill, in 60 days, the first of the many commitments it has made.

Third, the administration believes it found, in Banco Delta Asia, a lever that moved Pyongyang. The Macau bank was pressured into freezing 52 accounts holding $24 million -- yes, million, not billion -- of North Korean assets because Pyongyang has been using them for illicit purposes. If Pyongyang flinched from being deprived of $24 million -- less than Americans spend on archery equipment in a month -- Pyongyang's low pain threshold suggests how fragile, and hence perhaps how containable, that regime is.

Regarding Iraq, the Democratic-controlled Congress could do what Democrats say a Democratic president would do: withdraw U.S. forces. A president could simply order that; Congress could defund military operations in Iraq. Congressional Democrats are, however, afraid to do that because they lack the courage of their (professed) conviction that Iraq would be made tranquil by withdrawal of U.S. forces.

So they aim to hamstring the president with restrictions on the use of the military. The restrictions ostensibly are concerned with preparedness but actually are designed to prevent deployments to Iraq.

Last Saturday, Senate Republicans blocked a vote on a resolution disapproving the president's policy because Democrats would not permit a vote on a resolution stating that the Senate will not cut off funds for troops in the field. That resolution would have committed the Senate to not taking the path that many Democrats already are tiptoeing down.

Suppose Democrats write their restrictions on the use of forces into legislation that funds the war. And suppose the president signs the legislation but ignores the restrictions, calling them unconstitutional usurpations of his powers as commander in chief. What could Democrats do? Cross First Street NE and ask the Supreme Court to compel the president to acquiesce in congressional micromanagement of a war? The court probably would refuse to get involved on the grounds that this is a "political question."

The court has held that some constitutional controversies should be settled by the government's political -- meaning elected -- branches. In 1962, the court said that a case involves a political question when there is:

" . . . textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question."

In that welter of criteria there are reasons that the court will not rescue congressional Democrats from facing the logic of their posturing. They lack the will to exercise their clearly constitutional power to defund the war. And they lack the power to achieve that end by usurping the commander in chief's powers to conduct a war.

They can spend this year fecklessly and cynically enacting restrictions that do not restrict. Or they can legislate decisive failure of the Iraq operation -- withdrawal -- thereby acquiring conspicuous complicity in a defeat that might be inevitable anyway. A Hobson's choice? No, Nancy Pelosi's and Harry Reid's.

Cheney Visits An Australia Roiled By Guantánamo, Iraq (CSM)

By Nick Squires

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

Prime Minister Howard has been a steadfast US backer, but his opinion poll rating took a hit ahead of Cheney's arrival.

Dick Cheney, perhaps the most powerful vice president in United States history, arrives in Sydney Thursday for a four-day visit.

Australian Army Black Hawk helicopters have been clattering over the city as part of counterterrorism exercises, as local police described Mr. Cheney as a "high risk" dignitary.

He is the most senior American visitor to Australia since President Bush addressed the joint houses of Parliament in Canberra in 2003.

But despite Australia's status as a steadfast US ally and broad public support for the country's troop deployment in Afghanistan, Cheney will encounter public anger over Australia's participation in the Iraq war and growing disquiet over the fate of the country's lone Guantánamo Bay detainee, David Hicks.

Cheney will be greeted Thursday by a big rally outside Sydney's Town Hall, organized by the Stop the War Coalition.

A Newspoll survey this week found 68 percent of respondents now believe it was not worth sending Australian troops to Iraq, and only 30 percent agreed with the government's view that they should remain "as long as necessary." More than a quarter of people interviewed wanted the soldiers brought home immediately.

Cheney's visit comes at an awkward time for Prime Minister John Howard, who has been in power for more than a decade but this week slumped to his lowest opinion-poll rating in six years.

Cozying up to the US is dangerous at a time when the Australian public is recoiling from the situation in Iraq, even though it may support the broader objectives of the war on terror.

Mr. Howard has so far ruled out reducing Australia's 1,450-strong force in and around Iraq.

But he may find that stance more difficult after British Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement Thursday that he will start withdrawing British forces from the war-ravaged country.

The Australian public is also becoming increasingly concerned over the US administration's treatment of Guantánamo detainee Mr. Hicks.

A drifter and a former kangaroo hunter from the parched state of South Australia, Hicks was captured in Afghanistan with the Taliban in 2001 and handed over to US soldiers.

He has spent the past five years detained in Guantánamo Bay without any charges being filed against him.

It's not that Australians necessarily think he's innocent – clearly he was not in Afghanistan as a backpacker.

But they feel strongly that he deserves to face his accusers and be given a fair trial.

"For Howard, there are risks to this visit because the Bush administration is unpopular in Australia," says Michael Fullilove, director of the global-issues program at the Lowy Institute, a Sydney-based think tank. "The Hicks case contributes to the sense that all is not right. Here we are, a reliable ally, and he's been in custody for five years without a trial, unlike the British prisoners, who were sent home."

Australia has been one of America's most steadfast allies for more than 60 years. Australian "diggers" fought alongside GIs in World War II, Korea, Vietnam, and the first Gulf War.

While Australia's involvement in Iraq may be deeply unpopular, that is not to say that the country has been swept by anti-Americanism.

There is broad public support for Canberra's decision to deploy troops to Afghanistan, and residual sympathy for the horror Americans experienced on 9/11.

"I think Australians take a relatively sophisticated view of the relationship – they separate their feelings for the current incumbent with their attitude toward the alliance in general," says Mr. Fullilove.

DOJ_NMG_0135223

Last week, the government agreed to host a ground station for a US military satellite communications system on a remote stretch of desert coastline in Western Australia. There was barely a murmur of dissent, and the base is likely to be built without controversy.

"Even if Australians dislike the present administration, they support the alliance," says Gerard Henderson, executive director of the conservative Sydney Institute think tank.

With its small population, isolation, vast coastline, and position on the edge of Asia, Australia has always looked to a more powerful guarantor. First it was the British Empire and then, after 1942 and the fall of Singapore, the US.

But tough questions are now being asked about the government's apparently unconditional support for the Bush administration.

"We think it is time for Howard to say enough's enough to the man who more than anyone is responsible for creating the Iraq disaster on the basis of distorted intelligence and inflated dreams of remaking the Middle East," declared The Sydney Morning Herald in an editorial Thursday.

There will be a protest Friday outside the five-star Shangri-La Hotel, where Cheney will give a speech on US-Australian relations.

On Saturday he will hold talks with Howard on the Bush administration's decision to send a new "surge" of 21,000 combat troops to Iraq.

Cheney will also meet the new leader of the opposition Labor party, Kevin Rudd, who has pledged to withdraw Australia's 550 combat forces from Iraq should he win the next federal election, expected later this year. Another 900 sailors, airmen, and diplomatic protection detachments would remain in the region.

With criticism of the Iraq war mounting, Cheney may be grateful to get out of Washington for a few days. He arrived in Japan Tuesday for a quick visit to thank the country for contributing troops to both Iraq and Afghanistan, and was due to stop by the US Pacific Island of Guam on his way to Australia.

But his reception in Australia may provide scant comfort. "Cheney is unpopular here. He's perceived as a rather dour and private man," says Mr. Henderson. "And of course he's associated with Bush, who's never been popular here .... I doubt whether John Howard phoned up Cheney and said 'Now is a great time for you to visit.' But Howard is tribal – he stands by his mates."

Iraq Insurgents Use Chlorine In Bomb Attacks (NYT)

By Damien Cave And Ahmad Fadam

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 — A truck bomb that combined explosives with chlorine gas blew up in southern Baghdad on Wednesday, and officials said it might represent a new and deadly tactic by insurgents against Iraqi civilians.

It was at least the third truck bomb in a month to employ chlorine, a greenish gas also used in World War I, which burns the skin and can be fatal after only a few concentrated breaths. The bomb killed at least two people and wounded 32 others, many of them sent to hospitals coughing and wheezing, police and medical officials said.

Iraqi and American officials said the use of chlorine seemed aimed at bringing a new level of fear and havoc to Iraq as a new security plan for Baghdad takes shape.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, an American military spokesman, said the attacks highlighted the fluidity of insurgent tactics in Iraq, dominated by militant groups that often notice and repeat attacks that attract the most attention and cause the most suffering.

Insurgents have shifted tactics to focus on helicopters, and on Wednesday one group forced down an American Black Hawk helicopter, the eighth such incident since Jan. 20. Roadside bombs have been adapted to punch through heavily armored Humvees. Attacks on Americans also now include coordinated assaults from multiple locations, with a mix of weapons and in at least one case, counterfeit American uniforms and vehicles.

“The enemy is adaptive,” Colonel Garver said. “The enemy wants to win.”

The Black Hawk attacked on Wednesday was forced into a “hard landing” after taking fire from heavy machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades in Diyala Province, north of Baghdad, the United States military said. There were no injuries. A Sunni insurgent group, the Mujahedeen Army, claimed responsibility for the attack in an Internet posting, according to the SITE Institute, which tracks postings by insurgent groups.

The bombing involving chlorine gas on Wednesday followed an explosion on Tuesday north of Baghdad of a tanker filled with chlorine that had been rigged to explode, killing nine people and wounding 148, including 42 women and 52 children. At least one other attack with chlorine took place on Jan. 28, according to the American military’s statements. Sixteen people were killed in that attack, in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, when a dump truck with explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Ramadi.

The attacks seem to have been poorly executed, burning the chemical agent rather than dispersing it, but more sophisticated weapons involving chlorine could injure hundreds and cause mass panic.

Though it is widely used in water purification and sewage treatment, chlorine is dangerous because it reacts with water in moist tissue, such as eyes and the respiratory tract, to create acid, which essentially burns tissue. A few breaths of air containing chlorine at a thousand parts per million can be lethal.

Nine people were killed and 250 injured in 2005 after a train crash in South Carolina in which 60 tons of liquefied chlorine was released — about six times more than what is contained in a home heating fuel truck like the one used in the attack on Tuesday.

Exposures at far lower concentrations, down to two parts per million, cause coughing, shortness of breath, chest pain, burning in the throat, nose and eyes, nausea and swelling of the lungs.

A few hours after the attack, American Humvees and a military vehicle with a nozzle that appeared to be testing the air encircled the scene. Soldiers were not wearing masks, but officials at Yarmouk hospital said they had determined through interviews and tests that chlorine was used in the attack.

Brig. Qasim Atta, an Iraqi government spokesman for the new Baghdad security plan, described chlorine attacks as a "filthy way" to harm vulnerable Iraqis.

Colonel Garver said that the chemical attacks could soon appear again. "It's no surprise that anti-Iraqi forces or terrorists or whoever is doing this are trying to replicate this kind of attack," he said. "They perceive that it's working."

The attacks on Tuesday and Wednesday also indicated that the Baghdad security plan had pushed the violence beyond the city's central neighborhoods, the focus of the new plan.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, a United States military spokesman in Baghdad, said that the "belt around Baghdad" had experienced an increase in attacks as Iraqi and American forces concentrated on neighborhoods within. At a briefing in the Green Zone, he said that top commanders were considering assigning at least one brigade to the ring around the city, and perhaps another to Diyala Province, which has been the site of vicious battles between Sunni insurgents and American and Iraqi troops.

The witnesses to the helicopter crash, also in Diyala, said that three helicopters, including a double-rotor Chinook, were flying at tree level when gunmen began firing antiaircraft machine guns from an area near an oil pipeline. A resident who would give his name only as Ali said the back of one helicopter burst into flames, leading the aircraft to turn sideways and plunge to the ground. Two other witnesses said they saw fire coming from the helicopter as it crashed around 1 p.m.

Violence broke out on Wednesday in the southern Shiite holy city of Najaf, when a suicide car bomber detonated as Iraqi security forces checked the car for weapons at a checkpoint into the center of city. The explosion occurred about a half a mile from the Imam Ali mosque, one of Shiite Islam's holiest shrines, and killed at least 11 people, the police said. Another 34 were wounded.

The American military also said a soldier had been killed by gunfire in a northern neighborhood of Baghdad and a marine had died from combat in Anbar Province, where American troops were battling Sunni insurgents. Both died Tuesday.

Meanwhile, despite the increased military effort, 20 bodies were found Wednesday in the capital, an Interior Ministry official said. In addition to the chlorine attack, four bombs ripped through areas of the city, killing at least six people, while mortar shells rained down on a Sunni neighborhood of western Baghdad, leaving three people dead.

The deadliest attack came about 5:30 p.m., when an abandoned car exploded in Sadr City, the largest Shiite area of the capital, killing at least four people, witnesses said.

Fatma al-Saiedi, 35, who was wounded in the explosion, said the attacks were a result of the new plan, which has replaced the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia, with what she and some other residents say are incompetent Iraqi policemen and soldiers.

"We trusted the Mahdi Army," she said. "The Americans have arrested so many of them, and now this happens — every day, another car bomb. We expect there to be more of them."

Another Chlorine Gas Bomb Attack In Iraq (LAT)

For a second consecutive day, a crude chemical weapon is used to target civilians, killing two.

Rape allegations amid Iraq car bombings

BAGHDAD — For the second time in two days, suspected Sunni Arab insurgents Wednesday targeted civilians with a crude chemical weapon: a bomb attached to chlorine gas canisters that killed two people, sickened 25 and injured eight others.

DOJ_NMG_0135225

The attack was the third in a month involving a combination of explosive devices and chlorine. Though all three attacks were apparently botched, they hint at an ominous new tactic being cultivated by insurgents to subvert a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad.

Violence around the country left at least 40 other Iraqis dead. An American soldier was reported killed in a small-arms fire attack a day earlier in Baghdad, and a U.S. Black Hawk helicopter was forced to make a hard landing Wednesday north of the capital amid reports of ground fire, the military said.

The chlorine gas attack took place on the road leading to Baghdad's airport. A car filled with chlorine gas cylinders exploded near a fuel station in a religiously mixed neighborhood.

The tactic was used the day before in Taji, north of Baghdad, when insurgents detonated a truck holding two chlorine gas tanks. Six people were killed, and scores more suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes.

A suicide bomber also plowed a dump truck filled with explosives and a chlorine tank into the base of a rapid-reaction force near Ramadi on Jan. 28, killing 16 people. "There are no indications of any casualties caused by the release of chlorine gas," the U.S. military said at the time.

The use of chlorine gas weapons in warfare dates back at least to World War I, when Germans first used them in April 1915 to dislodge French soldiers from trenches. The weapons caused far more injuries than deaths.

Chlorine can burn the eyes, nose and throat and cause dizziness, nausea and vomiting. In higher doses — a few breaths at a concentration of one part per thousand — it can damage enough lung tissue to be fatal.

Chemists said that exploding high-pressure canisters are at best a crude way to disperse the green gas. Some would burn off, and the rest of the gas, which is heavier than air, would be unlikely to spread much beyond the blast zone.

Stephen Bradforth, a chemistry professor at USC, suggested that the most serious damage could be psychological.

An explosion "would launch a cloud of gas that is colored and highly corrosive and would lead to panic and more injuries," he said. "It's the chemical equivalent of a nail bomb."

The U.S. Black Hawk helicopter went down near Taji. "Indications are now — again, it's preliminary, but the indications are now that it was brought down by small-arms fire and … rocket-propelled grenades," Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said on CNN.

The military said another helicopter landed and rescued the nine people aboard the Black Hawk. At least eight helicopters have crashed, been shot down or forced to make unplanned landings in just more than a month.

In Web postings, insurgents have announced plans to target U.S. aircraft in another new front to undermine the security effort. Helicopters have been increasingly used by American troops as a means of avoiding deadly roadside bomb explosions, but officials have said insurgents are finding new ways to target them.

The bodies of at least 20 unidentified men were found dumped throughout Baghdad, police said Wednesday. All were killed by gunfire. A late-afternoon car bomb explosion at a market in the Sadr City district of the capital killed three Iraqis and injured 30.

Several roadside bomb attacks in southern Baghdad killed at least three Iraqis and injured two.

Violence also erupted in the country's predominantly Shiite south, where U.S. and British-led forces have begun handing control over to Iraqi authorities.

In Najaf, home to influential Shiite Muslim seminaries and the most revered Shiite shrine in Iraq, a suicide bomber driving a Chevrolet Caprice detonated his explosives at a police checkpoint as officers were inspecting his vehicle. The blast spread wreckage, body parts and blood over 30 yards. At least 11 people were killed, including four policemen, and 37 were injured in the bombing, a Najaf hospital official said.

"My car was behind the car that exploded," said Ridha Mayoof, a 40-year-old taxi driver recovering at the hospital from shrapnel wounds. "I saw a huge flame coming out of the car in front of me. Bodies and parts of the car were flying."

In the southern city of Samawah, gunmen ambushed and killed Mohammed Hanoon, the deputy chairman of the provincial council, as he was leaving a mosque after morning prayers. Hanoon was the second member of the council assassinated in two months. A suspected former member of the late former President Saddam Hussein's intelligence services was shot dead in Kut, also in the south.

Authorities found an unidentified body in a drainage canal near Iskandariya, about 50 miles south of Baghdad.

Three Die In Attack On Chlorine Truck (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0135226

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 -- A tank truck carrying chlorine exploded in western Baghdad on Wednesday, killing three people and wounding at least 25 in the second such attack in as many days, according to a spokesman for Iraq's Interior Ministry.

Brig. Gen. Sadoun Abdul Karim said that several people exposed to the fumes were taken to hospitals and that the explosion set vehicles and shops on fire.

The chlorine attacks appear to be among deadly tactics adopted by insurgents in recent weeks as the U.S. military and the Iraqi government launch a security plan that will include the deployment of thousands of soldiers to outposts in Baghdad. Insurgents have also displayed new prowess in shooting down U.S. helicopters.

The attack came on a day when the political scandal over the reported rape of a Sunni woman by Iraqi police officers escalated, with the Iraqi prime minister's office releasing what it said was a portion of the woman's medical record.

The medical file, e-mailed to reporters by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office, includes a highlighted handwritten note with the notation "no vaginal lacerations or obvious injury."

In a simple diagram of the front of the patient's body, there are numerous marks indicating bruises around her inner thighs and groin. There is also a mark indicating a bruise on her head. The woman said she hit her head against the wall as three uniformed police officers raped her Sunday.

The medical record was attached to a news release that said the woman was going to be sued for making up the story.

Maliki said Monday that the rape allegation would be thoroughly investigated by a committee. Hours later, however, he said the investigation concluded that the woman had fabricated the story, and he announced that the accused police officers would be honored.

Maliki, who leads a government dominated by Shiites, did not identify the officers or say why the accolades were justified.

It is unclear how Maliki's office obtained the medical record, but the disclosure of its contents was apparently intended to bolster the conclusion that her story was made up -- and thus defuse a particularly sensitive example of the country's sectarian strife.

The woman has been championed by Sunni politicians, and at least one insurgent group has vowed to carry out attacks against Iraqi security forces in her name. Arab news stations have repeatedly aired a tearful interview in which the woman describes the alleged sexual assault in graphic terms -- a highly unusual move in a country where sex is seldom discussed publicly.

A U.S. military spokesman said Wednesday that he could not immediately confirm the accuracy of the information in the woman's medical record. Military officials have acknowledged that the woman was treated Sunday at the U.S. military-run Ibn Sina Hospital in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone. But they have not disclosed what kind of treatment she received or whether specific tests for rape were administered.

"I don't know how they got it," Capt. John Fleming said about the medical record. "Our policy is we do not release that stuff."

Another U.S. military spokesman, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said during a news conference Wednesday that the woman was discharged Monday and was provided with a copy of her medical record.

Maliki also announced Wednesday the dismissal of Sunni official Ahmed Abdul Ghafour al-Samaraie, who ran the Sunni Endowment, a government agency that oversees Sunni mosques. Samaraie had called for an international investigation of the woman's allegations, and he said many women have been raped by the country's security forces, which are predominantly Shiite.

Violence continued in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq on Wednesday. Bombs exploded in Baghdad, Najaf and Kirkuk, killing at least 15 people, according to police in those regions.

A Black Hawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad by rocket-propelled grenades and small arms fire, according to the military. The military said in a statement that none of the nine soldiers aboard suffered serious injuries.

Also on Wednesday, the military disclosed the death of an American soldier killed in northern Baghdad on Tuesday. In addition, the military disclosed the death of a Marine killed Tuesday in Anbar province, in western Iraq. The names were not released.

Caldwell said the first week of the security plan brought a "significant" decrease in sectarian killings, but he noted that the body count remains high because of car bombs and suicide bombers. "The thing we have not been able to bring under control is the number of vehicle-borne IEDs, and in the last few days, the suicide vests," he said, referring to improvised explosive devices. "We think the tactics have slightly switched."

"The effects of the operation will not be seen in days or weeks but over the course of months," he said.

Chopper Shot Down; All Aboard Evacuated (WT/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

The Washington Times/AP, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A U.S. helicopter was shot down and crashed north of Baghdad yesterday, the military said after initially stating that the chopper made a "hard landing." All aboard were safely evacuated by a second helicopter.

At least seven U.S. helicopters have crashed or been forced down under hostile fire since Jan. 20. Military officials have said that militants are increasingly targeting helicopters amid the buildup of U.S. troops in Baghdad, firing simultaneously with an assortment of weapons from different directions.

The military also has detected another deadly insurgent tactic in recent weeks -- the spreading of toxic chlorine gas by combining it with explosives.

In Washington, two Pentagon officials said the tactic has been used at least three times since Jan. 28, when a truck carrying explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Anbar province west of Baghdad. More than a dozen people were reported killed.

On Tuesday, a tanker filled with chlorine exploded and noxious plumes covered homes and schools north of Baghdad. Nine persons were killed and 150 wounded, said one of the officials. A day later, a pickup truck exploded near a diesel-fuel station in southwestern Baghdad, the official said.

A third defense official said the United States has been concerned about militants' ability to acquire weapons like chlorine bombs. But so far, the official said, bomb makers in Iraq haven't been able to disperse a chemical such as chlorine in an effective way.

All three officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

In the latest violence, a suicide car bomber struck a police checkpoint in the Shi'ite city of Najaf, killing 13 persons in the spiritual heartland of the militia factions led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The blast hit while streets were filled with morning shoppers. At least seven of the victims were police and the rest civilians, authorities said. It was the first large-scale bombing in months in the city, which is heavily guarded by police and Sheik al-Sadr's powerful Mahdi's Army militia.

On Aug. 10, a suicide attack near the Imam Ali mosque in the city killed at least 35 persons and wounded more than 100.

A car bomb in the western Baghdad district of Bayya killed at least two and injured 31, police said. Later, a car bomb in the neighborhood killed at least three persons.

Elsewhere in Iraq, a U.S. Marine was killed Tuesday in fighting in volatile Anbar province, the military said.

Meanwhile political tremors grew stronger in Iraq following claims that a Sunni woman was raped while in custody of the Shi'ite-dominated police -- a case that threatens to escalate the sectarian friction that drives many of the bombings and attacks across the country.

Iraq Insurgents Again Use 'Dirty' Attack (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Insurgents exploded a truck carrying chlorine gas canisters Wednesday -- the second such "dirty" chemical attack in two days -- while a U.S. official said ground fire apparently forced the downing of a Black Hawk helicopter. All nine aboard the aircraft were rescued.

The attacks offer a sweeping narrative on evolving tactics by Sunni insurgents who have proved remarkably adaptable.

Military officials worry extremists may have recently gained more access to firepower such as shoulder-fired anti-aircraft rockets and heavy machine guns -- and more expertise to use them. The Black Hawk would be at least the eighth U.S. helicopter to crash or be taken down by hostile fire in the past month.

The gas cloud in Baghdad, meanwhile, suggests possible new and coordinated strategies by bombers trying to unleash toxic -- and potentially deadly -- materials. "Terrorists are using dirty means," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, an Iraqi military spokesman.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, said initial reports indicated the chopper was brought down by "small arms fire and rocket-propelled grenades" north of Baghdad, but gave no further details. All nine aboard were taken away on a rescue helicopter, he said.

In Baghdad, a pickup truck carrying chlorine gas cylinders was blown apart, killing at least five people and sending more than 55 to hospitals gasping for breath and rubbing stinging eyes, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0135228

On Tuesday, a bomb planted on a chlorine tanker left more than 150 villagers stricken north of the capital. More than 60 were still under medical care on Wednesday. Chlorine causes respiratory trouble and skin irritation in low levels and possible death with heavy exposure.

In Washington, two Pentagon officials said the tactic has been used at least three times since Jan. 28, when a truck carrying explosives and a chlorine tank blew up in Anbar province. More than a dozen people were reported killed.

A third Pentagon official said the United States has been concerned about Iraqi militants' ability to get weapons like chlorine bombs and use them effectively. But the official cautioned that chlorine bombs are just one threat on a long list of possible attacks that Iraqi fighters may try to carry out.

It was unclear whether the confluence of new insurgent tactics -- attacking isolated combat posts, targeting helicopters more intensely and using chlorine bombs -- was coincidental or in response to the U.S. troop increase.

W. Patrick Lang, a former official at the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the insurgents are always "seeking to achieve higher levels of effectiveness" and these new tactics are part of the normal "evolution of sophistication."

Lang said trucks filled with chlorine gas are "really quite deadly" because the gas is potent and spreads easily.

Some authorities believe militants could be trying to maximize the panic from their attacks by adding chlorine or other noxious substances.

"It is an indication of maliciousness, a desire to injure and kill innocent people in the vicinity," said Garver, who also predicted militants may begin to launch similar attacks because of the widespread mayhem caused by this week's chlorine clouds.

"If there is a particular success, we'll see copycats. ... They certainly pay attention to what they think is successful," he said.

In Najaf, meanwhile, a suicide car bomber killed at least 13 at a police checkpoint. The attack fit a pattern that's believed to drive much of Iraq's recent violence: Sunni militants seeking to provoke majority Shiites into a full-blown sectarian conflict that would leave Washington's plans in ruins.

It was the first major bombing in more than six months in Najaf, an important Shiite pilgrimage site 100 miles south of Baghdad and also the headquarters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, head of the Mahdi Army militia.

The Najaf blast hit while streets were filled with morning shoppers. At least seven of the victims were police and the rest civilians near a checkpoint -- part of the city's security cordon that includes Mahdi Army militiamen, who battled U.S. forces in the area in 2004.

More than 40 people were wounded in the blast, which sent body parts and blood over a wide boulevard. Crews stuffed limbs and bits of flesh into cardboard boxes.

In Baghdad, another Mahdi Army center was hit. A car bombing in the teeming Sadr City district killed at least three.

National Guard May Undertake Iraq Duty Early (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — The Pentagon is planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, shortening their time between deployments to meet the demands of President Bush's buildup, Defense Department officials said Wednesday.

National Guard officials told state commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio last month that while a final decision had not been made, units from their states that had done previous tours in Iraq and Afghanistan could be designated to return to Iraq next year between January and June, the officials said.

The unit from Oklahoma, a combat brigade with one battalion currently in Afghanistan, had not been scheduled to go back to Iraq until 2010, and brigades from the other three states not until 2009. Each brigade has about 3,500 soldiers.

The accelerated timetable illustrates the cascading effect that the White House plan to increase the number of troops in Iraq by more than 21,000 is putting on the entire Army and in particular on Reserve forces, which officers predicted would face severe challenges in recruiting, training and equipping their forces.

It also highlights the political risks of the White House's Iraq strategy. Sending large numbers of reservists to Iraq in the middle of next year's election campaign could drive up casualties among part-time soldiers in communities where support for the administration's approach in Iraq is already tenuous, according to opinion polls.

A final decision on whether the additional Guard units will be required next year in Iraq will not be made for months, the officials said, and the full extent of the Guard role next year will depend on whether the situation in Iraq improves in the meantime.

It has been clear since Mr. Bush announced his plan last month that additional reservists could be required in Iraq, but the numbers and the identity of the specific units involved had not been previously disclosed.

Changing the reservists' schedules means abandoning previous promises that they would get several years between deployments. And the acceleration means that soldiers who usually drill just once a month and for a few weeks in the summer will have to begin intensive preparations right away.

"We're behind the power curve, and we can't piddle around," Maj. Gen. Harry M. Wyatt III, commander of the Oklahoma National Guard, said in an interview. He added that one-third of his soldiers lacked the M-4 rifles preferred by active-duty soldiers and that there were also shortfalls in night vision goggles and other equipment. If his unit is going to be sent to Iraq next year, he said, "We expect the Army to resource the Guard at the same level as active-duty units."

He also noted that one of the brigade's battalions that could deploy to Iraq next year was now in Afghanistan and was not scheduled to return until April, which would leave its soldiers with just over a year at home before having to leave for Iraq in June 2008. He said discussions were under way with top Army officials about providing necessary equipment and extra compensation for reservists in the Oklahoma Guard's 45th Brigade Combat Team if the unit was sent back to Iraq two years earlier than planned.

Capt. Christopher Heathscott, a spokesman for the Arkansas National Guard, said the state's 39th Brigade Combat Team was 600 rifles short for its 3,500 soldiers and also lacked its full arsenal of mortars and howitzers.

Of particular concern, he said, is the possibility that the prospects of going to Iraq next year could cause some Arkansas reservists not to re-enlist this year. Over the next year roughly one-third of the soldiers in the 39th will have their enlistment contracts expire or be eligible for retirement, Captain Heathscott said.

Guard and Reserve units were used most extensively in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2004, and have regularly supplied brigades throughout the fighting. The reinforcements now heading for Iraq will raise the number of combat brigades now in Iraq, only one of which is a Guard unit, to around 20 total. Thousands of additional Reserve support troops would also be required sooner, officials said.

To draw more heavily on Reserve units, the Bush administration announced in January that it was revising rules that limited call-ups of Guard members. The previous policy limited mobilization of Guard members to 24 months every five years, but prolonged and large deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan led the Pentagon to abandon that rule.

The new guidelines allow units that have already been deployed in the last five years to be called up again, but the Pentagon has said that it will try to limit the total time Guard units are mobilized to a year, instead of the current year and a half to two years.

Given that they would be in Iraq for about nine months, that would leave only three months for training before they go. In the past, six months of training has been the norm before heading to the war zone.

To make up the difference, officials said the soldiers would get more part-time training, close to home, before being mobilized. That would cut the time they have to spend away from their jobs and families, Captain Heathscott said.

Military Tells Congress Of Equipment Shortfalls (POL)

By Christian Lowe

The Politico, February 21, 2007

In a move sure to provide ammunition to congressional critics of the Iraq war, military commanders have given Congress a long list of equipment and reconstruction needs totaling nearly $36 billion, denied earlier by the administration in its $481 billion defense appropriations request for the new fiscal year.

The lists come as Democratic leaders, who control both the House and the Senate, consider a new legislative strategy to restrict President Bush's ability to prosecute the war and, eventually, force a U.S. withdrawal.

The Army and Marine Corps say they need more than 5,000 armored vehicles, another $153 million for systems that defend against the deadly improvised explosive devices in Iraq and $13 million in language translation systems.

In an annual exercise initiated by the ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee, the military service chiefs were asked to forward spending priorities for the new 2008 fiscal year that either Pentagon budget planners or White House budget officials struck from the services' original requests. Lawmakers use the list to gauge where military commanders see shortfalls and to justify additions to the appropriations.

"Given the operational demands that Operation Iraqi Freedom and the Global War on Terrorism are placing on the services, it is more important than ever that Congress be aware of these unfunded requirements in order to fulfill its constitutional duty of providing adequate resources for our Armed Forces," wrote Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., in a Jan. 17 letter to the service chiefs requesting the lists.

Last week, the chairman of the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee, Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., began to lay out his strategy to restrict funding for the president's plan to "surge" another 21,500 combat troops into Iraq until all Army and Marine units are certified as fully manned and equipped. And the list of unfunded projects could be used by him and other war critics to dramatically demonstrate shortfalls faced by the services.

The Army's $10.3 billion list includes $2.2 billion for 2,500 special vehicles to better protect troops against roadside bomb attacks. The Marines have asked for another 2,700 of the vehicles, totaling $2.8 billion.

The lack of armored vehicles has been a heated topic of debate on Capitol Hill as lawmakers consider a $93.4 billion wartime appropriation to finish the current fiscal year, another $141 billion in wartime funding bill for fiscal 2008, as well as the regular 2008 defense appropriations bill.

Though not carrying the brunt of the combat in Iraq or Afghanistan, the Navy detailed $5.6 billion in unfunded needs. And the Air Force issued a request for a $16.9 billion.

Their lists include some items that could prove controversial, such as a Navy request for $1.7 billion for an additional amphibious ship and $720 million to buy 12 F/A-18 Hornet fighter jets.

The Air Force wants two new C-17 transport planes at more than $1 billion, and $448 million for executive jets used by military commanders and government officials.

A Retreat From Big Cities Hurts ROTC Recruiting (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Though Army Seeks More Ethnic Officers, It Shuns Northeast

QUEENS, N.Y. -- The ROTC program at St. John's University here seems perfectly placed for an Army that's desperate for officers who are bilingual and comfortable in foreign lands. About 40 of the 120 students speak second languages, including Turkish, Korean, Mandarin, Hindi, Albanian, and Gujarati.

"I had never even heard of Gujarati until I learned I had a cadet who spoke it," says Lt. Col. Timothy Walter, who heads the program.

But instead of being hailed as a model for the Army's future, the St. John's Reserve Officer Training Corps program is a lonely outpost of diversity. In the past few decades, the Army has pulled its officer training and recruiting programs out of the Northeast and big, ethnically diverse urban centers, choosing to concentrate on campuses in the South and Midwest. 1

There is no Army ROTC program in the Detroit area, with its large middle-class Muslim population, and only one in Miami and Chicago. In New York City, which produced more than 500 military officers a year in the 1950s and early 1960s, the two remaining ROTC programs last year yielded 34 Army officers.

In contrast, Alabama, which has a student population that is about one-fourth the size of the state of New York, has 10 ROTC programs that last year produced 174 Army officers. The South generates about 40% of all Army officers, according to Pentagon statistics.

An officer's background didn't matter so much when the U.S. was focused on fighting big armies in large conventional battles. These days, though, U.S. success in places like Iraq and Afghanistan hinges on the ability of Army officers to win the trust of a suspicious and often culturally alien population. Officers must court sheiks and warlords and work closely with indigenous security forces.

At a time when the country is growing more and more diverse, the Army is struggling to build an officer corps that takes full advantage of America's multiethnic society. There are only about 1,500 Muslims in a force of about 500,000 soldiers. Arabic speakers are in critically short supply throughout the force, say senior Army officials. Even in those cities, like New York, where the Army maintains ROTC, it is undermanned and culturally out-of-synch with the people it is trying to recruit.

"We've been very shortsighted," says retired Gen. Jack Keane, who served as the Army's vice chief of staff until he retired in 2004. "We have leaders in the Army who are uncomfortable in big urban areas. They feel awkward there."

The Army's retreat from urban areas has complex roots, from antimilitary sentiment in big cities in the wake of the Vietnam War to simple economics. Urban ROTC programs have generally produced fewer cadets and are considered poorer investments than programs at large campuses in the South. Internal Army studies say the best ROTC candidates are students whose parents have served in the military and enjoy physical activity. "They may have rafted, canoed, rock climbed or sky dived," an internal Army report states. Prime candidates also have served in leadership positions at school.

ROTC, which is open to full-time college students, produces officers who are the professional and intellectual core of the Army. The program graduates about 4,000 officers a year and supplies two-thirds of the Army's officer corps. Cadets must attend classes at least twice a week and work out in the mornings three times a week. The other officers come from West Point, which produces about 900 graduates a year, and the Army's Officer Candidate School at Fort Benning, Ga. ROTC graduates typically agree to serve eight years in the military after they graduate. The time can either be spent on active duty or in the reserves.

DOJ_NMG_0135231

To prepare soldiers better for dealing with local populations, the Army has added language and cultural-awareness classes. At West Point, for example, cadets in the Social Sciences Department spend three days each year in Jersey City, N.J., a city of about 250,000 that includes large numbers of Muslims, Hindus and Egyptian Coptic Christians. The West Point cadets meet with local political and religious leaders. They spend the night in a mosque, meet with the Imam there and observe evening and morning prayers. During their last trip they were treated to a homemade feast from Hindu, Egyptian and Coptic Christian communities.

"The goal is to help cadets understand how a big, diverse, ethnic population works," says Maj. Stephanie Ahern, who oversees the trip.

But when it comes to recruiting officers from Jersey City, the Army has taken a pass. It closed its only two ROTC programs in Jersey City in the mid-1990s because they weren't producing many officers.

The Army's shift South began in the late 1960s at a time when anger over the war in Vietnam was prevalent on many Northeastern campuses. At some high-profile schools, like Harvard, Yale and Columbia, disagreements between the military and school administrators drove ROTC off campus. Many small Southern schools actively courted the military by setting aside new buildings for ROTC programs.

As the Army shrunk after the Cold War, it also shuttered large numbers of bases in the Northeast and relocated troops to sprawling facilities in the South and Midwest which were far from population centers and offered big training ranges. As a result, urban students today have far less exposure to the military, making them harder and more costly to recruit and retain in ROTC programs.

"We want to produce an officer corps that is fully reflective of the rich ethnicity and cultural diversity of our country," says Maj. Gen. Montague Winfield, who oversees the Army's ROTC programs nationwide. But, he says, the Army must also focus its money and personnel on areas that are likely to produce the largest number of high-quality officers at the least cost to taxpayers.

Last year, Cadet Command, which oversees training and recruitment of ROTC officers, came up 450 officers short of its goal of producing 4,500 second lieutenants. This year, the command will get about $175 million for scholarships to bring in more cadets, twice what it received in 2001. But it won't get additional officers and sergeants to expand programs to more campuses in urban markets.

"We are in a resource-constrained environment," says Gen. Winfield.

No place shows the shortcomings and the potential of urban ROTC programs better than New York. Created after World War II, ROTC was a big presence on campuses throughout New York City. The City College of New York, for example, swelled with more than 1,500 cadets in the 1950s, making it among the largest in America. Its most famous graduate is Gen. Colin Powell.

In the early 1970s, the Army began to leave the city. From 1968 to 1974, the Army closed 43 ROTC programs in the Northeast and opened 45 new programs in the South. In the early 1990s when the Army was downsizing at the end of the Cold War, it closed 70 more programs, including its remaining programs in Manhattan and Brooklyn.

For many Army officers and senior sergeants today, New York is an alien place. Master Sgt. Darrel Jolley got his papers sending him to teach at St. John's University while he was in Iraq. The official Army order listed his assignment as "Jamaica, Queens." "I thought I was going to the island of Jamaica," he says. When he found out he was going to New York, the 43-year-old sergeant says he tried to get out of the assignment. He failed.

Driving through Brooklyn and Queens Sgt. Jolley said he was initially taken aback by the clamor and the large number of people who looked as if they recently arrived from the Middle East. "There were times when I felt like I was back in Iraq. There were people dressed in those man-dresses that they wear in Iraq. The women had veils. I know I shouldn't say this, but it made me want to look for IEDs," he says, referring to improvised explosive devices.

It wasn't just the city that felt foreign. The ROTC students were also different. Many spoke with heavy accents and struggled with their English. About half of the cadets were female, a big change from Fort Bragg in Fayetteville, N.C., where he served in all-male units. Standing before his first class, Sgt. Jolley says he felt compelled to preemptively apologize for anything he might say to offend the students.

Three years into his St. John's assignment, where he teaches courses in military science, Sgt. Jolley has formed strong bonds with his cadets. Among those with whom he has formed closest ties is Yesim Yaktubay, a 20-year-old junior who attends St. John's on a ROTC scholarship.

Ms. Yaktubay, who migrated to the U.S. at age 10 from Turkey, says she was drawn to ROTC because she needed money for school and wanted to travel. Her father works as a carpenter in Queens and her mother is a homemaker. Her parents initially tried to talk her out of joining the military, and remain troubled by the Iraq war, she says. "They are from the Middle East. They have family over there and they were worried the war would spread to Turkey," she says. Her mother "kept saying I was going to get hurt or killed," Ms. Yaktubay says. Like many of the St. John's cadets, Ms. Yaktubay says she has her doubts about the wisdom of the war but "I support our troops."

As one of a handful of Muslims in the St. John's program, Ms. Yaktubay says she frequently finds herself answering Sgt. Jolley and her fellow cadets' questions about Islamic culture. The questions range from mundane queries about dietary laws to more serious ones about the role of jihad in the religion.

Ms. Yaktubay says she hopes her background growing up as an immigrant and a Muslim will make her a better officer. She plans to go into military intelligence. "I think it will help me understand people better, particularly their cultural differences and their background," she says.

Initially Ms. Yaktubay had her doubts about Sgt. Jolley, a broad-shouldered infantry soldier from western Pennsylvania. "We all expected him to be meaner and really push us," she says. Although her grades are strong, Ms. Yaktubay struggled with the Army physical-fitness test. Sgt. Jolley skipped lunch and took extra time in the evenings to help her and other recruits cut their time in the 2-mile run. "He has become like a second dad to me," she says.

Jessica Jurj came to the U.S. from Romania at age 14 and attends John Jay College of Criminal Justice, part of the City University of New York system in Manhattan. She struggled with her grades her freshman and sophomore years because she was working as much as 50 hours a week to support herself.

Today she is one of the leaders of the Fordham ROTC program in the Bronx. Her teacher, Lt. Col. Randy Powell, who runs the program, recalls how several years ago, he took the unit he was leading to an exercise with the Bulgarian military. "I was unprepared for the level of poverty," he says. "Having Jurj on my staff would have been a huge help."

The two remaining New York City programs -- at St. John's and Fordham -- are both fragile. Cadets often have long commutes involving buses and trains to reach them. Ms. Jurj says she has to get up at 4 a.m. to make it from Queens to her 6 a.m. mandatory Saturday ROTC class at Fordham. On days when she sleeps late she has to pay $40 in cab fare.

Without aggressive leadership, the programs can also quickly falter. In 2000, the ROTC program at Fordham University in the Bronx was producing about five officers a year and was on the verge of being shut down. The officers, who ran the program, rarely left the Fordham campus to recruit cadets.

Today it yields about 25 officers a year. A key player in the turnaround is Maj. Mike Hoblin, a Fordham ROTC grad and native New Yorker who was assigned to the program at its low ebb. Shortly after he arrived, Maj. Hoblin began offering ROTC classes at Fordham's campus in Lincoln Center, easing the commute for students who attend colleges in Manhattan, such as Columbia and New York University. Today the Fordham program has nine cadets from NYU, up from none in 2000.

But Maj. Hoblin also looked beyond the elite campuses. He focused attention on John Jay and City College of New York, two of some 20 schools in the 200,000-student CUNY system. At the time the CUNY system was producing virtually no ROTC candidates. He started attending career days and built relationships with professors and administrators who had connections to the military. Today, about 25% of the 112 cadets attending the ROTC program based at Fordham are from CUNY schools.

Even as he was expanding the Fordham program, Maj. Hoblin says he was struck by the missed opportunities in New York, particularly on the immigrant-heavy CUNY campuses, where there is no ROTC presence. "I have always found that first-generation immigrants in New York City are eager to serve," he says.

U.S. To Investigate Iraq Rape Case (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD — The U.S. military said Wednesday that it will launch its own investigation into an alleged rape that has created a furor among Iraq's Sunnis and bitterly split the country's government.

Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, ordered an investigation into allegations by a 20-year-old Sunni woman who said she was raped last week by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki cleared the three police officers Tuesday following an investigation that lasted less than a day. He announced an unspecified reward for the officers and said the rape charge was fabricated to discredit the U.S. and Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad.

Al-Maliki on Wednesday fired a leading Sunni official who had called for an international investigation.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, top spokesman for the U.S. military here, announced Petraeus' decision to look into the allegations. Caldwell said U.S. doctors originally treated the woman and kept her overnight at a U.S. military hospital.

"What I can tell you is that at a point on Sunday evening an Iraqi woman was brought to our medical facility," he said. "She was put under the care of our medical personnel there, and sometime early Monday morning she was released."

The results of the U.S. investigation will be provided to Iraqi officials after they make a decision "on how they are going to move forward" with the judicial process, Caldwell said.

DOJ_NMG_0135233

Ahmed al-Samaraie, the Sunni official fired by al-Maliki, said the woman's allegations were not unique.

"Many girls are raped, but they refuse to appear in the media so as not to tarnish their reputations," he said. Al-Samaraie heads the Sunni Endowment, which cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq.

The incident has fired public sentiment in a city riven by tension between Sunnis and majority Shiites.

"Everybody is talking about her and laughing at her, on the bus, on the streets, my family and all my friends," said A'mer Ameer, 35, a Shiite in Baghdad's Karada neighborhood. In TV interviews, the accuser was too calm to be believable, he said. "I think it's a game to destroy the security plan after (Sunni extremists) see it's starting to give good results."

Sunni students in Mosul rallied to demand a new government probe.

Farooq Ihssan, 33, from Baghdad's Ameriya district, said Sunnis at his mosque were urged to protest today. "Shame on every Iraqi who says this woman is a liar," Ihssan said.

Ahmed Abdullah, 29, a Sunni from Zaiona, had doubts. "I don't believe that Iraqis will rape a woman. We don't have such a culture. We might kill, behead or do torture, but rape — I don't think so," he said.

Rape is considered not only an assault on the victim but a grave offense against her entire family and community. The allegations harkened back to the dark years of Saddam Hussein's rule, when wives and daughters were raped in front of their husbands and fathers to exact confessions from the men.

Television stations in Egypt and the Persian Gulf have reported extensively on the case since Monday.

Maliki Fires Official For Criticizing Response To Rape Account (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired a top Sunni official on Wednesday after he criticized the government's handling of a young Sunni woman's account of being raped by members of the Shiite-dominated security forces.

Mr. Maliki, responding to criticism that his Shiite-led government was rushing to discredit the woman's account because she is Sunni, also released what he said was evidence that she was lying, including a medical report that he said had come from an American-run hospital where the woman had been treated.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief American military spokesman, said that the hospital had given only the woman a copy of the medical report and that it was unclear whether Mr. Maliki's document was genuine.

A copy of Mr. Maliki's document, obtained by The New York Times, shows it to be inconclusive. It says the subject had no vaginal tearing, but notes bruises on her thighs. In an extremely unusual broadcast on Al Jazeera on Monday night, the woman said she had been beaten with a water hose during the attack.

It was also unclear if Mr. Maliki had the authority to fire the Sunni official, Sheik Ahmad Abdul Ghafur al-Samaraei, who runs the Sunni Endowment, an organization that cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq.

Mr. Samaraei, in an interview, said Mr. Maliki might need approval from a specific government council to fire him. The article in the Constitution cited by Mr. Maliki does not seem to be clear on this point.

But Mr. Samaraei said he was not surprised.

"Maliki is fed up with me talking about all the terrible things that are happening to Iraqis, whether it is killing, kidnappings or illegal arrests," he said. He said he had met with many Sunni women who confided that they had been raped by government soldiers.

It was the third day that Sunni and Shiite leaders bitterly debated the handling of the woman's charges.

It is almost unheard of in this Islamic country for a victim of rape to publicly acknowledge the crime, much less go on television. Sectarian motivations aside, Iraqi politicians, both Sunni and Shiite, seemed to be at a loss for how to deal with the topic publicly and at the same time delicately.

In the broadcast account, the woman said that after she was taken from her home in the west Baghdad neighborhood of Al Amil on Sunday, she was raped by at least three members of the National Police.

General Caldwell said she was treated at an American-administered hospital in the Green Zone. American military officials did not elaborate, saying only that they were trying to make sense of the case themselves.

On Wednesday, Sunni and Shiite leaders called news conferences to condemn one another.

Abdul Nasir al-Janabi, a leader in the Tawafiq bloc of Sunni political parties, said the government was covering up many rapes of Iraqi women by the security forces. He threatened that Sunni parties might withdraw from the government if their concerns were not addressed.

He also sought to rally support from the broader Sunni Islamic world, calling on "the international Arab and Muslim conscience to raise its voice and condemn these indescribable crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0135234

Mr. Janabi and other Sunni leaders pointed out that it was only a matter of hours before the prime minister shifted from calling for an investigation of the woman's allegations to denouncing her as a liar and criminal and praising the officers involved.

The criticisms quickly escalated from specific concerns about the woman's case to the broader security crackdown in Baghdad, which Mr. Maliki is in charge of organizing.

Mr. Janabi joined other Sunni leaders in condemning the plan as a sham meant to allow Shiite militias to go into hiding while Sunnis were harassed.

Mr. Maliki, on the other hand, found the harsh comments from Sunni leaders to be further proof that the woman's claims had been fabricated and aimed at undermining his authority and the credibility of the security plan. His office released a defiant, at times confusing, statement.

"We expected this fabricated propaganda," the statement said. "The purpose of this is to obstruct and distort the law enforcing plan."

The Maliki administration contended that the clothes of a person who had been kidnapped by Sunni militants had been found in the woman's home. The person's body, the statement said, "was found buried in another house."

The woman first came under suspicion of aiding militants, according to the document, when a police officer "saw her cooking for a large number of people while she was alone in the house." This happened again, the release said, and the woman was preparing enough food to feed "more than 10 people."

The statement twice cited American involvement to bolster the claims, including that military advisers were "present in all stages of arrest, transportation of the complainant and interrogation."

General Caldwell, the American military spokesman, did not confirm that. While acknowledging that she had been admitted to an American-run medical facility on Sunday, he refused to divulge details of her treatment or examination.

In the statement to news organizations, Mr. Maliki went beyond trying to prove that the woman had not been raped, implying that she was unmarried and having an affair.

Iraq Rape Charge Stirs Sectarian Storm (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

A Sunni woman says she was assaulted by Shiite police, but Iraq's Prime Minister says the charge is bogus.

The armored convoy of Iraqi officials rolled into a police garrison in southwest Baghdad Wednesday to investigate highly charged claims of rape by a Sunni woman against Shiite police commandos.

They brought with them Sabrin al-Janabi, the alleged victim and the center of a political firestorm that has spread across Iraq in the aftermath of these rarely public allegations. Iraq's deputy minister of interior aimed to see if he could identify the perpetrators, to calm claims that are being amplified by politicians and fueling sectarian tensions.

Indeed, Iraq is a country where perception, instead of fact, often defines wartime realities.

Even before the details of the case could be determined, Iraqis heard competing claims by the alleged Sunni victim broadcast on TV and a Shiite premier who says the charges have been fabricated to undermine the US-Iraqi security plan in Baghdad.

Interviews with officers who jailed Mrs. Janabi (a nickname used by the woman), witnesses to her brief arrest, and other sources cast doubt on the rape claims. US officers – who were apparently present in the garrison during the alleged incident, Iraqi officers claim – have so far not provided their version of events.

In the latest sign of the toll taken on Iraq's fragile unity government, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki Wednesday fired a top Sunni official, the head of the Sunni Endowment board, whose group declared the "horrific crime" to be proof that the Baghdad crackdown is a failure.

Mr. Maliki states that medical tests show the woman "had not been subjected to any sexual attack," and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her. Maliki's office Wednesday released a one-page medical report, typical of those used in US military facilities here, that appeared to prove that point. The handwritten words "no vaginal lacerations or obvious injury" are clear, though the place for the name is covered by a sticker with a number.

In a statement, the premier blamed "certain parties" for trying to "sow confusion about the security plan and tarnish the reputation of our forces," adding that the three falsely accused officers would be "rewarded."

But Janabi's claims and Maliki's handling of the case are sparking outrage among Sunnis.

"One of them put his hand on my mouth so no one outside the room could hear me," Janabi said on television. "I told them 'I did not know that an Iraqi could do this to another Iraqi.' "

DOJ_NMG_0135235

Iraqi officers interviewed at the garrison and involved in the arrest in the Al Amel district dispute those claims, saying that Janabi spent only 20 minutes in the office of the garrison commander with several Iraqis asking questions. They were in the constant presence of US soldiers inside the room, says an Iraqi major who asked not to be named.

Sunni leaders have already accused the US and Shiite-led government of singling out their neighborhoods for clearance in the security plan; the rape charges fed those concerns.

Mahmoud al-Mashadani, the Sunni speaker of parliament, warned that "if you [Maliki] don't bring justice to this Muslim Iraqi woman, whom you should view as your sister or daughter, history will curse us with eternal disgrace."

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a major Sunni insurgent group, vowed on its website that they would "not sleep or be satisfied until we avenge you and every free woman who was stripped of her virtue and dignity."

The group called on its militants to "focus" their attacks against Iraqi troops, especially police commandos, in a campaign that for the next month would be called "Sabrin," after the alleged victim.

US soldiers, whom the woman claimed had helped free her from the Iraqi police commandos, have yet to confirm such a role. The woman "received care" at a US hospital in the Green Zone overnight Sunday, said a US spokesman.

"Many of the events and circumstances surrounding this alleged assault are still being pulled together ... to establish what may or may not have happened," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told a press conference Wednesday. The top US commander in Iraq has appointed a military lawyer to examine the case.

Rape is a taboo topic in Iraq, and lethal revenge, even against the female victim by male family members, is not punishable under the law.

The saga began Sunday when the woman was detained along with about 10 suspected Sunni insurgents occupying homes from which Shiite residents had been forced out. One of the Iraqis who made the arrest said the police had been tipped off by Iraqi soldiers at a nearby base that Sunni insurgents had moved into a house in Al Amel.

Four police commandos entered the house shortly after the 6 a.m. curfew, and were surprised to find Janabi sleeping there alone, according to an Iraqi 1st lieutenant who was one of the four. Janabi appeared "disturbed," and complained of problems with her kidneys and nerves to explain the presence of tablets this officer said were sedatives or painkillers.

She gave her name as Zainab, according to this officer's account, but had no identity or residence papers, which she claimed her husband had just left with. Another police commando recognized Janabi from a raid just two days before, on Friday, in which she was at another abandoned house and cooking for 10 people.

"You are like a cat, every day in a different house," the officer recalled telling Janabi. Other officers who recognized her recalled that the jacket of a kidnap victim had been found near the house where she was cooking on Friday. The body of that kidnapped person – along with four other corpses – was found in a nearby secondary school on Monday.

When asked what she was doing there, Janabi apparently told that she had "deceived" the officers the previous Friday, in explaining herself.

Janabi was not handcuffed, Iraqi officers say, but first was put in the open-backed truck of the deputy commander, and then separated from the male detainees – who were shortly released – and locked in the back of a military ambulance alone to be driven to the garrison.

"I received orders to put her in the back of the ambulance," says the driver of the vehicle, Saad. He said American troops saw Janabi as she was put in, and told him: "Transport her to the camp," indicating that they would soon meet him there.

According to the driver, Janabi was never tied and was deposited directly in the office of the Iraqi camp commander. Janabi was in that room for questioning for 20 minutes, says the Iraqi major who was present, in an interview. Americans were in the room throughout, says this officer.

"It was just question and answer. Nothing happened," the major asserts. They asked about why she had been found cooking for so many people two days earlier, on Friday, and why there were holes in the walls connecting abandoned houses – a tactic typically used for quick escapes. They told her about the significance of the jacket and the kidnap victim.

Within hours of the house raid Sunday, Shiite witnesses, who had been with the police commandos and hoped to reclaim their houses from Sunni gunmen, said that among those arrested was a "prostitute" who appeared drunk or on drugs. Some Iraqis, Shiite and Sunni alike, say they are suspicious of the woman's story.

"Maybe it's fake and they gave her some money to say this – to be an actress," suggests one older Sunni woman, who also happens to be from the large al-Janabi tribe and could not be named. "Sometimes women like these give information to the insurgents because they give them money, and make calls to the police or US troops to set them up for insurgent ambushes."

Even as Sunni and Shiite politicians struggle to take advantage of the perception gap over assault charges, ABC News on its website quoted an Iraqi government source saying that Janabi had recanted her claims, saying she was never raped, and had been paid for the television interview.

Adding more spin to the case, that source said the story was meant to "manipulate the security plan," as part of a "great effort by the bad guys to tell the world that this [plan] is not working."

Prodi Quits After Foreign Policy Defeat (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Romano Prodi resigned as prime minister of Italy on Wednesday night after a parliamentary defeat on foreign policy. His decision raised fears that Italy was returning to the days of short-lived governments and paralysis in policymaking.

Mr Prodi, 67, handed in his resignation to Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, who planned to start talks on Thursday to see who, if anyone, has enough support to form a new government.

Mr Prodi's nine-party, centre-left coalition took office in May, a month after he defeated Silvio Berlusconi, the former centre-right premier, in the closest election in modern Italian history.

The sudden crisis that overwhelmed Mr Prodi centred on his inability to persuade communists and other radical leftists in his coalition to support two cornerstones of Italian foreign and security policy. These were Mr Prodi's determination to keep Italian troops side by side with Nato forces in Afghanistan and his decision to permit the expansion of a US military base in the north-eastern city of Vicenza.

Although the radical left said it did not want to bring down Mr Prodi, the parliamentary rebellion of a handful of dissident leftwingers was sufficient to ensure that the government lost a motion by two votes in the Senate, the legislature's upper house.

Mr Prodi felt obliged to resign because the defeat signalled that his coalition was incapable of producing a majority from its own ranks to ensure that Italy met its international commitments. The options facing Italy's political classes include the formation of a new Prodi-led government; the creation of a centre-left government without him; the emergence of a centrist-dominated government including moderate opposition politicians; and a snap general election.

Pierluigi Castagnetti, a centre-left moderate and deputy speaker of parliament's lower house, said he did not want a snap election – not least because Italy's electoral law, a fully proportional representation system, needed to be changed first.

The Union of Christian Democrats, the third largest and most moderate opposition party, said it was ready to hold talks with centre-left parties.

Mr Prodi's government was the 61st in Italy since the second world war and held office for nine months – slightly less than the average government length between 1945 and 2001.

Although he started to restore order to the shaky public finances and began to open up Italy's professions and service industries to more competition, the government was always under pressure because of its one-seat majority in the Senate.

The abrupt crisis appeared to surprise many communists and radical leftists, who wanted to flag their discontent with Mr Prodi's foreign policy but without toppling their government.

Mr Berlusconi said Mr Prodi had no choice but to resign, as Massimo D'Alema, foreign minister, made clear on Tuesday the government would "go home" if it lost yesterday's vote.

Italy's Prime Minister Resigns After Foreign Policy Defeat (USAT)

By Eric J. Lyman

USA Today, February 22, 2007

ROME — Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned Wednesday when his coalition government fractured over foreign policy, including his decision to keep Italian troops alongside U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

Prodi submitted his resignation to President Giorgio Napolitano after a humiliating defeat in the Italian Senate. It was intended to boost political backing for Prodi's foreign policy.

Napolitano is likely to indicate today whether he will call elections or ask Prodi — or someone else — to form a new government. The next government will be Italy's 62nd since the end of World War II.

Prodi took power nine months ago but lacked a clear mandate after a razor-thin election victory in April over incumbent Silvio Berlusconi, a media tycoon.

The result gave Prodi's coalition a one-vote majority in the Senate, but three defections Wednesday left him with 158 senators in his corner — two short of the 160 he needed for passage of the foreign policy measure.

Italy's 1,800 troops in Afghanistan are part of the NATO peacekeeping force there. Many members of the broad center-left Prodi coalition are pacifists who oppose sending Italian troops abroad.

The constitution did not require Prodi to step down, but Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema — a two-time prime minister and a potential candidate to succeed Prodi — said before the vote that the government should step down if it failed to win enough support in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0135237

"If Prodi would have continued, his government would have been paralyzed," said Giorgio Prestigiacomo, a political scientist at Florence's Catholic University. "Better to let a new government — whether he leads it or someone else does — start fresh."

The last time an Italian prime minister resigned was in April 2005, when Berlusconi stepped down after infighting in his coalition. He was able to form a new government within days.

It might be tougher for Prodi to follow suit. His deficit-reduction plan, featuring tax increases and cuts in public spending, has hurt his popularity ratings.

Another divisive issue has been his government's decision to support a plan to double the size of the U.S. military base in Vicenza, northern Italy. The base houses troops of the Army's 173rd Airborne Brigade.

The expansion plan, set in motion by Berlusconi's government and backed by Prodi, drew tens of thousands of protesters during the past weekend.

"Prodi's approval level (percentage) is in the mid-30s, and that makes things tough for him," said Maria Rossi, co-director of the polling firm Opinioni.

Prodi's resignation could open the door for a long-shot bid by Berlusconi or another member of the opposition to try to form a new coalition.

Prodi narrowly loses a foreign policy vote in the Senate, toppling his 9-month-old coalition.

ROME — Stung by a bruising foreign policy defeat, beleaguered Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned Wednesday, his center-left government collapsing after just nine months in power.

Prodi failed to win parliamentary endorsement of his decision to maintain Italian troops in Afghanistan, a loss attributed in part to desertions by members of his coalition who oppose continued cooperation with the U.S. military in Italy and abroad.

Chants of "Quit! Quit!" filled the Italian Senate as opposition politicians in business suits jumped up and down and pumped their fists upon realizing Prodi had lost the vote. A few hours later, he tendered his resignation to Italian President Giorgio Napolitano.

Napolitano said through a spokesman that he would begin talks today aimed at forming a new government.

Among the scenarios, he could ask Prodi to build a new government, avoiding fresh elections that neither the right nor the left appeared eager to engage in just yet.

Prodi will continue as a caretaker prime minister until a new government takes power, Napolitano's office said.

The nation was once infamous for its revolving-door governments during decades of tumultuous political infighting and scandal. Prodi's predecessor, Silvio Berlusconi, last year became the first Italian prime minister since World War II to finish a five-year term.

Berlusconi prided himself on the length of his tenure, and many Italians hoped a new era of stability had dawned. But Prodi's government was probably doomed from the start. He narrowly defeated Berlusconi's center-right coalition in hard-fought elections last year, gaining only the tiniest of majorities in the Senate, which enfeebled his mandate.

Berlusconi, who could return to office again, could barely contain his glee Wednesday. "The government has been clamorously defeated in Parliament," he said.

Prodi's resignation was a matter of "political, constitutional and ethical" duty, Berlusconi said, adding that the prime minister's handling of foreign policy proved him "incapable" and brought "international humiliation" to Italy.

The event that triggered the government crisis was not a confidence vote and did not carry a constitutional requirement that the prime minister step down. It was, instead, a Senate vote to endorse the government's general foreign policy, including maintenance of Italy's 1,800-member military mission in Afghanistan.

But Prodi and his foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, had staked their credibility on the measure. "I am asking for a strong and clear consensus," D'Alema said on the Senate floor.

The move proved to be a serious miscalculation. The measure fell short of winning Senate majority approval by two votes.

Prodi's coalition, a patchwork of nine disparate political parties, has been torn by divisions and bickering. Several leading leftists in the coalition want Italy out of Afghanistan and oppose Prodi's decision to permit the U.S. military to expand its base at Vicenza in northern Italy.

Tens of thousands of Italians, including members of three parties from the Prodi coalition, marched last week on the northern base to protest the expansion.

Prodi has said he is obliged to carry through with a promise made by Berlusconi that gave Washington permission to enlarge the base. Reneging would be seen as an "act of hostility," Prodi said.

In another move this month that embarrassed Prodi, Berlusconi's opposition bloc managed to pass a measure in the Senate approving the Vicenza expansion.

Angered over Vicenza, two Communist senators, Franco Turigliatto and Ferdinando Rossi, took Wednesday's vote as their cue to abandon Prodi. Their desertion deprived Prodi of the majority he needed, setting in motion the government's fall.

Analysts here were quick to recall that it was far-left members of his coalition that toppled Prodi's earlier government in 1998.

Prodi may yet be able to hold on to power. His allies were rallying Wednesday evening to his defense and plotting ways to reconfigure their government.

"We are ready to reconfirm our full support for the Prodi government," Dario Franceschini of the centrist Margherita (Daisy) party said, suggesting that a confidence vote could be called that would demonstrate that Prodi and his coalition still have a majority to govern.

But the opposition was equally emphatic in doubting that Prodi would continue in office.

"If he wants to go ahead [and attempt to form a government], good luck," opposition politician Pier Ferdinando Casini told state television. But, he added, "the country is paying the price."

Italian Premier Resigns After Foreign Policy Loss (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

ROME, Feb. 21 — Italy's fragile government snapped suddenly on Wednesday under the weight of its own internal divisions as well as a broader skepticism about the European role in the worldwide fight against terrorism.

Prime Minister Romano Prodi, in office just nine months, submitted his resignation Wednesday evening after his governing coalition lost a key vote on foreign policy in the Senate.

Two far-left members of his coalition abstained amid tensions over whether Italy should continue to provide troops to Afghanistan and Mr. Prodi's support of an expansion of an American military base in Vicenza, in northern Italy.

With only a razor-thin majority, the abstentions killed the measure, aimed at gaining Senate support for Italy's foreign policy, and unexpectedly, doomed the government.

"I can't in any way give my vote to this government with this foreign policy," said Fernando Rossi, a senator from the Italian Communist Party and one of the dissenters.

The vote took place the same day Britain announced a substantial reduction of its troops in southern Iraq, and a week after a European Parliamentary committee issued a strong report criticizing secret American flights in Europe of terrorism suspects.

But the government's collapse also reflected its own inherent weaknesses, possibly signaling that Italy's chronic political instability may be coming out of remission. In a nation that has had some 60 governments since World War II, Mr. Prodi has presided uneasily over a coalition of nine diverse parties, ranging from moderate Catholics to Communists.

"It's very bad," said Roberto D'Alimonte, a professor at the University of Florence and expert in electoral law. "We still have to come to terms with a working political system. We do not have a working political system."

There are many scenarios for what comes next — and one possibility, if not immediately likely, is a return to power of Silvio Berlusconi, whom Mr. Prodi defeated in elections last year.

As ministers met late into the night to discuss how to proceed, Mr. Berlusconi's supporters rallied outside the seat of government, waving banners and demanding that the government step aside.

"The country has been exposed, by a majority that isn't and by an incompetent government that has rejected parliamentary dialogue — a grave international humiliation," Mr. Berlusconi told reporters.

For Mr. Berlusconi to return, new elections would have to be held, which at the moment seems several steps in the future.

After accepting Mr. Prodi's resignation, President Giorgio Napolitano will begin to consult with political parties on Thursday and will ask one of them to try to form a government.

Many political experts believed that Mr. Prodi would be given a chance to shuffle his cabinet in a way that would satisfy the parties already in the government. Then he would call for a confidence vote in Parliament.

But many experts noted that such a government would remain weak, with the deep splits over Afghanistan and the American base unresolved.

"Something has broken," said Franco Pavoncello, the president of John Cabot University here and a political scientist. "This vote and the reaction of the government has created damage to Prodi's ability to last."

In theory, the prime minister's term lasts five years, but Mr. Berlusconi is the only prime minister to have endured that long.

DOJ_NMG_0135239

While the government's weakness made it liable to fall at any moment, its collapse on Wednesday came as something of a surprise. For months the government has been bickering internally — and weathering attacks by Mr. Berlusconi and other opposition leaders — over issues ranging from the budget to a proposed law giving rights to unmarried couples.

But foreign policy remained a particular weak spot. Essentially, Mr. Prodi and his ministers have sought to walk a difficult line, echoing much of the skepticism in Europe about President Bush and the war in Iraq while maintaining Italy's traditionally strong ties with America.

The government's far-left members, however, have strongly resisted the presence of nearly 2,000 Italian troops in Afghanistan. And last weekend, tens of thousands of people rallied against the expansion of the American-staffed NATO base in Vicenza, which Mr. Prodi's government reluctantly supported.

The splits grew deeper, and on Tuesday in Spain, Italy's foreign minister, Massismo D'Alema, himself a former prime minister, called for the Senate to endorse Italy's foreign policy. If it did not, he said, the government should "go home," or step down.

In a long and impassioned speech before the vote on Wednesday, Mr. D'Alema defended his government's position on Afghanistan and the Vicenza base, in terms that he hoped would win the left's support.

"We have not supported the neoconservative politics of the American administration and we have not sent soldiers to Iraq," he told his colleagues. "There is a profound difference between the military operations in Afghanistan, approved by the United Nations, and those in Iraq."

He added that the support of expanding the base was essential to good relations with America. "To change course would be a hostile act against the United States," he said.

In the end, the government needed 160 votes but received only 158 with the two abstentions. Opposition senators roared at the result, shouting immediately: "Resign! Resign!"

Many experts said they believed that Mr. D'Alema, one of the most powerful and experienced members of the government, would resign. And as Italy's leaders search for a broader solution in the next few days, there are several alternatives to a mere shuffling of the current cabinet.

The most dramatic, and perhaps least likely, is that Mr. Napolitano could call immediate elections. But he has said he will not do so until the current electoral law, instated by Mr. Berlusconi last year, is changed. Many experts blame the law for virtually guaranteeing a thin majority in the Senate no matter who wins, and thus destabilizing the political system.

Another option is the appointment of a temporary government made up of largely centrist technocrats. The aim would be to steer Italy toward new elections, most likely engineering a change to electoral laws first.

A final possibility involves peeling off the more centrist Union of Christian Democrats, a party long allied, if uneasily, with Mr. Berlusconi. Even as the government tottered on Wednesday, one party leader, Marco Follini, seemed to raise the possibility. "The moment has arrived to put into the pipeline a different center-left," he told reporters.

But Professor D'Alimonte noted that the party did not have enough seats to allow Mr. Prodi to cast off the rebellious far-left of his own party. Simply adding on Mr. Follini's party remained a possibility, although Professor D'Alimonte noted that it also seemed a recipe for even deeper disputes since it shares little politically with the Communists who brought down the government.

How Prodi's Exit Stunts Italy (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn And Luca Di Leo

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The resignation of Prime Minister Romano Prodi risks stalling Italy's nascent process of economic overhaul just as the country is finally joining in Europe's broader recovery.

The move -- prompted by the government's defeat in a parliamentary vote on foreign policy -- also leaves in doubt whether Italian troops will remain part of the NATO coalition in Afghanistan.

President Giorgio Napolitano today will begin seeking to form a new government, which would need approval from Italy's fractious Parliament. It's unlikely Mr. Napolitano would call for early elections. But no outcome bodes well for Mr. Prodi, who must struggle to regain even a narrow political consensus.

Elected last year with a tiny majority in the Senate -- which later narrowed to a single vote -- Mr. Prodi had been walking a tightrope while trying to push through legislation that could win backing from all nine parties in his governing coalition, including two separate Communist parties.

Still, his center-left government did pass several controversial measures prying open sectors of the economy, from pharmacies to legal services, that long were buffered from competition. It also won a budget bill that improved Italy's public accounts after several consecutive years of runaway deficit spending under the previous government, led by Silvio Berlusconi.

Those measures have boosted business confidence and slightly propelled Italy's economy, which grew 2% last year after a flat 2005. But the latest crisis has crippled the governing coalition's ability to push its agenda, and made it unlikely that any serious overhaul of Italy's bloated pension system or a boost in the retirement age -- both staunchly opposed by the coalition's left-wing parties -- will be achieved anytime soon. The state pension system eats up more than 15% of Italian gross domestic product a year, the highest level in the euro zone.

The uncertainty also casts doubt on other plans, such as the government's effort to sell off its money-losing airline, Alitalia SpA, to private investors. "It will take a few days to sort out what happens next," said Giulio Sapelli, board member at Italy's largest bank by market capitalization, UniCredit SpA.

More broadly, Rome's confusion deepens the political jam afflicting some core European economies, such as those in France and Germany. France's efforts to open up its rigid labor market -- which many analysts blame for its economic sluggishness -- remain stalled since President Jacques Chirac backed down last year from a controversial labor-overhaul bill. The country is in political stasis leading up to presidential elections in April.

In Germany, the bipartisan coalition government under Chancellor Angela Merkel has struggled on most of the major challenges facing the country, including funding health care and pensions. Divisions between Ms. Merkel's conservatives and their center-left partners, the Social Democrats, have led to tortuous compromises; a recently agreed health-care overhaul, for instance, didn't solve the central problem of how to pay for rising future costs.

The move also could cause ripples in Afghanistan, where the North Atlantic Treaty Organization faces a resurgent Taliban. The catalyst of yesterday's events was a vote in Italy's Senate that was supposed to affirm the main tenets of its foreign policy, including the continued presence of 2,000 Italian troops in Afghanistan as part of the NATO mission there. The far left opposes the deployment. The government fell two votes short of the backing it sought.

The Bush administration has been lobbying NATO governments to increase their contributions to Afghanistan in advance of a feared springtime offensive by Taliban forces. President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, was in Brussels yesterday urging U.S. allies to contribute more troops. So far, European countries have been reluctant to boost their presence.

The collapse of Mr. Prodi's government after only eight months harkens back to a previous era in Italy. For the half-century following the ratification of its 1948 constitution, governments lasted less than a year on average. That often led to caretaker governments and early elections.

Sen. Mario Baldassarri, a former deputy economy minister, suggested yesterday that the best solution might be early elections. "It might be a good stimulus for Europe to have both France and Italy voting at around the same time," he said.

Prime Minister Quits On Afghanistan Vote (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

ROME - Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned yesterday after radical, anti-American senators demanding Italy withdraw troops from Afghanistan failed to support the center-left government, setting off an unexpected political crisis.

Mr. Prodi, a former Christian Democrat and former president of the European Commission, looked grim as he formally quit during an audience with President Giorgio Napolitano hours after the government was defeated by two votes on its Afghanistan policy in the upper house, where any chance for a majority would be razor thin.

The president, who asked Mr. Prodi to carry on in a caretaker capacity, may ask the prime minister to hold a full confidence vote in both houses of parliament, perhaps after a Cabinet reshuffle, political commentators said.

Government whips had prepared for the Senate vote carefully, but at least one "sharpshooter" from the Communist Refoundation party, on the hard left of the coalition, evidently abstained, political sources said. In all, 158 senators supported the government, 136 voted against and 24 abstained. Mr. Prodi needed 160 votes to muster a majority.

Before the vote, Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema pledged that Italian troops would remain in Afghanistan, but he said Italy would increase the civilian component in its mission.

Left-wing radicals in the Prodi government had demanded an Italian-sponsored peace conference on Afghanistan and insisted that Rome reject demands by Britain and the United States to change the rules of engagement governing the Italian troops, most of whom are based in Kabul.

Mr. Prodi was known to be concerned that the Italian contingent may be ordered into combat zones and take casualties when an expected Taliban offensive starts in the spring.

Ever since its inception last year, the government has come under pressure from its anti-American left wing on a constellation of foreign policy issues, and tension between Rome and Washington has ebbed and flowed.

DOJ_NMG_0135241

Mr. D'Alema, a former communist, flew into a rage recently when the U.S. ambassador and other Rome-based envoys published an open letter to Italians in a Rome daily underlining the importance of Italian troops in Afghanistan.

The government also has been under pressure from magistrates in Milan who want Mr. Prodi to press Washington for the extradition of CIA agents purportedly involved in the "extreme rendition" of an Egyptian imam, Abu Omar, who was kidnapped on a Milan street.

The Prodi government presided over the withdrawal of Italian troops from Iraq, although that had been decided by the previous government led by the conservative Silvio Berlusconi.

Mr. Prodi and Mr. D'Alema both criticized U.S. air raids in Somalia and the Bush administration plan for a troop surge in Iraq.

The government also has been under pressure over Mr. Prodi's approval of the extension of a U.S. military base at the northern city of Vicenza. Dozens of lawmakers took part in a rally against the extension at Vicenza on Saturday.

Supporters of Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party last night gathered outside the Palazzo Chigi, Mr. Prodi's office, chanting, "Prodi go home."

However, political commentators said Mr. Napolitano, himself a former communist, may want to give Mr. Prodi a second chance because his administration is only a few months old and followed a long period in office by Mr. Berlusconi.

Italian Premier Quits After Narrow Defeat Over Foreign Policy (WP)

By Sarah Delaney

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

ROME, Feb. 21 -- After just nine months at the helm of a shaky government, Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi handed in his resignation Wednesday when he lost a critical parliamentary vote over the government's foreign policy.

President Giorgio Napolitano asked Prodi to stay on as head of a caretaker government, and the day's frenetic events do not necessarily signal the end of Prodi's tenure as premier. Napolitano could ask him to try to form a new coalition after completing a round of consultations.

But Wednesday's vote did confirm the delicate nature of Prodi's disparate band of political allies, a fragility evident since the coalition's narrow victory last April.

The crisis in the center-left government opened up when a motion in the Senate to support a wide-ranging foreign policy address by Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema failed by two votes. In that speech, D'Alema called for continuation of the Italian role in NATO's Afghanistan mission and the expansion of a U.S. military base in northern Italy because refusal would be "a hostile act towards the U.S.A."

When the motion received 158 votes rather than the required 160, the side of the Senate occupied by the conservative opposition reacted with joy and members began chanting, "Resignation! Resignation!"

Senators on the other side stood silent, stunned by their apparent miscalculation.

Even though the vote was not binding as a confidence vote, D'Alema had tried to rein in the far left ahead of time by declaring that failure to reach a majority on such a crucial issue would send the government home.

The Prodi coalition eked out a 25,000-vote victory against the incumbent government led by Silvio Berlusconi in April, resulting in a comfortable margin in the lower Chamber of Deputies but a one-seat majority in the Senate. The refusal of two far-left senators to abandon their antiwar positions for the sake of political survival in Wednesday's vote assured the resolution's defeat.

Prodi's coalition includes nine parties, from Communists to Christian Democrats, and has faced problems on nearly every issue it has confronted.

The coalition showed serious cracks last weekend over a protest in Vicenza, where the United States wants to expand an Army base to allow for additional battalions of the 173rd Airborne Brigade, which is to deploy to Afghanistan. Tens of thousands participated in the peaceful protest, which was encouraged by some members of the government.

Prodi and D'Alema had nevertheless garnered support from most of the cabinet to go along with the expansion.

Major divisions have also appeared over Afghanistan, where Italy has about 1,800 troops. Some far-left members of the government oppose any Italian military involvement there and have called for those troops to be withdrawn.

Prodi has not faced pressure only from the left. A recent government move toward allowing legal recognition of cohabitating couples and homosexual unions risked alienating the coalition's Catholic component.

Napolitano, the president, has a few options: calling for votes of confidence in the Prodi government in both houses; asking someone else to try to form a government; or calling for another round of elections.

Crimes Of Politics (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0135242

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

HOW DOES A government prosecute people for crimes against humanity when the suspects happen to be running the government? That's the question facing Afghanistan, where men suspected of horrifying acts of rape and murder sit in parliament and hold other high offices.

The question of what to do about these suspected mass killers heated up Tuesday when the upper house of Afghanistan's parliament passed a resolution calling for amnesty for those accused of war crimes. The same resolution has already passed in the lower house and will become law if approved by President Hamid Karzai. Its success is unsurprising because many of those voting on the resolutions were previously regional warlords who might otherwise be subject to prosecution.

Following the Soviet pullout in 1989, Afghanistan was torn by years of civil war, during which warlords who had fought in the resistance movement began battling each other — and committing atrocities against civilian populations. Then, in 1996, the Taliban came to power, and it ruled until the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. At the time, the United States found these disaffected warlords to be convenient allies, but now they're creating some serious governance headaches.

The ideal solution for Afghanistan would be to create a body similar to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which, starting in 1996, helped heal the wounds left by decades of apartheid rule. Those who committed human rights abuses were granted amnesty if they publicly testified about their crimes. Yet South Africa, unlike Afghanistan, didn't have to contend with entrenched politicians who control large swaths of territory with armed militias. It also had the capacity to prosecute those who refused to step forward, while Afghan courts are a work in progress.

Nonetheless, the parliament's amnesty resolution is a step backward. It's hard for the Afghan people to have much faith in their government when many remember all too well the campaigns of terror waged by some of their current leaders. Where the government has no credibility, the rule of law doesn't hold sway.

So if court trials are an impossibility, reconciliation is impractical and amnesty is self-destructive, what's left? For now at least, the status quo. Karzai's best course would be to reject the amnesty law until the country is ready to face the horrors of its recent past. The international community, especially NATO, should be doing more to help Afghanistan build the institutions and civil society necessary for it to do so.

Pelosi Seeks Tougher Oversight On Ethics (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi called for tighter ethics rules in federal agencies Wednesday after government officials approved the purchase of a $980,000 vacation home by a top Justice Department lawyer with an oil company lobbyist.

Pelosi's criticism followed an Associated Press report last week that department ethics officials did not object when Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then head of the environment division, was buying a South Carolina beach house with Donald R. Duncan, the top Washington lobbyist for ConocoPhillips.

"If in fact Ms. Wooldridge got such a pass from the ethics committee of the executive branch, then certainly the executive branch ethics process needs a look as well," Pelosi, D-Calif., said when asked about the house purchase at a San Francisco news conference.

Nine months after the purchase, Wooldridge approved an agreement that allowed ConocoPhillips an extension of pollution cleanup requirements at some of the company's refineries. The company says Duncan was not part of those negotiations.

Department officials and a lawyer for Wooldridge, who resigned from the job in January, said the department's ethics office approved the arrangement and told her she did not need to withdraw from dealings with ConocoPhillips.

The third buyer of the Kiawah Island, S.C., home was Wooldridge's companion, former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles. He is the highest-ranking Bush administration official facing possible criminal charges in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is looking into the home purchase and consent decrees, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said in a letter Friday to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.

Conyers had asked for an explanation and documents related to the purchase after the AP report. The House Oversight and Government Reform Committee also is monitoring the case.

`Pink Rhinoceros' Not That Hard To See (CHIT)

By John Kass

Chicago Tribune, February 22, 2007

Seeking to overturn former Gov. George Ryan's corruption convictions, lawyer Gene Schaerr on Tuesday told a federal appellate court panel that "a pink rhinoceros" hung over the trial, making a fair jury verdict impossible, perhaps because the lone pro-Ryan holdout juror was bounced for failing to disclose her criminal record.

I thought that was why there were alternate jurors--if one or two are excused for cause, you've got a few on the B Team.

But the pink rhinoceros bit is so nice, I'll steal it and remind you of another pink rhinoceros.

Ed McNally is the pink rhinoceros of the U.S. Department of Justice.

He continues to work in the criminal division--though he had a whopping conflict of interest in the Ryan case--even as the Bush Department of Justice fires other prosecutors who actually hunt down political corruption.

"I'm aware of the allegations [against McNally]," Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales told me when he appeared before the Tribune's editorial board a while ago.

"They're very serious allegations," Gonzales said. "And the matter is being reviewed internally. I can say that."

That was six months ago, on Aug. 14, 2006.

Recently, seven U.S. attorneys of other districts were forced to resign, even though most received positive Justice Department job evaluations prior to their dismissals. Included among those let go are Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted the phenomenally corrupt and vulgar Republican U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

So they're gone. And Republican McNally is still very much employed.

Last year, McNally was the acting United States attorney for the Southern District of Illinois when he testified as a sympathetic defense witness for Ryan. Jurors were told that McNally left private practice to become a federal prosecutor after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Prior to becoming a federal prosecutor, McNally was a lawyer and partner with the firm Altheimer & Gray. That firm later went bankrupt, costing partners hundreds of thousands of dollars apiece.

And before the bankruptcy, one of McNally's clients was Gov. Ryan. During the Ryan trial, McNally took the stand and testified that the FBI and federal prosecutors from Chicago treated Ryan unfairly.

I've always wondered just how Ryan's former lawyer got himself named acting U.S. attorney in time to rip into the prosecution's case. Perhaps it was merely a coincidence. Or perhaps it involves Illinois Combine magic.

Unfortunately, or fortunately, McNally forgot to mention something. As a partner in Altheimer & Gray, he owed money to the firm's creditors. The law firm that handled the bankruptcy was Winston & Strawn.

That's the same Winston & Strawn that was run by former Gov. Jim Thompson, the same firm that handled George Ryan's free legal defense, which is estimated to have been worth about $20 million.

Altheimer & Gray partners who did not pay up in the bankruptcy deal risked being sued by Winston & Strawn. Five former Altheimer partners did not participate in the bankruptcy plan by the firm. Four of these were sued by Winston & Strawn. Only one partner wasn't sued: Ed McNally.

When the conflict was revealed, federal prosecutors got angry and Winston & Strawn defense attorneys howled that they knew nothing about it. All the lawyers took great umbrage, as lawyers often do.

The whole thing was allowed to slide, almost like snails off a rock in the garden at midnight, leaving a slimy trail, the kind that nobody wants to follow, except this was bigger, with pink rhinoceros droppings steaming on the ground.

In the seven months since Gonzales said the allegations against McNally were serious, consider:

Chicago U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald--no friend of the bi-partisan political combine of insiders who run things in this state--got stuck spending his time on the Scooter Libby-CIA leak case in Washington, rather than spending it hunting Republican and Democratic public corruption in Illinois.

Sun-Times columnist Mark Brown revealed in a fine column that Rodger Heaton, the new U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, had dinner in Springfield with two of the combine's cleanup hitters: Republicans Big Bill Cellini and Big Bob Kjellander, who haven't been indicted but are listed as Individual A and Individual K in the state pension fund scandal case.

That's just what a pink rhinoceros would do--publicly feed with Cellini and Kjellander, tell a few jokes and everybody in town gets the message.

Such creatures might be rare in other states, but in Illinois, we've got a surplus of rare wild things, of political weasels and pink rhinoceroses.

And for all the bleating and wailing you'll hear and read by Ryan mouthpieces about justice and fairness, remember the one they won't mention, the pink rhinoceros named Ed McNally.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Court Reverses Conviction Of Ex-Trading Specialist (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 22, 2007

In a blow to the office of Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia, a federal judge has taken the rare step of reversing a jury verdict convicting a former New York Stock Exchange trading specialist of securities fraud in a scheme known as "interpositioning."

Southern District Judge Denny Chin, in United States v. Finnerty, 05 cr. 393, agreed Wednesday to enter a judgment of acquittal, setting aside the Oct. 26, 2006, verdict.

Chin held that while federal prosecutors proved that defendant David Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, they failed to prove fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of the securities laws.

"I hold that the government did not ... establish that Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived," he said in a 37-page opinion.

In describing interpositioning, the judge said that instead of matching pending buy and sell orders, the specialists repeatedly trade for their company's proprietary account, making a profit from the slight differences in pricing.

Southern District prosecutors have had a difficult time proving criminal charges against Finnerty and 14 other floor specialist traders whom they accused of using their inside positions to earn an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their companies.

Before Wednesday's ruling, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District had already dropped charges against seven of the defendants. Besides Finnerty, two former traders (Michael Stern and Michael Hayward of Van der Moolen Specialists USA) were convicted, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large. (NYLJ, Aug. 10, 2006)

"The government [in these cases] provided no real evidence that customers were deceived," said Jacob Zamansky, a plaintiffs attorney at Zamansky & Associates who specializes in securities litigation but did not represent any of the defendants in the interpositioning cases. "This almost looks like a victimless crime."

Finnerty was employed by Fleet Specialist beginning around 1996. From September 2000 until April 2003, he brought together buyers and sellers of General Electric stock, among others.

"Indeed, Finnerty was so successful ... that he would, on occasion, be interviewed by CNBC about the market, and was featured in newspaper articles about the NYSE," Judge Chin said in his decision.

That career came to a screeching halt in 2005, when Finnerty, 40, was indicted on charges that he engaged in a scheme that involved positioning his company between buyers and sellers in order to make money for Fleet Specialist, which in turn increased his bonuses.

The government said Finnerty's actions resulted in his cheating investors of $4.5 million, but attorneys for Finnerty said the government failed to demonstrate this harm.

"They ... provided no evidence that [Finnerty's actions] resulted in the loss of one penny to public customers," Frederick P. Hafetz, a partner at New York's Hafetz & Necheles who represented Finnerty, said during closing arguments in the case in October. (NYLJ, Oct. 26, 2006)

In his decision Wednesday, Judge Chin said prosecutors adequately demonstrated that Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, but failed to prove that customers expected one thing and got something different as a result of his actions.

"Without evidence of what the customers expected, no rational juror could conclude that the ... trades had a tendency to deceive or the power to mislead," Chin said. "A juror would only be able to reach that conclusion by speculating -- impermissibly -- as to what customers expected."

The judge said that if the judgment of acquittal is later vacated or reversed on appeal by the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, a new trial would be granted.

He took prosecutors to task for their repeated reference during the trial to 26,300 instances of interpositioning. He said this number was "unduly prejudicial" and "clearly and significantly overstated."

"I am confident that the Government did not inflate the numbers intentionally, but it appears that the Government failed to account for numerous circumstances when Finnerty was not executing the trades himself -- he was not on the floor or he was at his post or he was negotiating with the crowd or otherwise engaged in non-trading activity," Chin said.

Hafetz said Wednesday that these "inflated numbers" prevented his client from receiving a fair trial.

He added that Chin's decision "is a vindication" of Finnerty.

DOJ_NMG_0135245

Finnerty was fired by Fleet Specialist, now Banc of America Specialist, in 2003. The company itself has never admitted any wrongdoing. However, its former president and chief supervisory specialist was fined $125,000 by the stock exchange.

In addition to Hafetz, Finnerty was represented by Tracy E. Sivitz, an associate at the firm.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Lauren Goldberg and Anirudh Bansal prosecuted the case. A spokesperson for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment.

JUDGE: FEDS FAILED (NYPOST)

By Roddy Boyd

The New York Post, February 22, 2007

A federal judge yesterday took the very rare step of throwing out a jury's conviction of former New York Stock Exchange specialist David Finnerty, citing a lack of evidence to support a guilty finding.

In granting Finnerty's motion to set aside the verdict, Judge Denny Chin wrote that federal prosecutors failed to establish that "Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived."

The ruling is a stinging rebuke for prosecutors, who have had little success in winning convictions in their high-profile and wide-ranging campaign against corrupt trading practices at the Big Board.

The April 2005 indictments filed against 15 specialists shook up Wall Street.

However, the pursuant collapse of many of the cases that prosecutors filed has stunned the legal world.

The Southern District's prosecutors, who generally achieve conviction rates of between 80 and 90 percent, managed to win just two partial convictions and two plea deals.

The partial convictions - of two partners at Van Der Moolen Specialists USA - are currently on appeal.

Seven specialists saw charges against them dropped and two were acquitted. Another defendant remains at large.

In October, Finnerty, who had worked for Fleet Specialists, was convicted of fraud for abusing his market-making position to profit at customer expense. He was facing 20 years in prison.

Though it is rare for a judge to set aside a conviction, Chin had expressed his concern about the verdict in October.

Chin framed his problems with the jury's verdict in a series of open-ended questions in his opinion.

"Did customers even know that a specialist could trade for his proprietary account?" Chin wrote.

"Did customers assume that the specialist was providing services without charge?"

Coming back to prosecutors' allegations that Finnerty illegally inter-positioned about 26,300 trades, Chin said, "This number is clearly and significantly overstated."

A spokeswoman for the Southern District of New York said, "We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options."

U.S. Judge Voids Guilty Verdict Of Big Board Specialist In G.E. (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

A judge took the unusual step yesterday of reversing a jury verdict, finding that the evidence did not support the conviction of a former New York Stock Exchange supervisor who once oversaw trading in General Electric stock.

The supervisor, David A. Finnerty, had been convicted of securities fraud in October by a jury in United States District Court in Manhattan.

Judge Denny Chin said he was reversing the verdict and ordering an acquittal because prosecutors had failed to prove that Mr. Finnerty engaged in fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of securities laws.

The ruling was the latest blow to the pursuit of federal criminal charges against 15 New York Stock Exchange floor supervisors accused of using their positions to make an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their firms.

Prosecutors had already dropped charges against seven defendants. Two others were convicted in addition to Mr. Finnerty, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large.

Judge Chin said that if his order of acquittal were later reversed by an appeals court, he would grant a request for a new trial.

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan, Yusill Scribner, had no comment on the reversal.

Prosecutors said the specialists had violated rules requiring them to match buyers and sellers at the best possible prices, and were not permitted to buy or sell a stock with their own firm's money unless only one party was seeking the transaction.

Specialists run the open-outcry auctions on the floor of the exchange, matching buy and sell orders for the stocks they oversee. They also use their firms' money to buy shares when no one else wants to buy, as well as sell shares from their own inventory when no one wants to sell.

Mr. Finnerty worked for Fleet Specialists, overseeing all trading in the stock of G.E. from 2000 to 2003 before he was charged with three counts of securities fraud. He faced more than 20 years in prison for the conviction.

U.S. Won't Seek To Restore Fraud Conviction Of Ex-Westar Officials (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 22, 2007

The government will not try to reinstate the fraud convictions of two former Westar Energy executives, prosecutors said yesterday.

The United States attorney's office in Topeka, Kan., said it would not ask an appeals court in Denver to reconsider its decision in January to reverse the convictions of the executives, David C. Wittig and Douglas T. Lake. The appeals court said that evidence at the trial did not justify the guilty verdicts.

Mr. Wittig, the former chief executive, and Mr. Lake, a former vice president, were accused of looting Westar, a public utility based in Topeka. They were convicted in 2005 of money laundering and wire fraud.

"We had until Feb. 20 to notify the 10th Circuit whether we wanted to ask for a rehearing," a government spokesman, Jim Cross, said, referring to the federal appeals court in Denver. "We have allowed that deadline to pass."

The court said prosecutors could not retry the wire fraud and money laundering counts, but could retry some lesser claims. Mr. Cross said that prosecutors had not decided on a retrial.

The remaining charges "have to do with personal use of a corporate plane," said Mr. Wittig's lawyer, Steven Alan Reiss, of Weil, Gotshal & Manges in New York.

"Right now, we're hopeful the government will reach the right decision and decide that twice was enough and not proceed any further," Mr. Reiss said. The first trial on the charges ended in a hung jury in 2004.

Mr. Lake's lawyer, Seth Waxman, did not immediately return a call for comment.

The executives did not tell shareholders that they would have been the main beneficiaries of a plan to spin off Westar's utility business and pursue a merger with Public Service Company of New Mexico, prosecutors said. Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake would have shared as much as $90 million, prosecutors said at the trial.

Software Firm To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Veritas Software agreed to pay $30 million to resolve civil fraud charges connected to an improper advertising deal it signed with AOL during the Internet boom's waning days.

A Securities and Exchange Commission complaint accused Veritas and AOL of Dulles of simultaneously wiring payments to each other as part of an improper, unwritten "round-trip" agreement. Both companies used the deal to inflate revenue, the complaint said. For Veritas, the transaction added 2 cents per share to its fourth-quarter and annual earnings in 2000, allowing it to beat Wall Street expectations.

Court papers filed in the District late Tuesday also accused Veritas of engaging in a series of accounting maneuvers to smooth its financial results into "museum quality" reports from 2000 through 2002. Among other things, the company used "wish lists" prepared by employees in its finance and operations unit to build cushions of expenses to make its earnings appear steadier.

Veritas, which was acquired nearly two years ago by Symantec and is a wholly owned subsidiary, neither admitted nor denied the allegations. It has restated its financials twice: once to reverse $20 million it had booked as part of the AOL deal and again to correct problems with its profit-smoothing practices.

In a statement, a spokeswoman for Symantec said the company had set aside the settlement funds in reserve. The spokeswoman also pointed out that Symantec, one of the nation's largest providers of data security software, is not named in the complaint.

The case is a leftover from an era when technology companies struggled to meet the expectations of analysts and investors. AOL, which was then known as America Online and has since been absorbed by Time Warner, paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges about its financial dealings.

Action on Veritas stalled for nearly two years, however, in part because the five-member SEC, which must approve recommendations from agency enforcement staff, had been stuck over how to proceed in the case.

Ultimately, SEC commissioners agreed to approve the settlement after intense deliberations. In a news release, the agency took pains to note that the $30 million penalty had been negotiated before the SEC issued a policy directive last year concerning when regulators may impose fines on companies.

DOJ_NMG_0135247

That directive is designed to take into account such factors as whether shareholders benefited from fraudulent accounting in determining if companies must shell out money to pay regulatory fines. Panel members including Republican Commissioner Paul S. Atkins have expressed concern that investors should not be penalized twice.

Securities officials said they continue to probe problems at Veritas.

"The fraud was planned and implemented at the highest levels of the company," SEC associate enforcement director Scott W. Friestad said in an interview. "Former management lied to the auditors and misled investors by withholding material information about the company's financial results. As our investigation continues, we will be turning our attention to those responsible for the misconduct."

EDITORIAL: Fannie's Pay (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

At a truly private company, withholding more than $40 million in bonuses tied to fraudulent earnings would be a no-brainer. But Fannie Mae is neither a normal business nor exactly private, even if its shares are in private hands. So this week's announcement that current and former top executives at the mortgage giant wouldn't be receiving $44.4 million in Fannie Mae shares has to count as progress.

Daniel Mudd, the current CEO, will lose $4.1 million, while Franklin Raines, the former CEO ousted over the $6 billion accounting scandal, will have to forgo $11.4 million. This comes on top of the news last year that Ofheo, Fannie Mae's federal regulator, would seek to claw back about $100 million in performance bonuses that had already been paid out. That case is pending.

The optimistic view of yesterday's news is that Fannie, chastened by the accounting fraud and a newly invigorated regulator under Ofheo Director James Lockhart is beginning to act more like an ordinary company and less like the local bully in Washington.

On the other hand, Fannie's friends got more powerful with the Democratic takeover of Congress. The Bush Administration has been trying to negotiate a compromise with Barney Frank & Co. to reform oversight of Fannie and its sibling Freddie Mac, but it remains to be seen how much power a new regulator will have in any bill that could pass a Democratic Congress.

Amazingly, nobody involved in the fraud has faced criminal charges, a fact that would have the press and the corporate scolds in Congress up in arms if a $6 billion fraud had been perpetrated at any company other than Fannie or Fred. Still, not paying real bonuses tied to fake earnings is better than nothing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Fate Now Rests In The Hands Of The Jury (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

A federal jury ended its first day of deliberations yesterday in the perjury trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby after the presiding judge urged jurors to rely on their "life experiences" in deciding whether the vice president's former chief of staff lied to investigators -- or made an honest mistake -- about his role in a CIA leak.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton's instructions to the jury of eight women and four men reinforced the issue of the fallibility of human memory that has been central to one of Washington's most celebrated trials in years.

Prosecutors allege that Libby, then Vice President Cheney's top aide, lied to FBI agents and a federal grand jury to obscure the fact that, in the spring and summer of 2003, he aggressively sought out and shared with reporters information about Valerie Plame, an undercover CIA officer. Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, who was emerging then as a harsh, early critic of President Bush and the Iraq war.

The only person accused in the three-year CIA leak investigation, Libby, 56, is charged with five felonies: two counts of making false statements to FBI agents, two counts of perjury and one count of obstructing justice. He is not charged with the leak itself. If convicted of all charges, he would face a potential prison term of 1 1/2 to three years under federal sentencing guidelines, prosecutors outside the case have said.

Libby's attorneys contend that Libby did not intentionally lie, but inaccurately remembered his conversations about Wilson and Plame with administration colleagues and Washington journalists.

The trial has delved deeply into a volatile period inside the White House shortly after the war began, when the administration was vulnerable to political attack because no proof had turned up of Iraqi weapons of mass destruction that Bush had cited to justify the war.

DOJ_NMG_0135248

Evidence and 14 days of testimony have shown that Cheney, Libby and other top administration officials sought to discredit Wilson, who was sent by the CIA to Africa in 2002 and concluded that there was no basis for reports that Iraq had tried to buy nuclear materials there. Prosecutors have asserted that Libby told reporters and a White House press secretary about Plame as part of the campaign to tarnish her husband by suggesting that the CIA chose him for the mission because of nepotism.

Before the jurors began deliberations late yesterday morning, Walton provided them guidelines for sifting through the prosecution and defense's contradictory depictions of Libby's memory and the memories of other witnesses.

The judge instructed them to use their "common-sense experience" to assess such factors as how long people can be expected to retain clear memories, the nature of the person or event they were asked to recall, the circumstances that existed at the time and their impressions of the "memory capacity" of the people whose memories were questioned.

"Making an honest statement that turns out to be inaccurate or wrong . . . does not rise to the level of criminal conduct," Walton said. On the other hand, the judge emphasized that the jury should consider inconsistencies the prosecution cited in Libby's account of events.

The jurors have been largely attentive during weeks of complex testimony. Many have taken notes and, under a practice that Walton allows, some have questioned virtually all 19 witnesses at the end of each one's testimony.

At the outset of the trial, potential jurors were screened during lengthy questioning by both sides. Defense attorneys filtered out District residents who said they have negative opinions of the Bush administration or the war. The result is a jury that is relatively apolitical. Many of the jurors are highly educated.

Although most District residents are African American, the jury includes six white women, four white men and two black women.

Under rules Walton set yesterday, the jury will deliberate every weekday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Jury Has CIA Leak Case To Decide Former Cheney Aide's Fate On Perjury, Obstruction Charges (AP)

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Jurors reached no verdict in their first 4 1/2 hours of deliberation on whether Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief aide obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic.

The eight women and four men on the jury heard 14 days of testimony about I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, a day of closing arguments and more than an hour of instructions Wednesday from U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton before beginning their discussions. After 4 1/2 hours of deliberation, the jurors went home until Thursday.

The jurors include a former Washington Post reporter, an economist, a retired math teacher, a former museum curator, a law firm accountant, a Web architect and several retired or current federal workers. There are 10 whites and two blacks, unusual in a city where blacks outnumber whites more than 2-to-1.

Libby, who was Cheney's chief of staff and national security adviser, faces five felony counts that carry a combined top penalty of 30 years in prison. If convicted, Libby probably would be sentenced to far less under federal guidelines.

The trial provided behind-the-scenes details of the interaction between top reporters and government officials and of Cheney's efforts to rebut criticism of him and the administration.

The investigation began with the public identification of CIA operative Valerie Plame on July 14, 2003, eight days after her husband, ex-Ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly accused the Bush administration of distorting intelligence to push the nation into war with Iraq.

Months later, Libby told the FBI and a grand jury that he first learned that Plame worked for the CIA from Cheney on June 11. But he said that amid the press of war issues and other national security concerns, he forgot that and was surprised to learn it from NBC television newsman Tim Russert on July 10 or 11. Thereafter, he said he told reporters he had heard the information only from journalists and could not confirm it.

Russert testified he and Libby never discussed Plame. Judith Miller, who had been a reporter with The New York Times, testified Libby told her about Plame's CIA job before the Russert conversation. Matt Cooper, then of Time magazine, testified Libby confirmed her employment for him. Six government officials testified they either told Libby about Plame's job or discussed it with him between June 11 and July 10 or 11.

Walton explained to the jurors that they must weigh the truth of several statements by Libby in the various counts.

On the obstruction count, Walton said they could find Libby guilty should they unanimously decide any one, or more, of three Libby statements were lies: that Russert asked Libby if Plame worked at CIA and said all the reporters knew it; that Libby was surprised to learn the Plame information from Russert; or that Libby told Cooper he had heard it from reporters but did not know it was true.

On one count of lying to the FBI, jurors could find Libby guilty if they found either or both of his statements about the Russert call were lies, Walton explained. The other count of lying to the FBI hinges on Libby's statement about the Cooper call.

On two counts of perjury, jurors would have to weigh various Libby statements to the grand jury about how he learned about Plame's job and whom he told, including four separate statements in one count, Walton said.

Prosecutors argued that Libby concocted lies to make his discussions of Plame with reporters appear to be innocent gossip so that he would not risk losing his job for giving them classified information without authorization.

The defense argued that Libby had an innocent lapse of memory, and his lawyer attempted to show that government witnesses also had memory flaws.

Libby Perjury Hearing Casts Cloud Over Cheney (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

As a Washington jury starts its deliberations on Thursday on whether Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former chief of staff of Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, is guilty of perjury and obstruction of justice, he is not the only one whose reputation has come under suspicion.

"There is a cloud over the vice-president," Patrick Fitz-gerald, special prosecutor, told the jury on Tuesday. "He sent Libby off to the meeting with Judy [Judith Miller, a New York Times reporter] where Plame was discussed. That cloud is something that we just can't pretend isn't there."

Despite this encroaching shadow over the vice-president, the hearings have failed to ignite as the political show-trial over Iraq that many anti-war critics had hoped for. Indeed, the complexity and frequent triviality of the trial has put off all but the most seasoned Beltway observers.

If the defence fails, Mr Libby faces up to 30 years in prison and the ignominy of becoming the highest serving Bush administration official to face jail. But unlike Mr Cheney and the president's chief political adviser, Karl Rove, who have also been named in connection with the case, he is not a well-known figure, and any public relations damage will be limited.

The case goes back to a New York Times article from July 6 2003 by Joseph Wilson, a former ambassador. The piece, "What I didn't find in Africa", described how he found no evidence in Niger that Iraq was seeking uranium for weapons of mass destruction. The Niger claim was a critical part of the case for war in President George W. Bush's State of the Union speech in 2003 and the White House and the vice-president's office, furious at Mr Wilson's article, determined to rebut the man who had challenged their credibility.

Mr Cheney's scribbled question on a copy of the New York Times article was the most controversial part of the rebuttal. "Did his wife send him on a junket?" Mr Cheney had written. Mr Wilson's wife was Valerie Plame, a CIA agent, and, in rebutting the New York Times article, administration officials – including Mr Rove, the former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer and Mr Libby – mentioned her to reporters.

When Ms Plame's identity made it into print on July 14 2003 the publication was seen as having breached a law banning the naming of covert US agents.

No official was charged with the underlying leak, but Mr Libby's current perjury charges stem from testimony he made before a grand jury and the FBI during the investigation. As a result, instead of being about the leak, the trial has been about the alleged cover-up and has descended into titillating revelations about the Washington media.

Those attending discovered how Ms Miller kept some notes in a plastic bag under her desk and how an adviser to Mr Cheney sought to exploit the dislike that Tim Russert, host of NBC's Meet the Press, felt for a rival talk-show host. The jury enjoyed a voyeuristic masterclass in how Bob Woodward, the veteran investigative journalist, entices his sources to open up, hearing Mr Woodward's taped interview with former deputy secretary of state Richard Armitage, who then told him about Ms Plame.

The defence's argument has been that Mr Libby was made a scapegoat by the White House to protect Mr Rove from prosecution. They have argued he merely forgot how he found out about Ms Plame, amid the pressure of national security matters, turning the trial into a "he said, she said" case. On Tuesday his counsel melodramatically shed tears at the close of final statements and turned away to dab them as he returned to Mr Libby's side.

Even if Mr Libby is convicted, questions will remain about Mr Cheney's role in directing his aide to rebut Mr Wilson, and his intervention to force Mr Fleischer to make a public statement exonerating Mr Libby.

DOJ_NMG_0135250

But an acquittal would also carry risks for Mr Fitz-gerald. It could lead to criticism that he prosecuted what turned out to be a trivial case. It could also underline that he failed to prosecute anyone for the initial crime he was appointed to investigate: who it was who leaked the name of Ms Plame.

Jury In Libby Case Begins Deliberations (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — The jury deciding the perjury case against I. Lewis Libby Jr. began deliberating late Wednesday morning.

The jury, eight women and four men, heard nearly a month of evidence and testimony, capped Wednesday with an hourlong set of instructions from Judge Reggie B. Walton.

The jurors will resume work Thursday morning.

Mr. Libby faces five felony counts on charges that he lied to a grand jury and to agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who were investigating the leak in 2003 of the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative, Valerie Wilson.

Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed publicly in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert Novak just days after The New York Times published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, criticizing the Bush administration.

After complaints that Bush loyalists had leaked Ms. Wilson's name to punish her husband for his criticism, a special prosecutor was named to investigate how her identity had been disclosed.

The prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, did not charge anybody with illegally disclosing Ms. Wilson's name, but he brought a case of perjury, obstruction of justice and false statements against Mr. Libby, who was chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney and had been assigned to counter Mr. Wilson's assertions.

Jurors Begin Deliberations In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in the Lewis "Scooter" Libby trial began deliberations today in a case that could bring the former vice presidential aide up to 30 years in prison if convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice.

Federal Judge Reggie Walton delivered about an hour of legal instructions to the jury today after they heard more than six hours of closing arguments Tuesday.

The summations were starkly different, as the defense sought to portray Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, as forgetful while the prosecutors called him a liar.

"Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration," a tearful Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, told jurors in his closing arguments.

If during deliberations a juror says, "'He's a Republican, he works for Cheney, let's do him,'" that juror must be discouraged, Wells said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued that the Bush administration's attempts to discredit an Iraq war critic, and Libby's role in it, are at the heart of the case against him. "There's a cloud over the White House as to what happened here," Fitzgerald said. "Don't you think the American people deserve to know?"

Libby, 56, is charged with lying when he told investigators and later grand jurors in 2003 and 2004 how he learned that Valerie Plame, wife of administration critic Joseph Wilson, worked at the CIA. Libby said he learned the information from Cheney, forgot, then heard it a month later from NBC newsman Tim Russert.

Russert testified in Libby's trial and to the grand jury that he didn't tell Libby about Plame.

Libby also faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice based on a conversation about Plame with Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine Washington correspondent.

Only the shaky memories of two reporters with credibility problems held together the case against Libby, Wells said.

"It's what I mean by 'he said, she said,' " Wells said. "They want you to make a choice beyond a reasonable doubt that (would leave) my client's life destroyed."

Fitzgerald countered that Libby concocted the Russert story and lied about his conversation with Cooper to sidetrack an investigation into who leaked Plame's identity to reporters.

In February 2002, the CIA sent Wilson, a former ambassador, to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

No one was indicted for leaking information about Wilson's wife despite an investigation that lasted over two years.

Libby, Fitzgerald said, feared being fired or prosecuted for leaking confidential information. By sourcing the story back to reporters, he said, Libby believed his role would remain secret.

DOJ_NMG_0135251

"He made a gamble that he's going to tell them a story about the rumors and hope it goes away," Fitzgerald said. "He threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

The prosecution used a large interactive screen to rebut Libby's version of events. Peter Zeidenberg, a Fitzgerald assistant, posted in succession the names of eight people who spoke with Libby about Plame between June 11, 2003, and about July 10, when Libby said Russert told him about Plame.

"Ladies and gentlemen, that's not forgetting," Zeidenberg said. "That's lying."

Wells directed jurors away from those witnesses, whom he called "background evidence." Jurors must focus, he said, on the Russert and Cooper conversations at the core of the charges.

"This is just about different recollections of conversations with different reporters," Wells said.

It's "crazy," Wells said, to believe Libby invented that Russert told him about Plame. Libby, he said, didn't know Russert and believed investigators would likely call the newsman to verify the account. Russert's network, NBC, was hostile to the White House, Wells argued.

Politics Meets Intelligence At Trial (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As jurors began deliberating the fate of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, one outcome of his perjury trial seemed clear: The case has added fuel to calls for a broader examination of how intelligence was used in political arguments in the past six years.

Moreover, some current and former administration officials say, the trial's airing of the use of intelligence -- especially over the Iraq war -- threatens to further undermine confidence in American claims on other sensitive matters. That could be a particular problem in the U.S. campaign to convince the world to curb Iran's nuclear program.

The Libby trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress. Senate and House Democrats are pursuing new inquiries after a recent Defense Department Inspector General's report criticized the pre-war Pentagon intelligence program run by former Defense Undersecretary Douglas J. Feith.

Already, the Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. Yesterday, a jury of eight women and four men began weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

In any case, the trial has provided congressional intelligence officials with extensive information on how the vice president's office functioned semi-autonomously in pushing foreign-policy initiatives. These officials said the information could prove helpful in continuing investigations into how public statements made by the president and vice president differed from the underlying intelligence provided by the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

Richard Ben-Veniste, former Democratic counsel to the Senate Whitewater Committee and head of the Watergate special prosecutor's office, says the trial has served "to reveal the inner workings of the vice president's office, and particularly the willingness to declassify information to assist in the damage control effort that appeared to be entirely political in nature."

Meanwhile, the Pentagon report said that as Mr. Feith assembled his intelligence reports -- highlighting, in particular, alleged links between Iraq and al Qaeda terrorists -- his office briefed four key officials, Mr. Libby among them. The report said the Pentagon office presented its findings to the White House as a conclusive intelligence assessment, though the CIA strongly opposed those findings.

Mr. Feith has complained bitterly that the report, and the congressional response to it, distorts what was a legitimate effort to raise questions about intelligence conclusions, not to distort them.

The latest controversies come as the administration faces challenges from foreign governments and U.S. lawmakers skeptical of its recent claims that Tehran is supplying Shiite militias in Iraq with munitions and arms. Critics accuse the White House of mimicking the tactics used in building the case for war against Iraq in 2002 and 2003.

Administration officials voice exasperation over the response, saying U.S. intelligence agencies have developed extensive evidence of Iran's involvement in Iraq. They also say that changes in the intelligence community since the Iraq war have significantly improved U.S. intelligence.

"It's frustrating for the entire process," says one intelligence official working on Iran. "The whole message is being challenged."

Scooter Libby And Reputation (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

"There used to be a time when big cases were investigated a different way in this country. Maybe something's gone horribly wrong."

-- Federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, 2006

The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is the closest version of a Red Queen trial this country has had in a long time. One says that knowing it might start a stampede from past defendants laying claim to the most upside-down prosecution.

Lewis G. Carroll's account of the Knave' s trial before the Red Queen and White Rabbit is famous for the Queen's dictum, "Sentence first, verdict afterward." But read the full transcript of the mock trial and one will see that the real subject is not justice, but the humiliation of the defendant.

The trial of Scooter Libby in Washington, the national capital of illogic, has been exemplary. In December 2003, the prosecutor purports a crime has been committed by revealing a "covert" CIA agent's identity to the press -- despite knowing then what the outside world learned nearly three years later -- that the revealer of the agent was a State Department official, Richard Armitage. With the "whodunnit" solved on day one, the prosecution follows the Red Queen's script by taking the nation on a useless, joyless ride through the opaque looking-glass of Washington journalism.

The testimony of three of the world's most sophisticated journalists -- Judith Miller, Matthew Cooper and Tim Russert -- was the trial's closest thing to the White Rabbit reading nonsense verse to the jury: "For this must ever be a secret, kept from all the rest, between yourself and me."

The Libby case went to the jury yesterday. After the verdict, all the characters in this satire on Beltway mores will go back to doing what they did before, except for one -- Scooter Libby.

If found guilty, Mr. Libby goes to prison. He is ruined. If acquitted, he loses only that which he built daily the past 35 years of private and public life -- his reputation. This, too, is ruin.

Purified justice notwithstanding, something here has gone "horribly wrong."

As is increasingly true of politics, American justice today has come to look more like mortal combat, the videogame. Notions of proportionality have eroded. Crimes that are minor crimes, civil offenses or mere hardball politics like the Plame case must be elevated to a capital offense. Eliot Spitzer's pursuit of AIG founder Hank Greenberg rose to a bonfire of never-proven criminal charges that put the torch to the company and Mr. Greenberg before burning down to its current ash of alleged civil offenses against him.

DOJ_NMG_0135253

Under the constant stare of the media Cyclops, prosecutors can't back down and justice in 21st-century America degrades to swamp justice. Exhibit A: the Duke lacrosse-team prosecution. Judge Lewis Kaplan, in the federal government's recent KPMG prosecution, sat in appalled disbelief as federal prosecutors attempted to reduce 18 defendants to rubble.

It was ever thus that big cases produce drama that's hard to resist. Not least is the spectacle of a once-in-a-lifetime defendant, a Scooter Libby, virtually bankrupting himself to avoid guilt. Labor Secretary Ray Donovan's 1987 remark on acquittal will explain why unto eternity: "Which office do I go to to get my reputation back?"

No dramas will be written, though, about the aftermath for such a defendant. But maybe one should. Consider the case of Salim Lewis.

Thirty years ago on Wall Street, Salim "Sandy" Lewis was a household name. His father Salim co-built Bear Stearns, and he in turn made his reputation in the high-stakes corporate-merger cycle of the 1980s. He worked without legal or disciplinary taint until he was 49. In 1986 a federal prosecutor named Rudolph Giuliani indicted him for securities violations.

His accuser was Boyd Jeffries, the criminal acolyte of famed financial criminal Ivan Boesky. The case itself was arcane. Outraged at a short-selling practice legal at the time, Mr. Lewis urged Jeffries to engage in a stock transaction to thwart the short sellers. A subsequent court called what he did "an act of market vigilantism, in which Mr. Lewis in no way personally profited." And indeed the short-selling practice he attacked was later outlawed. Still, his own act was illegal.

Rudy Giuliani indicted him on 22 counts. He pleaded guilty to three, facing 15 years. Judge Mary Johnson Lowe reduced it to three years probation, an act of now-antique proportionality. The SEC got an injunction banning Mr. Lewis for life from the securities business; this was the core of a reputation the court record had shown steeped in good works. He sought to restore it.

In 2001, he received a pardon from President Clinton (later called "a bona fide pardon on the merits" by a federal judge). The SEC bar order remained. He again sought relief in court, and this past summer Judge William Conner of the Southern District (aka Wall Street) lifted the lifetime bar, saying "we cannot ignore the inequity inherent in the injunction." It took only 20 years.

Nor does innocence guard reputation. Back then prosecutor Giuliani flamboyantly arrested Richard Wigton (30 blameless years with Kidder, Peabody) and a youthful arbitrager named Timothy Tabor. They were handcuffed. Two years later, the charges against both were dropped. No matter. Both had been led through the media bonfire. They were ruined.

Some of this reputational destruction can be explained as random events -- having the bad luck to draw a politically ambitious prosecutor (Messrs. Giuliani and Spitzer) or the fanaticism inherent to special prosecutors. But something more harsh and bitter is in the water now.

Incredibly, Scooter Libby and Ray Donovan had the same lawyer, Ted Wells. So did Sandy Lewis then and KPMG today, Stanley Arkin. Mr. Arkin thinks it's worse now.

"We use the word 'criminal' very promiscuously" today, he told me. Legal standards and ethics require a neutral review up to the decision to indict, but too often, Mr. Arkin says, "You do not have neutral review. We get a poor quality of magisterial review in this country."

It is a travesty that the Valerie Plame bump-and-run case brought Lewis Libby to the edge of this cliff. Primary blame belongs to the Bush Justice Department's abdication of responsibility. So now a former Manhattan prosecutor is running for president. Electoral vagaries willing, one can think of no one better qualified to restore the meaning of "criminal" to its proper intent.

Guard Sentenced In Prison Sex Scandal (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

A former federal prison guard was sentenced Wednesday to a year of home detention and three years probation for his role in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a deadly gun battle last summer.

E. Lavon Spence, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud in October, was sentenced by Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle in federal court.

Prison time "would affect the recovery" of Spence from his November stroke at the age of 40, Hinkle said.

A Justice Department special agent was killed and a prison officer was wounded in June when they came to arrest the six guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. One of the guards, Ralph Hill, was also killed in the gunfight Hill started.

Three of the guards have already been sentenced to a year in prison, with two also receiving three years of probation after their release. A fourth guard was sentenced to a year of probation.

A telephone message left at the office of Spence's attorney was not immediately returned.

Former DOD Civilian Guilty Of Taking Bribe (S&S)

By Charlie Coon, Stars and Stripes

Stars and Stripes, February 22, 2007

A former employee of U.S. Special Operations Command Europe in Stuttgart, Germany, pleaded guilty on Friday to accepting bribes in return for steering work to a Romania- and Iraq-based contractor.

Steven Merkes, who worked as a logistical planner, faces up to two years in prison and $250,000 in fines for performing acts for Philip Bloom in return for $24,000 in cash and future employment, according to a Justice Department news release.

Sentencing for Merkes is scheduled for June 1.

Bloom, one of the ringleaders in a wide-ranging scheme to defraud the former Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq, was sentenced Friday to 46 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for committing bribery and money-laundering and conspiring to defraud.

Both cases were tried in U.S. District Court in Washington.

According to the Justice Department, Merkes worked at the special operations command, or SOCEUR, as an airman until January 2005, and afterward as a Defense Department civilian employee.

In both positions, Merkes' official duties consisted of planning military exercises for special operations forces in the European theater, according to the Justice Department.

The U.S. European Command, which is headquartered in Stuttgart and oversees SOCEUR, had little to say about Merkes' conviction.

"Mr. Merkes worked here, but he left in early 2006," according to a statement by the U.S. European Command public affairs office. "We know of no illegal activity while he was here.

"We have no knowledge of the allegations or the investigation being conducted by Department of Justice."

Bloom, 67, of Bucharest, Romania, was at the center of a scandal that resulted in the arrests of at least four servicemembers and three civilians. One of the civilians, Robert Stein, was sentenced Jan. 29 to nine years in prison for charges including weapons possession.

Stein, a former comptroller with the Coalition Provisional Authority, was convicted of, among other crimes, stealing money from the Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq that was funneled to Bloom for the purchase of assault rifles, silencers and grenade launchers, for personal use in the United States, according to the Justice Department.

Bloom has cooperated with the investigation.

Others charged in the case include Col. Curtis Whiteford, Lt. Cols. Debra Harrison, Michael Wheeler and Bruce D. Hopfengardner, and civilians Michael Morris and William Driver.

Lessons Lurking In Fumo's '80 Case? (PHI)

By Emilie Lounsberry

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 22, 2007

The case was federal, and one of the defendants was State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo. But the year was 1980, and that was another era in Philadelphia politics and in FBI corruption probes.

Fumo was 37 and serving his first term in Harrisburg as the successor to another local political legend - State Sen. Henry "Buddy" Cianfrani, who had been sent to federal prison.

Though the 1980 case is more than a quarter-century old, it shows that Fumo, the powerful Philadelphia Democrat charged Feb. 6 in a blistering federal indictment, has been down this road before - and won.

Though a jury found Fumo guilty, along with former city Democratic Party chief Peter J. Camiel and former State Sen. Thomas M. Nolan, a judge overturned the verdict and acquitted all three - a giant victory for political figures who faced possible prison sentences.

Now, just as military strategists study old wars, lawyers who specialize in federal criminal cases say they expect both sides of United States of America v. Fumo to study the pages of the 1980 trial - especially Fumo's testimony.

"It's relevant and important to both prosecution and defense to examine that," said veteran defense lawyer Nicholas J. Nastasi, who represented Camiel in the posttrial litigation of the 1980 case.

The old case offers insight about how Fumo, as a defendant, conducted himself on the witness stand. It lays out how some of the city's top defense lawyers fought at trial, and on appeal. And, lawyers familiar with both cases said, the 1980 charges have some elements in common with the new indictment.

"It's not an entirely different type of alleged crime," said Center City lawyer Jack Meyerson, who prosecuted the 1980 case when he was an assistant U.S. attorney. Like the current case, he said, the earlier one involved allegations of "abuse of the payroll of the state Senate and using public money for political purposes in Philadelphia."

In the new indictment, Fumo, now 63, is accused of using taxpayer and charity money for political and personal purposes, including using Senate funds to hire a private investigator to tail ex-girlfriends and dig up dirt on political rivals. He also is charged with obstructing justice.

In the 1980 case, Fumo, Camiel and Nolan were accused of scheming to put Democratic Party workers in "no-show" jobs on the state payroll even though they did little or no work for the legislature. The charges - of mail fraud - focused on letters from Fumo and Camiel to Nolan requesting jobs for the no-show workers.

Fumo was on the witness stand for a day.

He testified that he knew some workers on the legislature's payroll were working at Democratic City Committee headquarters, or in his ward office - but that he didn't believe this was wrong.

"Am I correct in that every one of them worked every day wherever they were?" asked Fumo's lawyer, Ronald F. Kidd.

"Yes," Fumo answered.

Kidd: "... You didn't think that was a crime?"

Fumo: "No, not at all."

A few days later, the jurors began deliberating - and came back with three convictions.

Visibly shaken, Fumo said he was "crushed" by the verdict. "I feel just utter despair," he told reporters as he left the U.S. Courthouse at Sixth and Market Streets on a rainy October day in 1980.

Fumo later recalled the difficult days that followed. "That was the lowest point in my life," he said in a 1985 Inquirer interview. "It was like going to my own funeral. People were coming around - it was like what I would do when a close friend died - they were coming over paying respects. I didn't want to see anybody for a couple of days."

Months later, U.S. District Judge Clifford Scott Green tossed out the jury verdicts, ruling that prosecutors had failed to prove the three were involved in the specific, single scheme alleged in the indictment.

His decision was upheld by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, a ruling that remains a guide for prosecutors.

Mark B. Sheppard, one of Fumo's current defense lawyers, declined to comment on the 1980 case and would not say if the defense team planned to review it.

Nastasi said the new charges were much broader than the 1980 mail-fraud case - and that could mean a more pressing challenge for the defense this time. "It seems there's a lot more for the defense to do in this case to achieve an acquittal," he said.

And he said there's another important difference.

"The biggest distinction between the cases is that in the Camiel case, there was no charge, nor was there any evidence, to show that any accused person benefited personally in any way," said Nastasi.

Fumo also was successful in another criminal case.

Those charges were filed in March 1973, when Arlen Specter was Philadelphia's district attorney. The man who later rose to become Pennsylvania's senior U.S. senator charged Fumo and several other poll watchers with conspiring to violate election law in the 1972 presidential election.

The allegation was that a judge had illegally allowed the men to interfere with poll watchers loyal to Sen. George S. McGovern - whose presidential bid was so unpopular that Cianfrani loyalists feared it would hurt the state senator's reelection chances.

The charges brought by Specter, a Republican, were dropped in 1974 by his successor, F. Emmett Fitzpatrick Jr., a Democrat.

Center City lawyer William A. DeStefano, who represented some witnesses called before the grand jury in the current Fumo case, said the senator's successful fight against two previous criminal cases could bode well: "He's been through this twice before and came out of them both successfully."

Lawyer Peter F. Vaira, who was U.S. attorney then, said that if the 1980 federal case is any guide, Fumo and his current legal team will fight like tigers.

"They put up a good fight there, and they'll do it here," Vaira said. "There's no question about that."

'Bandido' Software Pirate Arraigned In U.S. On 2 Charges (INFOWEEK)

By Sharon Gaudin, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, February 22, 2007

The purported leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie faces 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine related to charges of copyright infringement.

A man, U.S. authorities describe as the leader of one of the oldest and most renowned Internet software piracy groups, was arraigned in U.S. District Court on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0135256

Hew Raymond Griffiths, 44, a British national living in Bateau Bay, Australia, is being charged with one count of conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement. If convicted on both counts, Griffiths faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Griffiths, known by the screen nickname "Bandido," was extradited from Australia in what the Department of Justice says is one of the first ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense. He had been held in Australia for three years while he fought the extradition.

"Griffiths claimed to be beyond the reach of U.S. law, and today, we have proven otherwise," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a written statement. "This extradition represents the Department of Justice's commitment to protect intellectual property rights from those who violate our laws from the other side of the globe."

The indictment, which was returned in March 2003, charges Griffiths with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws as the leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie. The group was known as one of the oldest security-conscious piracy groups on the Internet. DrinkOrDie was founded in Russia in 1993, according to the DOJ, and expanded internationally throughout the '90s.

The group was dismantled by the team effort of the DOJ and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement as part of Operation Buccaneer in December 2001. More than 70 raids reportedly were conducted in the U.S., as well as in the United Kingdom, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Australia. Operation Buccaneer so far has resulted in 30 felony convictions and 10 convictions of foreign nationals overseas, according to the DOJ.

Prior to its dismantling, DrinkOrDie was estimated to have caused the illegal reproduction and distribution of more than $50 million worth of pirated software, movies, games, and music, reports the DOJ in a written release.

"Counterfeiting and piracy of intellectual property are global parasites estimated to rob the legitimate world economy of more than $400 billion annually," said Assistant Secretary Julie Myers, in a written statement.

The government contends that Griffiths was a leader in the underground Internet piracy community, also known as the warez scene. He held leadership roles in several other well-known warez groups, including Razor1911 and RiSC.

Griffiths allegedly oversaw all the illegal operations of DrinkOrDie, which specialized in cracking software and distributing the cracked versions over the Internet, according to the DOJ's statement. Once cracked, these software versions could be copied and used without limitation. The group allegedly used encryption and an array of other sophisticated technological security measures to hide their activities from law enforcement.

Software piracy has become a huge expense for many U.S. businesses. Copyright protection actually has become a boom business. The International Intellectual Property Alliance reported in January that industries that depend on copyright protection laws for their economic survival accounted for $819 billion of the 2006 U.S. economy.

Cold Case: Keeping Snowmobilers Off Straight And Narrow (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

HOLLAND, N.Y. -- Railroad policeman Matthew Galas eased his cruiser behind a snowbank near a Norfolk Southern Corp. train line. He'd seen what he was looking for: fresh snowmobile tracks on the right of way. Lawbreakers had been there that morning.

He settled in to await his prey. An hour later, a snowmobile slid to a stop at the edge of the woods. Its driver nosed toward the train track, as if about to follow alongside it through railroad property. Then he spotted Mr. Galas, and disappeared back into the snowy forest.

"I thought we had a taker," said Mr. Galas. After waiting a half-hour more, he figured the word of his presence was out. Clad in a black snowsuit emblazoned "POLICE," he jumped on the railroad force's own snowmobile outfitted with red flashing lights and inspected the illegal trail, which at one point came within inches of the railroad track.

Mr. Galas is one of more than a thousand police officers employed by U.S. railroads. A couple hundred of them spend at least part of their winters on a unique mission: chasing snowmobilers illegally on the train tracks.

Mr. Galas once ticketed a man whose snowmobile was demolished after it had gotten caught in a snow-covered track. The driver dismounted shortly before a freight train smashed into his snowmobile -- as well as a second snowmobile that was trying to tow his off the track. Another time, Mr. Galas says he was dragged perhaps 100 feet across the snow at 2 a.m. by a snowmobiler he stopped for trespassing and suspected of being under the influence. When the snowmobiler decided to run for it, his vehicle's handlebars caught on Mr. Galas's jacket and gun belt.

"Some of them are out as long as the bars are open," notes the 33-year-old, who has worked for eight years for Norfolk Southern. "And they are open until 4 a.m. in Erie County."

DOJ_NMG_0135257

After a slow start this year, winter has hit the Northeast with a vengeance. Where Mr. Galas works, in the Buffalo suburbs, that has meant frigid temperatures, heavy snowfall and an escalation of the annual fight between railroad police and the area's legions of snowmobile fanatics. So far this month, Mr. Galas has issued warnings to eight snowmobilers on the right of way in Holland, just one of many freight lines crisscrossing the area. Police have given out tickets that can carry fines of $100.

Snowmobiling is important to the region's economy and culture. The state government provides funds to local snowmobile clubs to groom and mark their trails. Local shops, gas stations, restaurants and bars rely on snowmobile business, both from tourists and locals.

Some aficionados resent the railroad getting aggressive about patrolling the right of way along its tracks, which can be as wide as 100 feet and tends to have some of the flattest, smoothest paths among the hilly and treacherous woods.

"It is like a speed trap on the highway, and I don't agree with it," says Larry Snyder, a board member of the Holland Sno-Rascals, the local snowmobile club. The club, which uses a raccoon's face as its logo, has 280 members. The town of Holland's total population is 1,261.

The club advises its members not to trespass on the railroad's private property, and certainly not to ride on the rails themselves. But it is fighting the Norfolk Southern line's recent efforts to cut off crossings that snowmobilers use to follow their trails from one side of the tracks to the other.

The railroad wants the snowmobilers away from its tracks as much as possible. Snowmobilers in northern New York and New England have crashed into railroad equipment and trains. Train companies fear snowmobiles can strike dangerous objects buried under snow on railroad property, such as long sections of rail or stacks of railroad ties. The companies also fear expensive jury awards if accident victims or their families sue.

In late January, a 24-year-old snowmobiler died when he lost control and ran into a CSX Corp. signal shed near Erie, Pa. Several years ago, an Amtrak train killed a snowmobile operator who was riding on the narrow cake of snow between the rails near Albany.

Commercial railroads have had their own police forces going back to the Civil War. Famous agents included Bat Masterson, a Wyatt Earp crony, and Allan Pinkerton, founder of the Pinkerton detective agency that chased train robbers in the Old West. Railroad cops are granted full enforcement powers by state governments, and also deal with cargo theft, vandalism and, lately, terrorism concerns. Municipal and state police also make arrests for violating railroad territory, but railroad companies say that's not enough.

In its battle with the snowmobilers, Norfolk Southern has dismantled a crossing used by a farmer with property on each side of the track, and wants to cut off more such unofficial crossings. Taking apart the farmer's crossing, made up of stones between the rails, severed a well-traveled trail. For a while, snowmobilers tried to laboriously lift their machines over the track. The railroad then piled up brush and dug six-foot-deep ditches on each side to stop them.

"Most of the railroads you can deal with, but it just happens Norfolk Southern is the biggest pain and that's the one we have here," says Gerald Cummins, president of the Sno-Rascals. The club has had to reroute about 20 of its 50 miles of trails away from the railroad tracks, he says, which cost more than $10,000 for culverts, labor, dirt and signs -- about half the state grant the club got last year to maintain trails.

The farmer who lost his crossing has sued the railroad, but snowmobilers don't expect to regain their access. The Sno-Rascals rerouted that trail an extra eight miles through the center of the community. But that created noise and other issues with local property owners. The reroute also bypassed two regular snowmobiler stops: The Valley, a restaurant and bar, and the Yellow Goose gas station. "It's getting so they can't get to us," says Kelly Kensy, owner of The Valley and a Sno-Rascals board member.

In nearby Attica, snowmobilers have virtually taken over an unused spur track. When Norfolk Southern agent Murray Haines went to inspect, he found they had posted a 15 mph speed limit sign next to a rusting railroad signal pole. A trail-grooming rake was parked nearby. Snowmobilers used to traveling along the spur include a Byron town justice, Daniel DiMatteo, who also is an attorney for two snowmobile clubs. He said the previous owner of the spur, Conrail, was more permissive.

Mr. Haines said the railroad would try to get snowmobilers to reroute their trail. For the moment, he walked through a company parking lot next to an active track, noting a dozen snowmobiles parked there. He took down their vehicle ID numbers, and asked their owners to move on.

Probe Targeting Las Vegas Doctors And Lawyers Moves Forward (KLAS)

KLAS-TV, February 22, 2007

Federal authorities are moving forward with a conspiracy investigation targeting several of the valley's best-known doctors and lawyer. FBI agents began the probe back in 2003.

Federal prosecutors turned up the heat in front of a grand jury putting some of the most successful doctors and lawyers in Las Vegas in the crosshairs of this investigation. They reportedly called themselves the "Medical Mafia."

The FBI suspects them of conspiring to rip off patients, clients, and insurance companies for tens of millions of dollars. Testimony before a federal grand jury began Tuesday, Feb. 20 and prosecutors paraded more witnesses into the federal building Wednesday, Feb. 21 in preparation for possible indictments. The Channel 8 I-Team was the only news crew on the scene.

Click here to read 'Federal Grand Jury Issues Subpoenas in Insurance Scam,' which contains names of interest to investigators.

The people who've been gliding in and out of the federal building since Tuesday are not rich or famous. They are the alleged victims of the millionaire lawyers and doctors who are suspected of rigging the system to line their own pockets.

FBI agents have reportedly gathered so much information about more than a dozen attorneys and physicians that they weren't sure which cases and charges to pursue. Knowledgeable sources say prosecutors have narrowed their focus to concentrate on cases involving conspiracy.

For example, Cheyenne High School teacher Melodie Simon was paralyzed following two surgeries by two doctors. FBI agents believe the doctors and their two lawyers met with alleged medical fixer Howard Awand and agreed to go after the aenesthesiologist. Agents have been told that Attorney Robert Eglet advised his partner not to worry about a defense expert witness. Sure enough, that witness didn't show for the trial.

The FBI has long suspected that Awand facilitated kickbacks to doctors -- sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars per case -- money taken from settlements or jury awards in injury cases like Melodie Simon's. Simon declined to comment on her case except to say there are about 20 others just like it.

Peggy Lopez won a multimillion-dollar verdict against Sears, Roebuck and Company after her hand was crushed in an accident. Once again, the FBI thinks her doctors and lawyers divyed up the spoils with the help of Awand.

In a wedding ceremony video obtained by the I-Team, Awand makes an inside joke to Attorney Robert Vannah, who is also said to be a possible target. "It will be worth at least four and a half million dollars."

That video, which also shows Robert Eglet and his wife Tracy, another possible target, is now believed to be in the hands of federal prosecutors. Subpoenas for financial records were sent out in November 2005. Since then, some of the attorneys who were served have said they are being targeted because of their success against the insurance industry.

Sources close to the case say prosecutors now have a paper trail to show the flow of money from the lawyers to the doctors, even though records were post dated. And, the I-Team has learned, some of those professionals who were once targets of the probe are now cooperating with prosecutors and are telling the grand jury just how the alleged scheme worked and, more pointedly, who was involved.

At one point in the investigation, the government planned to go after cases in which medical bills were jacked up through the use of unnecessary surgeries. Since experts can disagree on just what is unnecessary, prosecutors are now focusing on what they consider obvious conspiracies.

Grand jury testimony is often a precursor to indictments. However, as a matter of policy, the U.S. Attorney's office will not comment on anything that is before a grand jury.

Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Elderly Clients (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 22, 2007

A federal grand jury indicted an Andover financial adviser yesterday on charges he bilked senior citizens in Connecticut and Massachusetts out of nearly $2 million and spent the money on lavish trips to Las Vegas and $5,000-a-day visits to strip clubs.

John A. Baldo, 38, was charged with six counts of mail fraud, five counts of wire fraud, and one count of violating the Investment Advisers Act, the office of US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said.

Baldo was arrested Jan. 25 as he got off a flight from Boston to Las Vegas. He was released on bond, pending formal charges, which were disclosed yesterday. A phone call to Glen P. Randall, Baldo's attorney, was not immediately returned.

Baldo allegedly cheated several elderly people in Massachusetts and Connecticut and spent their millions on luxury cars, jewels, gifts for exotic dancers, and frequent gambling trips to Las Vegas.

Baldo claimed to be a certified financial adviser and beginning in late 2005 talked his victims into liquidating their assets to put the money into an annuity account he said would guarantee them generous income, prosecutors said.

An 88-year-old man in Storrs, Conn., gave Baldo $1.6 million, and his 85-year-old brother, who also lives in Connecticut, gave him $200,000, according to the indictment. Prosecutors say he also stole $200,000 from a 63-year-old Rockport woman.

FBI agent Melissa Valera said in a court filing that Baldo spent about $300,000 for three luxury cars and almost that amount gambling.

He was a regular customer at the Cabaret Lounge in Peabody, where he was known for giving dancers $100 bills and spending about $5,000 a day, Valera's affidavit said.

Customer Data Breach Began In 2005, TJX Says (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Retail giant TJX, whose stores include discount clothing chains T.J. Maxx and Marshalls, said yesterday that a computer-security breach stretched back 10 months earlier than the company originally thought, compromising credit and debit card data, drivers' license numbers, and names and addresses.

The announcement underscores a trend of security breaches involving sensitive credit card data and reflects failures to properly secure computer systems, to notify customers when breaches occur and to update laws for the cyber-crime age, lawmakers and analysts said.

TJX said that while it first thought the intrusion took place from May 2006 to January 2007, it now thinks its computer system was also hacked in July 2005 and on "various subsequent dates" that year. The company, which reported the intrusion in January -- a month after it said it discovered the breach -- has not said how many customers may have been affected or how many customers it has notified.

"We don't have a number for you there. Our work is not finished," spokeswoman Sherry Lang said yesterday. More than 50 computer experts are helping TJX investigate the breaches, she said.

Banks that issued the credit cards have not said how much they have had to cover in fraud-related losses.

More than 30 states have laws that require companies to notify customers as soon as possible when a breach has occurred, though most of the statutes let companies delay notification while law enforcement agencies investigate. A bipartisan group of senators has reintroduced legislation that would mandate customer notification and require companies that maintain personal information to establish internal policies to protect it.

"Americans live in a world where their most sensitive personal information can be accessed and sold to the highest bidder, with just a few keystrokes on a computer, yet our privacy laws haven't kept pace," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) said in a statement when the legislation was reintroduced this month.

The credit card industry has set up rules for data protection called the Payment Card Industry Data Security Standard. They include encrypting transmission of cardholder data, regularly testing security systems and processes, and restricting access to data to those with a "need to know."

But most large retailers have not complied with the standard, and noncompliance is about 80 percent among smaller retailers, said Avivah Litan, an analyst with Gartner, an information technology research firm.

Litan said the retailers are not solely to blame. "It's a collective problem with collective responsibility," she said. "Certainly the retailers have to tighten up their systems, but the banks have to strengthen cardholder authentication so even if the data is stolen, it's useless."

Security breaches are difficult to quantify accurately. The Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit research and advocacy group in San Diego, said more than 100 million records of U.S. residents have been exposed by security breaches since February 2005.

The privacy group and the nonprofit Identity Theft Resource Center, also in San Diego, found that the majority of breaches they have tracked in the past few years occurred in government, the military and universities.

One of the biggest breaches occurred in 2005, when 40 million credit card numbers, along with name and account information, were exposed by hackers who broke into CardSystems Solutions, a credit card processing center that handled transfers of payments between the banks that issue credit cards and the merchants' banks.

Retailers often keep more data than necessary to process transactions, Litan said. They also keep information longer than necessary, she said.

"The CEOs and senior managers of most retailers that are storing data, like TJX, have no idea they're storing that data," Litan said. "It's basically a legacy of old systems programming." Many retailer systems were built in the 1970s and '80s, before there were hackers.

Many banks are frustrated because they are "left having to pay for the mistakes of retailers," to cover reissuing cards and any losses due to fraud, said Nessa Feddis, senior federal counsel for the American Bankers Association.

"Retailers are not protecting the data," she said. "It's not a question of notification. It's a responsibility to protect the data."

The bankers typically do not know the scope of retailer breaches because of confidentiality agreements between the retailers and the issuing card companies, such as Visa and MasterCard.

In Massachusetts, where TJX is headquartered, the Massachusetts Bankers Association stopped surveying its members in connection with the TJX breach after more than 30 banks were alerted by Visa and Master Card that their cards had been compromised by the TJX intrusion, association spokesman Bruce Spitzer said.

TJX operates more than 2,400 stores in the United States, Canada and Europe. They accept Visa, MasterCard, American Express and Discover credit cards.

The company reported yesterday that same-store sales in the fourth quarter rose 5 percent from the comparable quarter a year earlier. The quarter ended Jan. 27, 10 days after the breach was disclosed.

TJX, which is being sued by customers and banks, also reported that it spent $5 million in the fourth quarter to cover costs of the investigation, enhance computer security and communicate with customers.

Fourth-quarter profit fell 29 percent, to $205.5 million. Sales rose 9 percent, to $5.1 billion. For the full fiscal year, TJX profit rose 7 percent, to $738 million. Sales rose 9 percent, to $17.4 billion.

The Trial Of The Sensory (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A sexual harassment case that exposed the private lives of UCLA psychiatrists goes to the jury for its analysis.

For those who suspect that psychiatrists are at least as crazy as the rest of us, the sexual harassment trial that went to a jury Wednesday in Los Angeles County Superior Court has provided no end of material.

Jurors listened to two weeks of testimony, including psychiatrists testifying about their sex lives under code names and accounts of them allegedly attending porn parties and having oral sex in cars. Now the jury must decide who is telling the truth.

Dr. David Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleges that he had an affair with his supervisor and that after he broke it off and rumors of it began to circulate, he lost a coveted post as chief resident, and his reputation was ruined. He sued the supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA.

Krell says there was no affair. Her lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy. The jury will consider both claims at the same time.

UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair — university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country.

Testimony was so explicit that Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names, a decision she acknowledged was unusual but necessary to protect their reputations.

At times, the witness box seemed more like a psychoanalytic couch — and not just because witnesses often faced not only a judge, jury and lawyers but also at least two psychiatrists.

Testimony and court papers included Martorano's depiction of himself zipping around Malibu on dates in a two-seater, as well as an internal UCLA report that said that people who worked with him said he "frequently spent his downtime … talking about his sexual conduct." Jurors also heard his personal psychiatrist's assessment that he was "addicted" to having women fall in love with him.

Narcissistic traits

At one point, UCLA's lawyer, Alan Zuckerman, asked Martorano, a former opera singer and the son of a psychiatrist, if he thought he had a narcissistic personality disorder. As Zuckerman later told the jury, narcissists have a grandiose sense of self, lack empathy for others and take advantage of them.

Martorano replied that he would never call himself narcissistic but that "there are traits of narcissism that I possess."

In his closing argument, Zuckerman went point by point through the nine attributes of narcissistic personality disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders and explained how each attribute fit Martorano. He then accused the doctor of filing the lawsuit because his narcissistic personality couldn't handle that Krell would not admit that she had slept with him.

In response, Martorano's lawyer, Robert Scott, said that "some lawyers want to become psychiatrists." Later, he referred to Krell's lawyer, Donald Garrard, as Dr. Garrard.

Garrard, meanwhile, enthusiastically endorsed the diagnoses of Martorano as a raging narcissist, offering several examples of his own.

Then he turned to evolutionary psychology in his attempt to impugn Martorano's testimony, saying that it wasn't believable that Martorano couldn't recall details of sex he allegedly had with Krell. "The genes we come with are programmed for little else," he said as the judge and members of the jury and gallery burst into laughter.

DOJ_NMG_0135261

He also argued that jurors should not believe Martorano's claim that Krell had performed oral sex on him parked in an Audi in front of her apartment, because a 35-year-old physician would obviously choose to go to her apartment rather than stay in the car.

Garrard urged jurors to punish Martorano for acting like "a 14-year-old boy" by awarding Krell punitive damages.

Martorano's attorney, however, argued that the evidence that Martorano and Krell had an affair was hard to dispute. He pointed to dozens of phone calls, social events they attended together and testimony that they watched a movie about a porn star titled "The Fluffer."

Then, when rumors of the affair emerged, he said, Krell created a hostile work environment for Martorano by criticizing him excessively and by spreading rumors that he was a liar, a misogynist and manic depressive. And he was denied the job of chief resident. Then, Scott said, UCLA tried to "sweep it all under the rug" to protect itself.

Other lawsuits

This is not the only sexual harassment claim facing UCLA's medical school and its psychiatry department.

Krell has also filed a separate sexual harassment suit against UCLA, alleging that she was subjected to an onslaught of sexual comments and sexually degrading and demeaning behavior and gestures from Andrew Leuchter, another psychiatrist at UCLA.

She also alleged that department administrators retaliated against her when she complained. UCLA denies the allegations. The case is to go to trial next fall.

The university recently lost an appeal of a third, unrelated sexual harassment and discrimination case in which a female psychiatrist was awarded $2.9 million.

Martorano now runs a psychiatric practice out of his home in Malibu, where one of the things he specializes in, according to his website, is couples therapy. But that has not been trouble-free.

He and his new wife are embroiled in a legal dispute with a neighbor.

His next-door neighbor recently accused him of killing his dog and videotaping his children. In a countersuit, Martorano denied the allegations and accused his neighbor of telling his patients he was a dog-killer and child molester.

O'Malley Seeks End To Md. Executions (WP)

By John Wagner And Ovetta Wiggins

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Gov. Martin O'Malley urged Maryland lawmakers yesterday to repeal the state's death penalty, saying the punishment is "inherently unjust," does not serve as a deterrent to murder and saps resources that could be better spent on law enforcement.

Stepping forcefully into a debate taking place in Annapolis and across the nation, O'Malley (D) suggested that Maryland and other states will inevitably execute innocent people. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978.

"Can the death penalty ever be justified as public policy when it inherently necessitates the occasional taking of a wrongly convicted, innocent life?" O'Malley said during the first of two appearances yesterday before legislative committees. "Is any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family . . . in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murderers?"

O'Malley's testimony, captured by more than a dozen television cameras in a packed Senate hearing room, opened a long afternoon of debate over legislation that would replace Maryland's death penalty with life in prison without parole.

The issue, one of the most divisive facing the General Assembly this year, drew pleas from people on both sides of the issue during separate hearings conducted by House and Senate panels. But far more people turned out to support repeal, with nearly 30 people signing up to testify in favor of the bill in the Senate.

Baltimore County State's Attorney Scott D. Shellenberger (D), one of a handful of capital punishment supporters who appeared, told the panel that it was unnecessary to repeal the death penalty because so few executions are carried out in Maryland. There are six prisoners on the state's death row.

"Why repeal a statute that prosecutors need to use when you have all the checks and balances in place?" he said. "You can't look at the death penalty in a vacuum. It's merely a justifiable homicide in order to protect others."

The issue gained attention in Maryland in December with a court ruling that effectively halted executions until the state issues new regulations on lethal injection. O'Malley has declined to say whether his administration will issue those regulations if the death penalty is not repealed during the 90-day legislative session.

Even some supporters of repeal acknowledged they have an uphill battle, particularly in the Senate, where the legislation could face a filibuster if it reaches the floor.

Some of the most emotional testimony yesterday came from Kirk Bloodsworth of Dorchester County, who served eight years in prison, two of them on death row, for rape and murder charges that were later dismissed based on DNA evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0135262

Bloodsworth told the Senate panel that the state should not "have blood on its hands" for one innocent man who might be wrongly convicted.

"The bottom line is simple: If it can happen to an honorably discharged Marine Corps veteran, it can happen to anybody," Bloodsworth said, his voice cracking and tears running down his face.

Others testifying in favor of a repeal included Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D) and former attorney general J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), who is O'Malley's father-in-law.

Among those testifying against repeal was Phyllis Bricker of Baltimore, whose mother and father were murdered in their Baltimore home in 1983.

Bricker said her parents' killer, John Booth, is one of the six men who sit on death row. "Three separate juries . . . sentenced this man to death," Bricker told the House committee. "Now you, the senators and delegates, have been asked to act as judge and jury . . . without ever having heard one word of courtroom testimony."

Sitting governors rarely testify on legislation that is not part of a formal administration legislative package. And O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, had urged lawmakers to focus this session on issues on which there is broad consensus.

O'Malley, a Catholic whose forehead bore ashes from an Ash Wednesday Mass, suggested that the death penalty is an affront to "individual human dignity," which he called "the universal truth that is the basis of human ethics." But most of his testimony focused on pragmatic arguments about the cost and effectiveness of capital punishment.

He said that since 1990, the murder rate had declined by 56 percent in states without the death penalty but by only 38 percent in states that impose it.

"It would appear that the death penalty is not a deterrent, but very possibly an accelerant, to murder," O'Malley said.

He also cited estimates of the costs of prosecuting death penalty cases, suggesting Maryland could have saved $22.4 million since the death penalty resumed in 1978 if it did not impose the ultimate punishment. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978 and freed one inmate from death row.

"That $22.4 million could pay for 500 additional police officers or provide drug treatment for 10,000 of our neighbors suffering from drug addiction," O'Malley said. "Unlike the death penalty, these are investments that save lives and prevent violent crime."

Death penalty opponents have been lobbying lawmakers for weeks. Bloodsworth and others who have been exonerated after facing the death penalty have met with legislators to tell their stories. Maryland Citizens Against State Executions has led the effort, joined by the Catholic Conference and other religious organizations.

Before the hearing, supporters of repeal had a news conference with seven men who have served time on death row in various states and been exonerated.

As the House hearing got underway, Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), sponsor of the repeal bill, said lawmakers would "not cast a more important vote during our career as public servants." The death penalty, he said, "cannot be made right in this state or any other state."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Says Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Important Right In Bankruptcy (AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that a financially troubled small-business man gave up an important right under the federal bankruptcy code because he failed to disclose all of his assets as the law requires.

In a 5-4 decision, the Court said Robert Marrama of Gloucester, Mass., could not convert his bankruptcy case from one chapter of the code to another, as the law ordinarily allows.

The reason, the Court said, stemmed from his failure to disclose a Maine vacation home placed in a trust. Marrama, who operated a flooring company, listed the value of his interest in the property as zero, according to papers in the case.

After finding out about the home, the bankruptcy trustee said he would recover the real estate for the benefit of Marrama's creditors. Marrama had attempted to convert his case from a Chapter 7 liquidation to Chapter 13, which allows a debtor to keep property and pay debts over time.

Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens said honest debtors possess an absolute right to convert their cases to Chapter 13, but that nothing in the law limits a court's right to take away that right for "fraudulent conduct."

DOJ_NMG_0135263

In dissent, Justice Samuel Alito said the bankruptcy code "unambiguously provides" that a debtor has a "broad right" to convert to Chapter 13. Alito said Chapter 13 contains a number of requirements that protect creditors from any bad faith by a debtor.

In Marrama's case, a bankruptcy judge denied the conversion to Chapter 13, and a bankruptcy appellate panel agreed.

Attorney Eric Brunstad, who represented a creditor in the case, Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, said that once a bankruptcy is converted from Chapter 7, the trustee is ousted, and in many instances "there really is no one to take action against a fraudulent debtor."

"The statutory safeguards in Chapter 13 are not always adequate to prevent abuse," said Brunstad.

The case is Marrama v. Citizens Bank, 05-996.

CRMC Settles Federal Fraud Case (MOULOBS)

By Lori Glenn

The Moultrie (LA) Observer, February 22, 2007

MOULTRIE — Following a U.S. Department of Justice investigation, Colquitt Regional Medical Center (CRMC) agreed to pay the federal government $475,000 to settle fraud allegations.

The federal whistleblower case, which was filed Aug. 17, 2004, remained sealed until Wednesday. It centered around a series of claims submitted for Medicaid and Medicare reimbursement by CRMC's Home Care Services office in Sylvester from 2001 to 2005.

Plaintiff Joyce Dickerson, a registered nurse and former director of the Moultrie Home Care Services office, allegedly reported to the hospital administration and the hospital authority in 2004 what she believed to be years of illegal billing. While hospital officials say the settlement was based on an "error rate," Dickerson's attorney Robert Howell of Moultrie said in actuality CRMC owes the federal government double the compromise agreement.

In the complaint, CRMC was alleged to have received payment from Medicare for services that were not reasonable and necessary, upcoded certification diagnoses so that the hospital was overpaid by Medicare and underutilized services after being paid in advance by Medicare allowing defendants to receive payment from both Medicare and patients.

During the time of the alleged fraud, defendant Colleen Grimsley of Sylvester had been director of the Sylvester office until 2004 when Dickerson assumed directorship of both offices. Grimsley would have had financial incentive to commit the alleged fraud, Howell said. Revenue was a component of the home health directors' annual review, he said.

"All she [Dickerson] really wanted to do was to bring this to the attention of the administration and make it stop, because she feared for her own license and she also feared for the organization she worked for," Howell said. "She brought it to their attention, they didn't do anything to stop it and so she felt compelled to go to the next level with it, so that's just what she did."

This investigation and the resulting settlement vindicates his client's assertions, Howell said.

"My client has been vindicated and the taxpayers, who ultimately foot the bill for this type of illegal conduct, have also been vindicated," the attorney said. "Mrs. Dickerson is an extremely courageous woman who has sacrificed much and has suffered greatly to make sure that CRMC repaid the money it over-billed and wrongfully collected from the government's Medicare program."

Durwood Dominy, chairman of Colquitt County Hospital Authority, said any inappropriate claims submitted were unintentional and that the hospital had no indication of problems during the five-year period.

"All home care services were provided under the direction of and on orders by the patients' personal physicians," he pointed out. "All nursing care plans were ordered by the personal physician and payments to Colquitt Regional for services provided were made after a Medicare intermediary signed off on them with no qualifications or audits during this five-year period."

Dominy said the hospital had measures in place to ensure that claims were properly submitted for reimbursement.

"All claims were submitted to and reviewed by an independent third party, which is the intermediary between the hospital and Medicare, and none of the claims were disapproved," he said. "There was absolutely no indication that anything was wrong."

Dominy pointed out that when allegations were first made, prior to the Justice Department's investigation, that Colquitt Regional had its compliance officer, two attorneys and then two outside consultants to review the records and none found any fraudulent practices.

The authority chairman said the reimbursement to be made by the hospital is based on claims of technical errors such as beginning home care services for patients on a physician's verbal orders instead of a signed document.

"If was just a technical error, why didn't the hospital ever offer to repay the money to the government?" Howell posed.

Fighting Faith-based Spending In Court (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0135264

By Andrew B. Coan

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A Supreme Court case could set the standard for challenging grants that break down the wall between church and state.

ANDREW B. COAN is a fellow at Stanford Law School. He clerked for the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals but did not work on the Hein opinion.

SIGNIFICANT constitutional cases don't always arrive at the ball dressed up as such. Sometimes they come in the modest trappings of an obscure technical dispute too dull to capture public attention.

On Wednesday, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in just such a case. Hein vs. Freedom From Religion Foundation is unlikely to make headlines, but it could deal a sharp blow to the wall of separation between church and state.

The plaintiffs are ordinary citizens who object to their federal tax dollars being used to fund the president's program for "faith-based and community initiatives." In particular, they claim that several conferences sponsored by the program were propaganda vehicles for religion and therefore violated the establishment clause of the 1st Amendment, which forbids government promotion of religion.

The government defendants — "Hein" is Jay F. Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives — dispute the plaintiffs' claim about the conferences. But at this stage, the Bush administration is asking the court to throw the case out on grounds that ordinary taxpayers have no legal interest in how the executive branch spends public money.

It seems like the kind of dry, legalistic dispute that only a lawyer could love. But the appearance is deceiving. If the court grants the administration's request, it will eliminate what is often the only effective mechanism for challenging financial support of religion by the executive branch. The effect would be to grant the president and his staff, as well as the vast federal bureaucracy, a license to preach.

The basis for the administration's request is the esoteric doctrine of standing, which determines who has suffered a sufficiently tangible injury to be allowed to bring suit in federal court. Ordinary taxpayers generally cannot sue to challenge the legality of government spending decisions because their contribution to any given expenditure is too small to count as tangible.

For the last 40 years, however, the Supreme Court has consistently given special treatment to taxpayer suits that challenge government spending in support of religion. The justification is simple and compelling. Government spending in support of religion generally does not inflict tangible injury on anyone, so if taxpayers don't have legal standing, no one does. In terms of government spending, the establishment clause would be rendered merely advisory.

That, of course, is how the Bush administration prefers its constitutional constraints.

To be sure, the administration does not advocate the wholesale abolition of taxpayer standing in establishment clause cases. It would allow taxpayers to challenge specific congressional spending programs, but not executive branch spending from general funds. This is hardly a consolation, as the Court of Appeals recognized in rejecting the administration's argument.

Suppose, as the lower court suggested, the secretary of Homeland Security used general executive funds to build a mosque and hire an imam in the belief that such visible support for Islam would reduce the risk of Islamist terrorist attacks against the United States. Would this traducing of the establishment clause not allow taxpayers to sue?

If one accepts the administration's view, it would not. The prospect boggles the mind. Not only would serious violations of the establishment clause go unremedied, but Congress might be encouraged to pad the executive's general funds, with an implicit understanding that the extra money would be available to fund executive branch programs promoting religion.

These results would be deeply inconsistent with the core purpose of the establishment clause: to ensure that no taxpayer is forced to contribute to government support of religion.

Unfortunately, the Supreme Court rarely takes a case to affirm the decision from below. That, together with the recent shoring up of the court's conservative majority, strongly suggest that the administration's position will prevail, despite the threat it poses to the separation of church and state. If it does, everyone at the ball will take notice. But by that time, the party will be over.

EDITORIAL Reining In Juries (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

The Supreme Court rightly puts some limits on the awarding of outlandish punitive damages.

THE U.S. SUPREME COURT went further this week — though not far enough — in reining in juries in civil cases that award outlandish punitive damages. By a disappointingly narrow 5-4 vote, the justices overturned a jury's decision that Philip Morris should pay $79.5 million to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. The value of her actual damages was only $821,000.

The justices could — and should — have ruled clearly that the $79.5-million award violated previous rulings that punitive damages may not be "grossly excessive" and should bear a reasonable relation to the harm actually experienced by the plaintiff.

But in returning the case to the Oregon courts, the court did impose a sensible rule that should make it harder for juries to sock deep-pocket and easily demonized defendants.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen G. Breyer faulted the Oregon Supreme Court for allowing the jury to calculate punitive damages based not only on Philip Morris' "reprehensible" conduct in minimizing the health risks of smoking but also on the effect of its marketing on smokers not connected to the case.

The lawyer for Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of cancer, told the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams[es] in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been." The result was a punitive damage award nearly 100 times larger than the actual damages. Breyer said that basing damages on supposed harm to "strangers to the litigation" violated Philip Morris' due process rights. The court is rightly applying the brake to the notion that private litigation can serve as a substitute for the regulatory power of the state.

Whatever one thinks of litigation against tobacco companies — and we think it's a blunt weapon to wield against a legal product whose health risks are well known — Breyer has brought some clarity to a confused area of the law. The issue of whether and how juries can take into account possible harm to "strangers" to a lawsuit has bedeviled state as well as federal courts. It figures, for instance, in a different Philip Morris case before the California Supreme Court in which a smoker was awarded $28 billion in punitive damages, later reduced to $28 million — although her actual damages were estimated at $850,000.

In cases like this, juries often are confronted with a brainteaser. In deciding to award punitive damages, they're supposed to consider whether the conduct of the defendant is "reprehensible," and one definition of reprehensible conduct is to act in a way that puts many people at risk (such as leaking toxic material into a water supply).

But without proper guidance, jurors can leap to the conclusion that damages should reflect the harm experienced by everyone who might have tasted tainted water — or smoked a cigarette. Though it could have gone further, this week's decision should make such leaps less likely.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

U.S. To Step Up Rights Enforcement (UPI)

UPI, February 22, 2007

With the Executive Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention as his audience, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the launch of the First Freedom Project, a Justice Department effort to fight religious discrimination. "Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles," Gonzales told Executive Committee members Tuesday.

The First Freedom Project will be spearheaded by the Justice Department's civil-rights division and will build on the department's efforts to strengthen and preserve religious liberty throughout the nation, according to Gonzales, who sought the meeting with SBC leaders, Associated Baptist Press reported Wednesday.

"Throughout our history, nothing has defined us a nation more than our respect for religious freedom," Gonzales said. "It is not confined to members of one church or the followers of one set of beliefs. Through this initiative, the Justice Department continues its vigorous efforts to enforce protections against religious discrimination."

The attorney general stressed that religious liberty is "a universal right and applies to people of all faiths."

Later, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because "this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom." He noted the "timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience."

Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms.

The First Freedom Project will initiate a program of public education to make certain that people know their rights, Gonzales said. "People do not understand fully what their rights are," he explained.

The First Freedom Project will sponsor a series of regional training seminars for leaders interested in religious liberty. The first one will be March 29 in Kansas City, Mo., followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., April 25 and Seattle, Wash., May 10. Other dates and locations will be announced later.

The First Freedom Project also has launched a web site, www.firstfreedom.gov, which will provide information on laws that are enforced and details on how to file a complaint.

Another initiative, called the First Freedoms Project but unrelated to Gonzales' initiative, is a partnership between three Baptist organizations — the Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty, Associated Baptist Press, and the Baptists Today newspaper — to emphasize the Christian commitment to First Amendment principles, particularly religious liberty and freedom of the press (www.firstfreedoms.com).

Prior to Gonzales' remarks, the Justice Department also released its "Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-06."

The 43-page booklet, which is available on the First Freedom website, illustrated how the Justice Department has increased the enforcement of laws against religious discrimination and protecting religious freedom.

For example, the report noted that religious discrimination cases in education increased from one case reviewed and no investigations between 1995-2000, during the Clinton administration, to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations during the past six years of the Bush administration.

The report summarizes the Justice Department's accomplishments during the Bush administration in protecting religious liberty through the enforcement of civil-rights laws.

According to the report, the department has filed a lawsuit to protect the right of a Muslim student to wear a head scarf while attending public school and defended the right of religious groups to meet in public facilities on an equal basis with secular groups.

The report also noted that the department has defended the right of senior adults to pray, sing religious songs, and hold Bible studies at a community senior center.

"In each of those cases, we argued that citizens should not be forced to check their religion at the door," Gonzales told Executive Committee members.

"But this is only the beginning," Gonzales wrote in the introductory page of the report. "Preserving religious liberty requires an ongoing commitment to protecting this most basic freedom for people of all faiths."

At the conclusion of his address, Gonzales asked the Executive Committee to help spread the word of what the Justice Department is doing to preserve religious liberty and to help educate Southern Baptists about religious-liberty laws.

Man Who Helped Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 27 Months (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

CLEVELAND - A man accused of serving as a lookout in a scheme to use mercury to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced to two years and three months in federal prison, the Justice Department said.

Joseph Kuzlik of Cleveland, who is white, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to interfere with the housing rights of an interracial family because of their race and to making false statements to federal investigators.

Prosecutors said Kuzlik was the lookout while an accomplice spread mercury around an interracial couple's house in February 2005.

"The abusive and serious nature of this offense is obvious to anyone with a modicum of decency and morality. I cannot imagine the terror that was inflicted on these victims," said U.S. District Judge Patricia Gaughan, who handed down the sentence Wednesday. "A message must be sent loud and clear that this behavior will not be tolerated and will result in a punishment at the high end of the guideline range."

David Fredericy, 50, of Cleveland, who also is white, was sentenced last month to 33 months in prison. He had admitted he spread the mercury to try to scare black families from his neighborhood.

Fredericy said he and Kuzlik wanted to drive black residents out of their Slavic Village neighborhood. The two would yell racial slurs and threaten black neighbors, Fredericy's plea agreement said.

The neighbors touched the liquid mercury, which can be toxic, and brought it into their home on their shoes. The house had to be evacuated and an environmental cleanup was ordered. No one was injured.

Kuzlik also was ordered to three years of supervised release and to pay $23,000 restitution to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and $767 to the Ohio EPA for cleanup. He also must make payments to individual victims.

Rhode Island Steps Toward Recognizing Same-Sex Marriage (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 21 — The Rhode Island attorney general said Wednesday that same-sex marriages performed in Massachusetts, the sole state where they are legal, should be recognized in Rhode Island.

Responding to a request for a legal opinion from the commissioner of the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education, Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch said the state prohibited discrimination based on sexual orientation and did not explicitly prohibit same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0135267

"Rhode Island will recognize same-sex marriages lawfully performed in Massachusetts as marriages in Rhode Island," the seven-page opinion said.

Mr. Lynch said his interpretation permitted recognition of the marriages, although he acknowledged that it was just an opinion and did not have the force of law.

"This is about Rhode Island citizens who entered into a valid, legally recognized same-sex marriage and returned here to live and work," Mr. Lynch, a Democrat, said in an interview. "There is no way, no law, no constitutional provision and, in my estimation, no right to allow the denial of basic human rights."

A spokesman for Gov. Donald L. Carcieri, a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said Mr. Carcieri and his legal counsel were studying the opinion.

The request from the board, which oversees the state's three public colleges, went to Mr. Lynch on Feb. 1 after three employees who had same-sex marriages in Massachusetts asked that their personnel files be changed to reflect that they were married, said Steven Maurano, a spokesman for the board. Mr. Maurano said the board would abide by the attorney general's opinion.

"We asked for the opinion," he said. "So now that we have the opinion it's probably incumbent for us to follow it."

Mr. Lynch said businesses and state agencies could choose whether to abide by the opinion.

"Perhaps litigation will flow from it," he added.

Bills to allow and to bar same-sex marriage, as well as one to create civil unions, were filed this year in the General Assembly. Previous bills on the subject died.

In September, a judge in Massachusetts ruled that Rhode Island couples could marry in Massachusetts because Rhode Island did not have a law barring same-sex marriage.

At the time, Mr. Lynch said that the ruling did "not mean that Rhode Island will recognize a same-sex marriage performed in Massachusetts."

Mr. Lynch said Wednesday that the statement applied because a Massachusetts judge could not determine the course of Rhode Island law.

Michele Granda, a staff lawyer with Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, who argued the Massachusetts suit for two Rhode Island women, applauded Mr. Lynch's opinion, saying that it "brings peace of mind to married couples and clear direction to their employers."

Nativity Scene Is Too Religious For New York City Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

The US Supreme Court has declined to enter the fracas over what some conservatives are calling the war on Christmas.

Without elaboration, the court issued a one-line order on Tuesday refusing to take up a potentially important church-state case concerning the use of religious symbols in public school holiday displays.

At issue in Skoros v. City of New York was whether the city's public school system is impermissibly promoting Judaism and Islam while conveying a message of disapproval of Christianity. School rules allow the Jewish menorah and the Muslim star and crescent in multireligious holiday displays but not nativity scenes depicting the birth of Jesus.

The case had been relisted on the high court's private conference calendar seven times in recent months, raising expectations that the justices were taking a close look at the issue.

"We are obviously disappointed," says Brian Rooney of the Thomas More Law Center in Ann Arbor, Mich., which was urging the court to take up the case. "What this says is the [war on Christmas] is ongoing. It is going to continue festering state by state, county by county, and city by city."

While the policy, written with the help of city lawyers, bars nativity scenes, it allows depictions of Christmas trees to represent the Christian celebration of Christmas.

"We are not celebrating the birth of an evergreen tree," Mr. Rooney says. "We are celebrating a historic religious figure's birth that is recognized by the nation and every state in the Union."

The city says its policy treats all religions consistently by excluding "depictions of deities, religious texts, or scenes of worship such as a Christian nativity scene," says Leonard Koerner, a lawyer for the school district, in his brief to the court. "As the Christian nativity scene explicitly depicts the Christian deity [the baby Jesus] as the center of a scene of worship, it falls on the wrong side of the line."

Andrea Skoros, the mother of two sons attending public elementary schools in New York, took exception to what she saw as a slight to the Christian faith. She filed a lawsuit in 2002 claiming the school policy "impermissibly promoted and endorsed the religions of Judaism and Islam, conveyed the impermissible message of disapproval of Christianity, and coerced students to accept the Jewish and Islamic religions."

The suit said the school policy violated the First Amendment's Establishment Clause, which bars government from favoring one religion over any other.

Mrs. Skoros, a Roman Catholic, said the school policy was infringing upon her right to control the religious upbringing and education of her children.

A federal judge disagreed and upheld the school policy. A divided appeals court panel affirmed that decision.

In asking the Supreme Court to take up the issue, Skoros's lawyer, Robert Muise of the Thomas More Law Center, said the school policy disfavors Christianity. "Why is the menorah – a symbol of a miracle that is central to the Jewish faith – any more or less religious than a simple scene of the nativity, which is a historic event?" he asks in his brief.

Mr. Muise urged the court to use the case to add clarity and certainty to its Establishment Clause jurisprudence. He said the justices should jettison their so-called endorsement test in favor of a more workable constitutional standard.

New York City's school policy says in part: "Holiday displays shall not appear to promote or celebrate any single religion or holiday." It says such symbols must be displayed together to reflect the diversity of beliefs and customs among city residents.

There are more than 1 million children in the city's school system. They speak 140 different primary languages, including Spanish, Chinese, Russian, Urdu, Bengali, Haitian-Creole, Arabic, Korean, Albanian, French, Punjabi, and Polish.

"The primary purpose of all displays shall be to promote the goal of fostering understanding and respect for the rights of all individuals regarding their beliefs, values, and customs," the city policy says.

At the same time the policy seeks to avoid the promotion or endorsement of any particular religious faith. "Display of the crèche, as a representation of the birth of a figure central to the Christian religion, and others worshiping Jesus Christ as the son of God, is not permitted by [city] guidelines," Mr. Koerner writes.

Not all Christians identify Jesus as God.

Death Of The Chief (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Oct. 10, 1942, was up to then the best day of my life. I had talked my father, University of Illinois Class of '22, into taking me at age 11 along with him to homecoming weekend. On a golden autumn afternoon, lowly Illinois upset Minnesota, the Midwest football powerhouse. And, for the first time, I was privileged to watch Chief Illiniwek proudly dance down the field to Indian war music.

The last time I watched the Chief was Sept. 16, 2006. It will be the last time I ever see this 81-year-old symbol of my alma mater. The board of trustees last week eliminated Chief Illiniwek, bowing to years of pressure from Native American activists, the National Collegiate Athletic Association and liberal politicians.

This is a melancholy moment for me and many other Illinois alumni and university officials, including President B. Joseph White. The university has been forced to yield to blackmail. The death of the Chief epitomizes some unsavory aspects of contemporary American public life: political correctness, hypocrisy and bureaucratic tyranny.

Only a small minority of Native Americans is shown by polls to oppose Indian nicknames in sports. The campaign against them gained momentum only when the NCAA, which can hardly cope with policing athlete misconduct and illegal payments in college sports, crusaded against dozens of colleges in the name of political correctness. The NCAA, under President Myles Brand, labeled Chief Illiniwek one of the "hostile and abusive racial/ethnic/national origin mascots."

But the Chief is no mascot (the university calls him a symbol). The big-headed depiction of the father of this country at George Washington University, the turtle representing the University of Maryland and the Demon Deacon for Wake Forest are mascots. Such college mascots are comical figures who engage in sham battles with each other and go into the stands to hug children. Chief Illiniwek did not. He was always austere and dignified.

The accusation that Illinois and other schools degrade Native Americans is absurd. These schools picked Indian symbols in admiration of their valor, ferociousness and indomitable spirit in the face of overwhelming odds. Native Americans were honored in naming states. Illinois is Algonquin for "tribe of superior men." Indiana means the "land of the Indians."

The NCAA originally demanded that the University of Illinois not only dump the Chief but also drop the Fighting Illini nickname. Would Brand next demand that the states of Illinois and Indiana change their names (sticky for the NCAA, which is headquartered in Indianapolis)? The NCAA backed away from its ban on the Fighting Illini, but not on Chief Illiniwek.

That may seem irrational, but it is less so than NCAA approval of Florida State University's use of the Seminole nickname and Chief Osceola (no less dignified than Chief Illiniwek) riding his horse at football games to the sound of Indian war chants. Florida State passed the Brand test because of approval from the Seminole Tribe of Florida, which receives scholarship aid from the university. The University of Illinois cannot make such an arrangement because the original Illini were wiped out in inter-tribal wars in the 1760s.

Stanford led the capitulation to political correctness, changing from the Indians to the Cardinal in 1972. Other schools -- such as the University of North Dakota, trying to remain the Fighting Sioux -- have fought a losing battle. The NCAA was disingenuous when it claimed, in declaring victory over the Chief last Friday, that it "never mandated" that colleges "change their mascots." In fact, it rejected Illinois sponsorship of an NCAA event and was ready to prevent Illinois from hosting a National Invitational Tournament basketball game. Such sanctions threatened Illinois's recruiting of non-revenue-sports athletes.

Chief Illiniwek finally was done in by politicians jumping on the NCAA's political correctness bandwagon. Illinois State Senate President Emil Jones Jr., no friend of the university, warned that trustees might not be confirmed unless they dumped the Chief, and university officials feared their appropriations coming under attack.

While I can understand dumping the Chief, I don't like it. I could react by withdrawing from my long-range commitments to support the University of Illinois, but I won't. That would put me in the same class as the petty bureaucrats and politicians who killed Chief Illiniwek.

EMI Sounds Out Suitors After Move By Warner (FT)

By Ft Reporters

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

EMI is in talks with several private equity groups including One Equity Partners, the US group affiliated with JPMorgan Chase, to sound out potential alternatives to Warner Music's $6bn approach for the British music group.

People familiar with the discussions cautioned that no firm offers appeared imminent, as Warner and would-be private equity suitors are demanding the right to conduct extensive due diligence on EMI's operations after it issued two profit warnings in quick succession since the start of the year.

EMI's board is still examining a possible securitisation of its publishing asset which remains its first choice unless a compelling offer is made.

The development comes less than three months after EMI's talks with Permira collapsed after the UK-based private equity group conducted due diligence, and four weeks after Warner's approach, which was disclosed only on Tuesday.

EMI, which would not comment on the discussions, rejected the January 24 approach from its closest rival, which is understood to have been pitched at an indicative price close to 300p.

Warner would not comment, but it is understood to have cut its valuation of EMI sharply since the latter's second profit warning.

Warner said yesterday any offer it made would be all in cash.

The US-listed group is understood to have decided against offering a stock alternative for financial reasons and because of the greater disclosure requirements offering shares would impose on its own investors.

Several EMI shareholders welcomed the prospect of an all-cash bid. "It is an ex-growth business," said one. "And we do not want Warner's shares."

Warner's statement came as EMI wrote to Warner, expressing doubts that the US group had significantly improved the chances of a deal being cleared by regulators.

Warner announced on Tuesday that it had secured the unexpected backing of Impala, an alliance of independent music companies which had opposed previous deals in the sector.

However, EMI's official response to Warner's approach argued it still saw significant regulatory risks.

The uncertainty hanging over further consolidation in the industry is set to continue for at least four to five months, with the European Commission expected to announce next week that it will launch an in-depth probe into the 2004 merger that created Sony BMG.

Meanwhile, the antitrust watchdog has until March 1 to clear the deal or conduct a more detailed probe lasting 90 working days.

The Commission cleared the deal in 2004 but its ruling was overturned by Europe's Court of First Instance last July.

Should the Commission find that the tie-up undermined competition, it could ask the merger group to break itself up again or demand that Sony BMG sell assets or change its behaviour.

Either outcome could cast a pall over the chances of an EMI-Warner deal being cleared.

Shares in EMI yesterday closed up 1¼p at 241¼p. Shares in Warner were up 82 cents at $19.97 at lunchtime in New York.

EU Penalizes Elevator Makers With Its Largest Antitrust Fine (WSJ)

By Adam Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission Wednesday fined four elevator and escalator makers a total of €992 million ($1.3 billion) for fixing prices, Europe's largest-ever antitrust penalty.

ThyssenKrupp AG was fined €479.7 million, United Technologies Corp.'s Otis unit was fined €224.9 million, Schindler Holding AG was hit with a €143.7 million penalty and Kone was fined €142.1 million. The sum of these fines, which topped a €750 million penalty levied last month against makers of power-grid components, reflects the commission's expanded powers to crack down on corporate cartels.

Under new antitrust guidelines established last year, the commission can levy larger fines and apply an automatic 50% increase for repeat cartel offenders. Since ThyssenKrupp had a previous cartel punishment -- a €3.2 million fine in 1998 for fixing stainless-steel prices -- its elevator penalty included this increase, bringing its fine close to the record €497 million Microsoft Corp. paid in 2004 for breaking monopoly laws.

The commission launched its investigation into the elevator business in January 2004. Its probe showed that the four companies fixed prices and rigged bids in Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Luxembourg between 1995 and 2004.

The commission said Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV, a division of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., participated in the Dutch cartel and it fined the company €1.8 million.

"It is outrageous that the construction and maintenance costs of buildings, including hospitals, have been artificially bloated by these cartels. The national management of these companies knew what they were doing was wrong, but they tried to conceal their action and went ahead anyway," the commission's top antitrust official, Neelie Kroes, said in a statement.

In all four countries, high-ranking managers held regular meetings related to the cartel. The commission found evidence that the companies knew their behavior was illegal. The managers were careful to avoid detection, meeting in rural areas or abroad and using prepaid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking. The commission said none of the companies contested these facts or other evidence unearthed in the investigation.

None of the companies qualified for the full immunity usually given to whistle-blowers. Kone's penalty was reduced by about €138 million because it was the first to disclose the cartels in Belgium and Luxembourg and provided key evidence in the German investigation. Otis' penalty was reduced by over €208 million because it disclosed the Dutch cartel and cooperated with investigations in the other countries.

Kone of Finland and ThyssenKrupp of Germany both said they will examine the commission's decision before deciding whether to appeal. Spokesmen for Switzerland's Schindler and the German unit of U.S.-based Otis declined to comment.

A key question in this case will be whether the companies' customers decide to sue. Over the past few years, the commission has encouraged private damages claims to further deter cartel offenders. "Companies have the option of seeking damages" or renegotiating their contracts, said the commission's antitrust spokesman, Jonathan Todd.

Brussels Imposes €992m Fine On Lift Cartel (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The European Union's top antitrust regulator yesterday slapped a record €992m fine on ThyssenKrupp and four other lift manufacturers, in the latest sign that the Brussels watchdog is drastically ramping up the financial pain for companies that violate competition rules.

It was the highest penalty imposed by the European Commission, topping a previous record set only last month. Brussels hopes that the recent increase in antitrust fines will deter companies from abusing the law and encourage people involved in cartels to blow the whistle on co-conspirators in exchange for immunity.

Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner and the -official behind Brussels' get-tough approach, said the lift and escalator cartel had behaved "outrageously", while her spokesman said taxpayers, public authorities and other customers had been "ripped off big time" by the cartel.

ThyssenKrupp, the German engineering group, received the toughest penalty, €479.7m ($630m, £322.5m). Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, was fined €224.9m, Schindler of Switzerland was given a €143.7m penalty and Finland's Kone was ordered to pay €142.1m. Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined €1.8m.

Ms Kroes said: "The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators. For these companies the memory of this fine should last just as long."

DOJ_NMG_0135271

The Commission said the lifts installed in its own headquarters as well as at the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg were covered by the cartel. It urged customers of the companies involved in the agreement to renegotiate their contracts, and said they might have the right to sue for damages.

John Pheasant, a competition law specialist and partner at law firm Hogan & Hartson, said yesterday's fines were part of a wider trend. "In terms of fines, the Commission is now the toughest authority in the world. The trend towards higher fines started a few years back, but recently there has been a distinct acceleration."

The Commission last year passed new fining guidelines that will allow Brussels to further increase the financial pain on abusive companies in all new cases. Officials have argued that the new rules will mean that more companies will be hit with the maximum penalty - a fine equivalent to 10 per cent of their annual global turnover.

The lift cartel operated in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between at least 1995 and 2004. According to the Commission, the groups co-ordinated their bids to ensure that a designated group would win specific contracts.

"[To agree on bids] theyusually met in bars and restaurants, they travelled to the countryside or even abroad, and they used pre-paid mobile cards to avoid tracking," the Commission said.

ThyssenKrupp, United Technologies, Schindler and Kone said they were studying the Commission ruling, with Schindler adding it was "very surprised" by the high fines. United Technologies said Otis would appeal against the decision.

Europeans Slap $1.3 Billion Price-fixing Fine On 5 Elevator Makers, Including Otis (USAT/AP)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press

USA Today, February 22, 2007

BRUSSELS — European Union regulators on Wednesday fined United Technologies' (UTX) Otis unit and four other elevator makers $1.3 billion for operating a cartel for the installation and maintenance of elevators and escalators in Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said the fines represent the "largest ever" for price fixing in the European Union, and EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said the costs of buildings and hospitals were "artificially bloated by these cartels."

"The result of this cartel is that taxpayers, public authorities and property developers have been ripped off big time," Todd told reporters. "The companies ensured that by rigging the bids and sharing the markets that the prices paid for the installation and the maintenance were way above what they would have been if there had been a competitive market."

Fined were United Technologies of Hartford, Conn., corporate parent of Otis Elevator; German conglomerate ThyssenKrupp; Finland's Kone; Switzerland's Schindler Holding and subsidiaries of Japan's Mitsubishi Elevator Europe.

George David, chairman and chief executive of United Technologies, said in a statement that company officials are "disappointed by the conduct revealed through the Commission's and UTC's own investigations."

Otis was fined 225 million euros ($295.8 million).

"UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind," he said. "The nine local Otis employees who violated our code of ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide."

Otis and United Technologies disclosed the investigation in 2004 and have cooperated with the European Commission, David said. Otis and UTC have received full or partial reductions in penalties for its cooperation and the outcome will have "no material impact" on UTC's financial condition or Otis' competitive position.

United Technologies is waiting for the full text of the decision and will review it before reporting on its impact on its 2007 earnings guidance. In addition, David said Otis will appeal the decision to a European court.

ThyssenKrupp was given the largest fine, just over 479 million euros ($630 million), because the company was labeled a "repeat offender" by EU regulators, Todd said.

ThyssenKrupp, based in Frankfurt, Germany, said it will review the fine and then decide whether to appeal.

Schindler was fined 144 million euros ($189.3 million), Kone 142 million euros ($187 million) and Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined 1.8 million euros ($2.37 million).

The European Commission said the cartel had worked to rig bids for procurement contracts, fix prices and share markets "between at least 1995 and 2004." It said the companies "did not contest the facts" found by EU regulators, adding none of the accused requested a hearing to answer the allegations.

But Schindler said the company was "very surprised at the size of the fine," because it claimed the EU had found "no evidence of pan-European collusion among companies in the European elevator industry." It said in a statement that it had not yet decided whether it would appeal.

Kone also said it will "examine the commission's decision and decide on potential action."

DOJ_NMG_0135272

Wednesday's fine tops a 750 million euros ($978 million) fine imposed last month against 10 companies for running a cartel to fix prices for heavy equipment used by power utilities, reflecting stepped-up action by Kroes against price fixing.

She has vowed a crackdown under new antitrust guidelines agreed to last year that allow EU regulators to come down harder on repeat offenders like ThyssenKrupp, which faces an automatic 50% increase for repeated price-fixing activities.

The German company had already received a previous cartel fine, worth 3.2 million euros ($4.2 million) in 1998 for fixing stainless steel prices. Wednesday's punishment brings ThyssenKrupp close to the 479 million euros fine paid by U.S. software giant Microsoft (MSFT) for breaking European monopoly laws.

EU regulators found evidence from "numerous documents and corporate statements" to prove the companies allocated tenders and contracts for the sale, installation and maintenance of elevators "with the aim of freezing market shares and fixing prices," the commission said.

"Projects that were rigged included lifts and escalators for hospitals, railway stations, shopping centers and commercial buildings," it said, adding such acts were decided upon between managing and service directors during regular meetings between cartel members.

"There is evidence that the companies were aware that their behavior was illegal and they took care to avoid detection," the commission said, adding that the meetings usually took place in bars and restaurants or in locations outside cities to avoid suspicion.

EU officials said they even used prepaid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking.

"The national management of these companies know what they were doing was wrong, but they tried to conceal their action and went ahead anyway," Kroes said in a statement. "The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators."

The EU conducted surprise raids against the companies in January 2004 after EU regulators were tipped off.

EU Fines Otis, Four Other Elevator Makers For Cartel (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, February 22, 2007

Feb. 21 (Bloomberg) -- European antitrust authorities fined Otis Elevator Co. and ThyssenKrupp AG, the world's two largest elevator makers, and three competitors a record 992.3 million euros ($1.3 billion) for price-fixing.

The European Commission penalized ThyssenKrupp 479.7 million euros, the biggest fine against a company for a cartel, and levied 224.9 million euros on Otis, a unit of United Technologies Corp. It also fined Schindler Holding AG 143.7 million euros, Kone Oyj 142.1 million euros and Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV 1.8 million euros for fixing prices of elevators and escalators.

``It is outrageous that the construction and maintenance costs of buildings, including hospitals, have been artificially bloated by these cartels," Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement today.

The penalty is the highest imposed by the Brussels-based commission for a cartel, surpassing a 790.5 million-euro fine imposed on eight companies for fixing vitamin prices in 2001. Otis, Schindler, ThyssenKrupp and Kone control about 75 percent of the global elevator and escalator market, which has annual sales of 30 billion euros, said Christian Obst, an analyst at HVB in Munich who has a ``hold" rating on ThyssenKrupp shares.

United Technologies in Hartford, Connecticut, said the company plans to appeal today's fines to the European Court of First Instance. Germany's ThyssenKrupp, Hergiswil, Switzerland- based Schindler and Helsinki-based Kone said they are considering whether to appeal.

Highest in History

Kroes has made fighting cartels a priority for her five- year term. On Jan. 24, she fined Siemens AG, Areva SA and eight other companies that make electricity network gear 750 million euros. The commission fined seven cartels a total of 1.84 billion euros last year, an annual record.

``Today we see the commission really going forward and really emphasizing its commitment not only to penalizing participants in cartels but also sending a very clear deterrent message to companies that might be tempted to get involved in those types of activities," John Pheasant, a partner at Hogan & Hartson LLP, said in an interview.

The commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, said the companies set prices in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004. The companies rigged contract bids, allocated projects to each other and shared confidential information, the regulator said.

`Ripped Off'

DOJ_NMG_0135273

The companies ``were aware that their behavior was illegal and they took care to avoid detection; they usually met in bars and restaurants, they traveled to the countryside or even abroad and they used pre-paid mobile phone cards to avoid tracking," the commission said.

``The result of this cartel is that taxpayers, public authorities and property developers have been ripped off, big time," Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, told reporters in Brussels. ``Its effects will be felt for the next 20 to 50 years."

ThyssenKrupp's fine was raised by 50 percent because it was a repeat offender, the regulator said. The Dusseldorf, Germany- based company said in a statement that its lawyers ``will review the fine notice and then decide whether to appeal."

Shares of United Technologies fell 55 cents, or 0.8 percent, to $67.58 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. ThyssenKrupp closed down 42 cents, or 1.1 percent, at 38.96 euros in Frankfurt. Kone fell 8 cents, or 0.2 percent, to 45.81 euros. Schindler rose 3.4 Swiss francs, or 4.3 percent, to 82 francs.

Firings

United Technologies Chief Executive Officer George David said the company has disciplined employees for the cartel and has been cooperating with the commission. The company, which holds an investor meeting in New York on Feb. 28, is waiting to receive the full decision to study how the fine may affect profit forecasts for 2007, it said in a statement.

``We are disappointed by the conduct revealed through the commission's and UTC's own investigations," David said in the statement. ``UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind. The nine local Otis employees who violated our Code of Ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed, and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide."

Under United Technologies' strict ethics policy, 913 employees have been dismissed in the past five years. So far this year, 27 have been terminated, according to spokesman Peter Murphy. Violations of the policy can include everything from inappropriate use of confidential company information to environmental, health and safety breaches.

``Schindler is very surprised at the size of the fine since the European Commission found no evidence of pan-European collusion among companies in the European elevator industry," the company said in a statement.

Herman Van De Pasch, senior managing director at Mitsubishi Elevator Europe in Veenendaal, The Netherlands, said he was ``disappointed" by the fine.

``I had expected a very low fine because of our small role," Van De Pasch said in a telephone interview.

Otis To Appeal Against EU Elevator Cartel Fine (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

The US parent company of elevator maker Otis said Wednesday it would appeal against a record EU antitrust fine imposed against a lift cartel.

United Technologies Corp. (UTC) said it had "cooperated fully" with the European Union's executive commission during the investigation into the market-rigging cartel.

"Otis will appeal the commission's decision to the European Court of the First Instance," a UTC statement said.

"We are disappointed by the conduct revealed through the commission's and UTC's own investigations," UTC chief executive George David said.

"UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind," he said, noting that nine Otis employees in Europe had been "quickly identified and dismissed" for violating the company's code of ethics.

The statement added: "The outcome of the case will have no material impact on UTC's financial condition and no material impact on Otis' competitive position."

The European Commission ruled that the companies ran a cartel for the installation and maintenance of lifts and escalators in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and The Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004.

The combined fine came to a record 992 million euros (1.3 billion dollars).

ThyssenKrupp was handed the heaviest fine ever imposed by EU regulators on a single company in a cartel case because it was a repeat offender. The German group was fined 480 million euros.

Otis was given a fine of 225 million euros for its role, followed by Schindler with a penalty of 144 million euros and Kone with 142 million euros.

Patent Held By Genentech Is Revoked By Government (NYT)

By Andrew Pollack

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Patent and Trademark Office has decided to revoke a fundamental patent held by Genentech, the biotechnology company, that was at the center of a recent Supreme Court decision.

DOJ_NMG_0135274

The patent office's decision could cost Genentech hundreds of millions of dollars in royalties over the next decade but would save a like amount for rivals that are paying the royalties, including MedImmune, Abbott Laboratories, Johnson & Johnson and ImClone Systems.

In a statement yesterday, Genentech said it would appeal the decision through the patent office and, if necessary, the courts. The company said the patent would remain "valid and enforceable" through the appeals process.

The decision is the latest in a long controversy, and even mystery, surrounding the patent. The patent was awarded in 2001 even though the inventions on which it was based were made in the early 1980s. If not revoked, the patent, often called the Cabilly II patent after the lead inventor, Shmuel Cabilly, would expire in 2018.

Last month the Supreme Court ruled that MedImmune could challenge the patent even though it had licensed the rights to use it. Lawyers said the decision would have a big impact on how patent licensing deals are structured.

The patent covers techniques for making monoclonal antibodies, which are the basis for many of the biggest selling products made by the biotechnology industry. Genentech shares revenue from the patent with its research partner at the time, the City of Hope, a medical center in Duarte, Calif.

Genentech said that in 2006 it earned 6 cents a share, equivalent to $105 million in pretax income, from the patent, after subtracting what it paid to City of Hope. That was less than 3 percent of its adjusted earnings per share of $2.23.

A Genentech spokesman said the biggest royalties come from Humira by Abbott, Remicade by Johnson & Johnson, Synagis by MedImmune and Erbitux by ImClone.

An analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Company, Geoffrey C. Porges, wrote in a note yesterday that the impact of the decision "is greater for the companies paying royalties on Cabilly than it is for Genentech." Genentech, based in South San Francisco, Calif., is enjoying booming sales of its drugs for cancer and eye disease.

In moving to revoke the Cabilly II patent, the patent office said other patents had predated it, including the original Cabilly I patent, which expired last year.

The office had issued a preliminary ruling to revoke the patent in 2005, saying it represented double patenting of the same invention and would inappropriately extend Genentech's patent protection by 12 years.

The re-examination of the patent was requested by a Chicago lawyer, Liza V. Mueller. She has not revealed whom or which company she represents, though it is presumably one of the companies that pay royalties to Genentech.

MedImmune filed a lawsuit against Genentech in federal court in Los Angeles in 2003, challenging the patent. It also said Genentech had violated antitrust laws by colluding with Celltech, a British company and unit of UCB, to extend patent protection.

Genentech denied all of those accusations.

Both Genentech and Celltech were awarded patents covering similar antibody technology in 1989. Genentech then added some claims from the Celltech patent to a second patent application that it had previously filed on the same work. That forced the patent office to decide whether Genentech or Celltech was the first inventor.

In 1998, the patent office ruled in favor of Celltech. Genentech then took its case to Federal District Court in Northern California.

In 2001, however, Genentech and Celltech reached a settlement, agreeing that Genentech was the rightful inventor. The reason given was that Genentech had discovered an early draft of its patent application that predated Celltech's application.

The court ordered the patent office to grant a new patent to Genentech. The new patent, Cabilly II, would extend to 2018, even though both the original Cabilly and the Celltech patents would have expired in 2006.

MedImmune raised questions about whether Celltech was also profiting by giving up its soon-to-expire patent in favor of Genentech's new one. The terms of the settlement between Genentech and Celltech have never been made public.

According to a brief filed by City of Hope in the recent Supreme Court case, Celltech shared in some of the royalties from the new Cabilly patent for a limited period but received less money than it would have if its own patent had remained in force.

The court in Los Angeles dismissed MedImmune's antitrust charges, saying that the settlement between Genentech and Celltech had been appropriately approved by the judge overseeing their case. It also said MedImmune could not sue to invalidate the patent since it was a licensee of the patent.

MedImmune appealed that latter decision to the Supreme Court, which last month ruled that a party did not have to breach a patent license to challenge a patent. MedImmune's claims regarding the Cabilly II patent will now be tried in the lower courts.

MedImmune's general counsel, William C. Bertrand Jr., said the company was pleased with the decision to revoke the patent.

"We believe they adopted a lot of the arguments that we've propounded concerning this particular patent over the years," Mr. Bertrand said.

EU Approves Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Filling Stations (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

EU antitrust regulators gave their approval on Wednesday to Russian energy group Lukoil's plans to buy the filling stations of US oil giant ConocoPhillips in seven European countries.

After probing the deal for its impact on competition, the European Commission said that it had "found that the proposed transaction would not impede effective competition" in Europe.

Under the deal, the Russian oil and gas group is buying 400 filling stations from ConocoPhillips in Belgium, the Czech Republic, Finland, Luxembourg, Poland, Hungary and Slovakia.

The two companies have been close partners since ConocoPhillips bought 7.59 percent of Lukoil in 2004. The US company has since increased its stake to 20 percent.

Regulator Clears Japan Deal For Gallaher (AP)

AP, February 22, 2007

European Union Approves Japan Tobacco's $14.7B Bid for Britain's Cigarette Maker Gallaher

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union antitrust regulators on Wednesday cleared Japan Tobacco Inc.'s proposed $14.7 billion purchase of British cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC, saying the deal did not pose competition problems on the European market.

Japan Tobacco, the world's third biggest cigarette company wants to buy Gallaher to give the maker of the Mild Seven brand a bigger share in the European market.

The European Commission said the deal showed overlaps between the two companies "are generally limited," with the brands of the two positioned in different market areas. "Moreover, for all products concerned, the new entity would continue to face several strong, effective competitors with significant market shares," the commission said in a statement.

The deal would reportedly be the biggest Japanese overseas acquisition. Gallaher, which employs 12,000 people worldwide, dates back to 1857, when Tom Gallaher started a business making Irish roll tobacco in Londonderry, Northern Ireland. Its cigarette brands in Europe include Benson & Hedges, Silk Cut and Sovereign.

The company has been under pressure in a tough European market, particularly from additional taxation and increased competition in Spain and Austria.

Currently, JT has little presence in Western Europe, and only has operations in Russia.

The combined company would have annual global output of 600 billion cigarettes, JT said. It would remain at No. 3 behind Altria Group Inc. of the United States and Britain's British American Tobacco.

EU Approves Japan Tobacco Takeover Of Gallaher (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

EU antitrust regulators approved on Wednesday Japan Tobacco's planned purchase of British cigarette group Gallaher, which is to be the biggest-ever takeover by a Japanese company.

"After examining the operation, the (European) Commission concluded that the transaction would not significantly impede effective competition," the EU antitrust watchdog said in a statement.

Japan Tobacco unveiled plans in mid December to buy British manufacturing and wholesale company Gallaher Group for 2.25 trillion yen (18.6 billion dollars, 14.2 billion euros) including debt in Japan's biggest-ever corporate acquisition.

The deal is expected to leave the JT group holding some 14 percent of the European Union market, with a 39-percent share in Britain and 45 percent in Austria.

"The Commission's examination of the proposed transaction showed that the horizontal overlaps between the activities of Gallaher and Japan Tobacco are generally limited with the brands of both companies mainly positioned in different segments," it said.

EU regulators also found that the merger would not leave the combined company with crushing market share as it would face "several strong, effective competitors."

Japan Tobacco sells brands including Mild Seven, Camel and Winston in about 120 countries and the takeover will give it extra muscle to take on world number one Philip Morris Cos. Inc. of the United States.

Gallaher owns Benson and Hedges, Silk Cut, Mayfair and Sovereign and also makes and sells cigars, "roll-your-own" and "make-your-own" tobacco, pipe tobacco and "snus", a type of oral snuff used in Sweden and Norway.

Steel Mill Sale Order Questioned (AP)

By David Dishneau, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135276

The United Steelworkers union and Maryland's economic development chief say they disagree with a federal order that global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's planned acquisition of Arcelor SA.

While ordering the sale of the Maryland plant, the consent decree proposed Tuesday by Justice Department would allow Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, which is used primarily for food and aerosol cans.

The United Steelworkers, which represents the mill's 2,106 production workers, said it will seek a reversal of the decision because selling Sparrows Point won't necessarily help workers or the company.

"It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," said David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee.

The Justice Department said Sparrow Point's profitability and port access would help make it a viable competitor. In contrast, the Weirton mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, according to the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers there.

Sparrows Point, with about 2,400 workers and one of the largest blast furnaces in North America, faces the prospect of its fourth owner in as many years.

David W. Edgerley, secretary of the Maryland Department of Business and Economic Development, said the state would work with Mittal to find a buyer for Sparrows Point, but he wasn't happy with the decision.

"We never like to have this kind of ruling that has an adverse effect on any Maryland business," Edgerley said.

An expert on Sparrow Point's 120-year history said the order could be good for the mill and the domestic steel industry.

Mark Reutter, an Urbana, Ill., writer who chronicled Sparrows Point in his 1988 book "Making Steel," said the decision means the government has heard manufacturers' complaints about too much steel consolidation.

"The sort of unspoken aspect here is that someone in Washington is signaling displeasure over the last two years and wants more competition in the industry," Reutter said.

Illinois-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable. And industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills.

But the German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG said Wednesday it has no interest in acquiring the Maryland mill.

Mittal Sorry About Ruling (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 22, 2007

Steelmaker's CFO says order leaves no choice on Sparrows Point sale

After a day of silence, Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it was disappointed by the Justice Department's decision requiring it to divest its Sparrows Point steel mill to resolve antitrust concerns over tin plate production in the wake of its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

During a previously scheduled conference call with analysts yesterday to discuss fourth-quarter and year-end earnings, Mittal Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company had no choice but to comply with the order even though it preferred to sell its plant in Weirton, W.Va.

A tentative deal to sell Weirton to Chicago-based Esmark Inc. is off the table, Mittal said, because of the Justice Department's decision.

"We sympathize with everyone in Maryland because we feel the same disappointment," Mittal said.

The company has 90 days from Tuesday's ruling to sell Sparrows Point, but is eligible for a 60-day extension.

Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard said his company, which recently won control of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. in Wheeling, W.Va., has not heard from Mittal even though it has signaled its desire to buy Weirton and possibly Sparrows Point.

"Are we disappointed?" Bouchard said yesterday. "Yeah, but it's not the end of the world. If they say no, then it's no and we'll move on."

In yesterday's conference call, Aditya Mittal said the company wants to "improve profitability" at Weirton.

DOJ_NMG_0135277

However, he said tin plate production, while profitable, will likely face some restructuring in the near future because there is excess capacity.

The government chose Sparrows Point for divestment because it would be a more viable competitor in the tin plate market than Weirton. Mittal and U.S. Steel Corp. produce more than 80 percent of the nation's tin plate, which is used for such items as food containers, aerosol cans and paint buckets. The rest is made by Wheeling Pittsburgh.

Mittal declined to speculate how much Sparrows Point might be worth. The Baltimore County plant has the capacity to produce 3.6 million tons of steel per year, he said, and last year shipped about 3 million tons.

Unlike other Mittal plants around the world, the company does not have any major capital improvements planned for Sparrows Point over the next two years.

Mittal is building a hot-strip mill in Poland, increasing slab production in Brazil and expanding output in Ukraine, a country which offers the "lowest cost" and "highest contribution" to the company, Aditya Mittal said.

United Steelworkers spokesman Gary Hubbard said steel-worker jobs are being threatened by cheaper labor overseas. The union said Tuesday that it would work to reverse the Justice Department decision. Yesterday, Hubbard said he hopes a new buyer doesn't shrink Sparrows Point further.

"We've traveled a lot of hard trails at Sparrows Point," he said.

Sparrows Point workers hope the new owner will honor their contract, which is set to expire next year. Eddie Bartee Jr., 51, a third-generation steel worker and a trustee on USW Local 9477's executive board, said Mittal honored the union's contract when it bought International Steel Group in 2005 to form the world's largest steelmaker. ISG had bought the assets of Bethlehem Steel in 2003, two years after Bethlehem went bankrupt.

"Basically, if you come in with a good faith agreement with what we have, I think pretty much we'll be happy," said Bartee, a crane operator, who has worked at the plant for 33 years. "And then we'll face [contract negotiations] in 2008."

John Cirri, president of Local 9477, was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment.

Meanwhile, Mittal said the merger with Arcelor is on track and should be completed by July. The combined company, to be named Arcelor Mittal, will produce more than 110 million tons of steel a year.

Aditya Mittal said the company would continue to scale back production through at least March to ensure inventory is on par with supply. He said three blast furnaces across the company have been idled, and workers at Sparrows Point have been offered voluntary layoffs over the past few months. Mittal said the company realized "impressive" cost savings during the down time, and prices rose because the level of foreign imports fell off.

For last year, Arcelor Mittal reported combined earnings of nearly $8 billion, down from $8.26 billion a year earlier. The companies said they were squeezed by high raw materials costs but expect better earnings this year once synergies between the companies in marketing, purchasing and production are realized.

House Plans Hearing With Sirius Exec (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNET News, February 22, 2007

A proposed merger between XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio has only been officially public for a few days, but it's already stirring questions on Capitol Hill.

On February 28, the U.S. House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction over antitrust laws, plans to hold a hearing to examine potential ramifications of uniting the nation's only two satellite radio operators, a deal estimated at $5 billion. Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin is the only confirmed participant so far.

"We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry," Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the committee chairman, said in a statement. "Our members will explore how to define this new marketplace, and whether this merger will lead to increased choices and lower prices for consumers."

Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), the committee's co-chairman, said the panel plans to pay close attention to "whether satellite radio competes against terrestrial radio, the Internet, or other emerging technologies"--a consideration that is key to making an antitrust analysis.

It is ultimately up to the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to decide whether the deal merits approval. One of the questions that has been raised is whether such a merger it would amount, as critics say, to a "monopoly merger."

A few years ago, federal regulators blocked a merger between EchoStar Communications' Dish Network and Hughes Electronics' DirectTV, arguing that such a union would amount to a "regulated monopoly." FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has already suggested there will be high hurdles before the companies would receive the regulators' blessing.

Verizon, Vonage Rumble Over Patents (WSJ)

By Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Verizon Communications Inc.'s patent-infringement suit against Vonage Holding Corp. opened in federal court, potentially adding to the troubles of the largest Internet telephone start-up.

The case is closely watched by the nascent Web-calling industry, with some experts saying that a ruling against Vonage could encourage more patent suits in the telecom world.

Verizon is accusing Vonage of infringing five patents, some related to features such as call forwarding, fraud detection and other technologies. Vonage denies the accusations and argues that the actual goal of the Verizon suit is to eliminate the Internet company, a growing competitor to Verizon's landline phone business.

"We are firm in our belief that we have not infringed on their patents," said Brooke Schulz, a Vonage spokeswoman. "This case is about one thing and one thing only and that's about Verizon's attempts to stifle competition."

Officials at Verizon have said the company is motivated by a straightforward desire to protect its intellectual property. The phone company filed the suit in June in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, a month after Vonage's initial public offering in May.

Pretrial talks between the two competitors failed to result in a settlement. In court yesterday , the judge selected a jury and attorneys delivered opening statements for both sides.

Verizon lawyers said the company was seeking $197 million in damages, plus royalty for any future infringement. Vonage lawyers denied any infringement and said the patents were invalid and that the company owed nothing in damages.

Vonage offers customers discount phone service by letting them plug their phones into high-speed Internet connections, bypassing more costly landline service provided by established carriers. Founded in 2001, Vonage today has 2.2 million customers.

New York-based Verizon is the second-biggest U.S. telecom operator after AT&T Inc., with nearly 30 million residential phone subscriptions. Vonage, Holmdel, N.J., reported a loss of $65 million for the fourth quarter; Verizon posted net income of $1.03 billion for the same period.

Vonage has been beset by shareholder suits after a botched initial public offering. Yesterday on the New York Stock Exchange, Vonage shares were off 11 cents to $5.37, down more than two-thirds from the IPO.

Wireless carrier Sprint Nextel Corp. also has filed a patent-infringement suit against Vonage related to methods for transmitting calls between the Internet and conventional phone networks. Vonage has said in court filings that the Sprint and Verizon patents are invalid or don't apply to its services and that some of the patents cited by Sprint are so vague that they are unenforceable.

The patent disputes have alarmed other Internet-calling start-up businesses. They fear they may be sued or forced to pay licensing fees, which could hamper the growth of the Internet-phone business.

John Rabena, a partner with Sughrue Mion who specializes in Internet patent litigation, said the suit may help expose a vulnerability of many players in Internet technology.

"They don't have patents, so when they get attacked they don't have anything to negotiate," said Mr. Rabena, who isn't involved in the Verizon-Vonage case and doesn't represent any Internet-calling start-ups.

Some fear a win for Verizon can boost the appetite for patent suits, especially since the incentive has already increased in the wake of a brawl between the maker of the BlackBerry portable email device, Research in Motion Ltd., and patent-holder NTP Inc. That suit raised the possibility of a court-ordered shutdown of BlackBerry service in the U.S. before Research in Motion agreed to a $612.5 million settlement with NTP in May.

"If there's a big damage reward and an injunction issued, it becomes more attractive...to bring these types of suits," said Marty Zoltick, a patent attorney with Rothwell, Figg, Ernst & Manbeck, a law firm specializing in intellectual-property rights. "We're going to see more of these lawsuits."

Vonage believes it could continue operating even if it loses the Verizon case. "We have technology solutions and we have workarounds that we're working with our engineers on today," Ms. Schulz said. "There's a voracious appetite for [Internet calling] and Verizon cannot stop that."

Apple, Cisco Reach Accord Over IPhone (WSJ)

By Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135279

Apple Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. agreed to resolve a trademark dispute over the term iPhone that had threatened to put a damper on the introduction of Apple's most eagerly anticipated electronics product in years.

Under their agreement, Cisco, of San Jose, Calif., and Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., are free to use the iPhone trademark on their respective products throughout the world. Cisco will drop a lawsuit it filed against Apple in federal court in San Francisco, accusing Apple of infringing on a Cisco trademark with a forthcoming cellphone called the iPhone, due out in June.

In a joint statement, Apple and Cisco said they will explore opportunities for making their products work better together "in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications." The companies said other terms of the settlement are confidential, declining to comment further.

By reaching a deal, the two Silicon Valley icons head off a battle that potentially could have dragged on for years, and possibly led to an injunction to block Apple's use of the iPhone name.

Cisco sued Apple on January 10, the day after Apple Chief Executive Steve Jobs unveiled the iPhone at the Macworld convention in San Francisco. The networking giant said Apple had tried unsuccessfully on previous occasions to get Cisco to grant rights to use the iPhone name, and was engaged in intensive discussions until right before Apple unveiled the cellphone.

Initially, Apple declared the Cisco lawsuit "silly" and said it expected to prevail in any court fight. More recently, both parties said they were attempting to resolve the dispute amicably.

Cisco has held a trademark on the iPhone name since 2000, when it acquired a company called Infogear Technology that made an Internet-connected telephone. Last spring, Cisco unveiled a new line of gadgets bearing the iPhone name that use voice over Internet protocol, or VoIP, technology to transmit phone calls over the Internet.

Apple plans to begin selling the iPhone in the U.S. along with its exclusive wireless partner AT&T Inc.'s Cingular for between $499 and $599.

Settlement Lets Apple Use 'iPhone' (NYT)

By Brad Stone

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 21 — Apple and Cisco Systems have decided that a name is not worth fighting over.

On Wednesday, the companies settled their dispute over the iPhone trademark. Six weeks ago, Cisco filed a lawsuit in federal court in San Francisco over Apple's planned use of the name for its much anticipated multimedia device, which combines the features of a mobile phone, an iPod and a BlackBerry.

Cisco claimed that it had owned the trademark since 2000 and was using it for a line of Internet-connected phones.

Wednesday night, in a short, ambiguously worded statement, the companies said they would dismiss all legal action against each other regarding the trademark and that Apple could use the name for its device, which it plans to start selling in June.

In addition, the companies said they would explore ways to make their identically named iPhone products work together "in the areas of security and consumer and enterprise communication."

Representatives for Apple and Cisco said other terms of the deal would remain confidential. It is not known if Apple made a cash payment to Cisco, but intellectual property lawyers say some sort of payment is typical in these cases. It is also unclear whether Cisco had sold Apple the name iPhone outright and had then secured permission to use it itself.

But the deal appears to give a partial victory to both sides. Apple can begin selling its phone with the name that its strong-willed chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, seemed to prefer.

Cisco can also continue to use the name, and with the promise of interoperability, it might have some of the hype and magic surrounding Apple's products rub off on its own less prominent offerings.

Hostilities broke out between the two companies last month, when Mr. Jobs announced the music phone at the annual Macworld convention in San Francisco.

Cisco, the networking company based in San Jose, Calif., was using the name to sell phones that can plug into a PC or connect with a wireless hot spot and make free calls over the Internet.

The two companies negotiated intensely over the trademark in early January. Executives had planned to make announcements concurrently at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas and at Macworld, proclaiming the links between their iPhone products.

After talks broke down and Mr. Jobs announced his iPhone anyway, Cisco filed a lawsuit, saying that Apple's use of the iPhone name constituted a "willful and malicious" violation of Cisco's intellectual property. In response, Apple called the lawsuit "silly" and noted publicly that several companies besides Cisco were using the iPhone name.

Cisco's lawsuit described covert Apple attempts to obtain the rights to the iPhone name. In September 2006, a corporation calling itself Ocean Telecom Services filed an application for the trademark based on earlier filings in Trinidad and Tobago. In its complaint, Cisco asserted that Apple was behind the efforts.

But while they flung legal accusations at each other, both companies faced significant pressure to settle. Apple's iPhone will be released in June and will be available to customers of the AT&T wireless network, which was formerly known as Cingular Wireless. If Apple had failed to settle with Cisco and subsequently lost the battle in court, it could have been liable for financial penalties for each unit that it sold.

But Cisco also faced a strong incentive to reach a deal.

"Cisco had to provide access to the trademark to Apple if it wanted to achieve the highest value for the name. There was no potential second buyer who would have equaled Apple's desire for the iPhone mark," said Alan Fisch, an intellectual-property lawyer at Kaye Scholer in Washington.

He added that Cisco also faced the reality that consumers associated the name more with Apple.

"The iPhone name has been informally synonymous with an anticipated Apple phone for years prior to the product's formal announcement," he said.

Analysts Say Apple Appears To Have Topped Cisco In IPhone Agreement (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, February 22, 2007

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Apple and Cisco Systems ended their feud over the iPhone name late Wednesday — and Apple appears to have won, tech analysts said.

The two Silicon Valley tech giants said they agreed to share rights to the name and end their legal battle over it.

Cisco — the longtime owner of the name — had earlier said it would share it with Apple as long as the electronics-maker made its iPhone compatible with other companies' products. The settlement addressed that concern, with the two companies pledging to "explore opportunities for interoperability in the areas of security, and consumer and (business) communications."

Other terms were confidential.

Since the full deal was not made public, it's hard to say for sure which company came out on top, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. But it sure looks like a "face-saving" agreement for Cisco, he says.

"It looks like Cisco caved," says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. The pledge of interoperability talks "looks like the typical promise that (Apple CEO) Steve Jobs has no intention of keeping," he says.

Cisco declined to comment beyond the official statement. Apple did not return phone calls.

The controversy over the iPhone name began last year, when Apple was developing a feature-packed cellphone. Long before it had an official name, Apple fans dubbed it the iPhone. That's because many Apple products begin with an "i", including the iPod music player and iTunes music store.

But there was a problem: Cisco, the world's largest network equipment maker, owned the iPhone trademark. It had originally been registered in 1996 by InfoGear, a networking company later acquired by Cisco. After the deal, Cisco adopted the name and introduced a line of iPhones, which it still sells today.

Cisco's iPhones are corporate office phones that place calls over an Internet connection instead of a traditional phone network. They do not compete directly with Apple's iPhone.

Lawyers from the two companies talked, but Apple broke off the discussion, Cisco said. Hours later, Apple announced its iPhone. Cisco sued in U.S. District Court.

At the time, Cisco said what it really wanted was for Apple to make the iPhone compatible with other products. Cisco advocates such standards because it sells the networking gear that connects them.

But now it appears that Apple will get the name without fully meeting Cisco's demands, Kay says.

"It looks like Cisco got shafted," he says. "Maybe there's something in the (undisclosed) terms, but I don't see how they're getting the good end of the deal."

Microsoft, AT&T Argue Software-Patent Case (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court, in the latest in a series of cases revisiting the application of patent protections in the high-tech era, heard arguments over where software fits within intellectual-property law.

In general, patents are only enforceable in the country that issues them. Thus, it is no infringement for a foreign firm to manufacture and sell a rival's U.S.-patented device abroad. To extend their monopolies overseas, U.S. companies must obtain a patent in each nation where they wish to protect their inventions. Under a special exception, though, it is an infringement to ship U.S.-made components of a patented device for assembly overseas.

AT&T Inc. holds a patent for voice-compression technology that makes it easier to transmit and store speech on personal computers and other devices. Microsoft Corp. concedes installing the technology on U.S.-built computers would infringe the patent. But it says it isn't a violation to ship a master disk of the software overseas, where it duplicates the software for installation on computers assembled in Germany, Belgium and other countries.

Microsoft argues the "component" is a physical disk containing the software, and it is free to duplicate it overseas, much as it could duplicate any other patented device overseas. AT&T contends the software itself is the component, regardless of the medium.

Lower courts, including the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, a panel that hears patent appeals, have agreed with AT&T. But the Supreme Court has repeatedly reversed the panel in decisions the justices concluded tipped too much power to patent holders. Critics, joined by the Bush administration, have argued Federal Circuit doctrine frustrates the aim of patent law by impeding innovation.

The high court has never held that software itself can be patented, and in oral arguments yesterday, the justices struggled to conceptualize what sort of product source code is. The importance could be seen in the advocates -- Microsoft and AT&T, which have reached a confidential deal whose terms depend on the case outcome. Each hired a former solicitor general to make its argument. The issue could have implications for other high-tech products that can easily be duplicated, such as bioengineered organisms.

Justice Anthony Kennedy called it "odd" that Microsoft would be the party contending that a computer disk, rather than the software, is product. "I mean, Microsoft doesn't say please buy our disc because it's the prettiest disc in the business," he said. "It says buy our program because the program means something," he said.

"But the program is nothing until made into a physical manifestation that can be read by the computer," replied former Bush Solicitor General Theodore Olson, representing Microsoft. "An idea or a principle...can't be patented. It has to be put together with a machine and made into a usable device." In this case, "the components that make the machines run that are produced abroad are not supplied from the United States."

Former Clinton Solicitor General Seth Waxman, representing AT&T, argued that the means of transmitting software code -- whether on a master disk shipped overseas and duplicated or through photons streamed through an undersea cable -- was irrelevant.

Justice David Souter said the source code might be better understood less as a product than a blueprint, which can be taken overseas and used to replicate a design. Under AT&T's view, he suggested, "any export of a blueprint," or simply sending a patent itself overseas, "would be a violation."

Court Takes On Software Patents (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

The name alone -- Microsoft v. AT&T-- conjures a galactic showdown. And the legal battle over a patent dispute that unfolded in the Supreme Court yesterday brought together elements of an epic.

Millions of dollars, at a minimum, ride on the outcome. The companies have hired two of Washington's most prominent Supreme Court gladiators, who together have argued nearly 100 cases before the high court, to present their cases. Some justices were on the edges of their seats as they absorbed a mind-bending blend of law and abstract thought, of computer-code poetry and patent-law banality.

The case even involves a "golden disk."

So what if that disk only contains Microsoft's Windows operating system?

"I hope we can continue calling it the golden disk," Justice Antonin Scalia said, when one justice blandly referred to it as the master disk. "It has a certain Scheherazade quality that really adds a lot of interest to this case."

At issue is whether Microsoft can be held liable for violating an AT&T patent on technology that condenses speech into computer code, similar to that found on Microsoft's Windows program.

Microsoft admitted it infringed the AT&T patent on computers sold domestically but contends that it is not liable for its programs installed by computer manufacturers overseas.

In 1984, Congress amended the patent law to forbid companies from shipping components of patented inventions overseas and having the parts assembled elsewhere in an attempt to skirt patent laws.

So in this case, justices are looking at whether digital software code can be considered a "component" of a patented invention and if so, whether it was "supplied" from the United States.

The case has sparked intense interest among U.S. technology firms, especially software developers, who worry they could be left increasingly vulnerable for infringing patents if the ruling goes against Microsoft.

"It would create an enormous base for damages," explained Stephen B. Maebius, a lawyer at Foley & Lardner specializing in intellectual-property rights. This could create an incentive for companies to move their research and development operations abroad, beyond the reach of U.S. courts, he said.

Even some of Microsoft's traditional competitors such as Yahoo and Amazon.com have joined to support the company's argument that overseas production should be governed by those countries' laws.

"At the time the statute was amended, global trade was far more limited and certainly did not include easily distributed computer and Internet transmissions," according to an analysts' report issued yesterday by Stifel Nicolaus, a brokerage firm specializing in technology and telecommunications.

The report quoted a lawyer for Yahoo as saying an unfavorable ruling for Microsoft could extend patent liability "to every corner of the world" where a copy of U.S.-developed software is used, including software downloaded over the Internet.

Seth P. Waxman, AT&T's lawyer and a former Clinton administration solicitor general, told justices they should uphold two lower courts' rulings in the company's favor.

Waxman said there is no dispute that Microsoft sends Windows code from the United States, via the "golden disk" or electronic transmission, to be installed in foreign computers.

"Those facts resolve this case," Waxman said. "Microsoft has 'supplied' a 'component' that when 'combined with hardware' enables the practice of AT&T's invention."

But Microsoft's lawyer, former Bush administration solicitor general Theodore B. Olson, countered that the code is copied outside the United States and installed on computers overseas. Thus, U.S. patent laws don't apply, he said.

"Those are computers that are sold abroad," Olson told the court. The components the law refers to, he said, were all manufactured overseas.

The justices wrestled with whether computer code would be patented or whether the code alone could be a component.

Waxman said code is "dynamic," in that it causes a computer to take action, while Olson said it was more like a blueprint. It can be used to produce exact copies that are not patent infringements, he said, like instructions for building a car or a mousetrap.

The court sought guidance from the current solicitor general's office, which largely supported Microsoft's position.

Assistant Solicitor General Daryl Joseffer said lower courts have interpreted U.S. patent law too broadly. And he said the government's view is that the component at issue would be the software with the code on it, not the code alone.

He compared it to a key and lock.

"A key has a series of ridges on it that enable it to open a lock," Joseffer said. "And that series of ridges can be denoted by a sequence of numbers, bigger numbers for deeper ridges. But the component is the key that actually turns the lock, not the abstract sequence of ridges on the key."

Eight justices will decide the case before July; Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is recused because he owns Microsoft stock.

9 States Sue Over Mercury Emissions (AP)

By John Flesher, AP Environmental Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - TRAVERSE CITY, Mich.-Michigan and eight other states sued the Bush administration Tuesday, saying the White House failed to adequately regulate emissions of mercury and other pollutants at cement plants.

The states contend a rule issued by the Environmental Protection Agency in December does not comply with the federal Clean Air Act.

Mercury comes from raw materials used to make cement - such as limestone, clay, sand and iron ore - and from fuels such as coal, which fires the kilns where the ingredients are baked at high temperatures.

In December, the EPA announced new limits on mercury and hydrocarbon emissions from cement kilns built after Dec. 2, 2005.

But for kilns built earlier, the agency imposes lesser requirements such as operating kilns properly to ensure complete combustion and removing kiln dust when it can no longer be recycled.

DOJ_NMG_0135283

Critics say the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to limit mercury from all kilns, not just new ones.

"I think they should have explored some of the options a bit more in detail than they did," said Vince Hellwig, air quality chief with the Michigan Department of Environmental Quality.

The lawsuit was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, where several environmental groups filed a separate action last week. The other eight states are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

EPA spokesman John Millett said the matter was under review and declined to comment further.

The agency says it has reduced mercury air emissions by 45 percent since 1990. It estimates the nation's 118 cement plants give off a combined 12,000 pounds of mercury a year, although some state regulators say the actual amount is higher. 2007-02-21T02:06:42Z

That 'Drought' In Southwest May Be Normal, Report Says (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Colorado River Basin is more prone to drought than had been thought, a panel of experts reported yesterday, and as the climate warms and the population in the region grows, pressure on water supplies will become greater.

The severe droughts the region suffered in the 1990s and early 2000s would not stand out in the record of the last few centuries, the panel said, and the future presents "a sobering prospect for elected officials and water managers." The panel said residents of the region should prepare for more frequent and more severe dry spells, and "costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-offs" in water use.

The data discussed in the report have been published before in scholarly journals and elsewhere. But Ernest T. Smerdon, a former dean of the College of Engineering and Mines at the University of Arizona, who led the panel, said its members hoped with this publication to pull the findings into a single document that ordinary people could understand.

Severe droughts will recur, Dr. Smerdon said, "and we better be prepared. That is the message." He spoke at a news conference yesterday in Las Vegas, where the report was made public.

The panel recommended an "action-oriented" study of water use patterns and demands, including drought planning, population projections and possible effects of transferring water to urban areas from agriculture, still the dominant consumer. Dialogue between policy makers and scientists who study water issues should be "a permanent fixture within the basin," it said.

The panel, organized by the National Research Council, the research arm of the National Academy of Science, noted that the water allocation agreement for the basin, the Colorado River Compact, was negotiated in 1922 based on river flow records dating to the 1890s, when gauging stations were established. The agreement assumed that the annual river flow was 16.4 million acre feet — enough to cover 16.4 million acres to a depth of one foot.

But for some time, the panel said, researchers have known that the early 20th century was unusually wet and that 15 million acre feet was a more accurate estimate of the flow. Recent studies based on tree rings put the figure lower still — as low as 13 million acre feet — and suggest that "drought episodes are a recurrent and integral feature of the region's climate."

Because trees grow more when it is wet, scientists use tree ring size as an indicator of water abundance. The report says the federal Bureau of Reclamation and other agencies requested the panel's review in the wake of the new findings.

Global warming is already making things worse, the experts said. For one thing, warmer weather means less precipitation in the form of snow, which is stored in the region's mountain snowpack. And the snowpack itself forms later and melts sooner each winter. As a result, the steady reliability of snowpack water storage is compromised. Also, warmer weather itself increases consumer, environmental and agricultural demands for water.

Rainfall patterns are difficult to predict, another panel member, Connie A. Woodhouse, a geographer at the University of Arizona, said at the news conference. But the report said it was probable that the region would experience less precipitation over all in a warmer world.

Cloud-seeding, water desalinization and improved underground water storage have yet to emerge as solutions, the report said, and even conservation, while helpful, "is no panacea," Dr. Smerdon said.

The report, which is available at www.nationalacademies.org, notes that the basin, 240,000 square miles in Wyoming, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, California and Mexico, has seen rapid population growth in recent decades. Until about 30 years ago, the panel wrote, growing demands for water were met through building dams and reservoirs. But today, the report says, "prospects for constructing additional large dams in the Colorado River basin have diminished."

Instead, "there is going to have to be some kind of reallocation of who gets the water," said Richard Seager, a climate expert at the Lamont Doherty Earth Observatory, who was not involved in the panel's report.

DOJ_NMG_0135284

Dr. Seager, who studies the drought history of North America, said that it was “silly” to put golf courses in the region’s desert areas and that hotels and other businesses were already installing water-conserving toilets and other fixtures.

But he added, referring to cattle and cotton raising, “Let’s think whether it makes sense to have all this subsidized agriculture in the region, people who aren’t even paying the full cost of the water they do use.”

Report Warns Water Crisis Looming In Arid Southwest (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll, Usa Today

USA Today, February 22, 2007

DENVER — The fast-growing states of the arid Southwest must plan for more severe droughts because of a regional warming trend that shows no signs of dissipating, says a new assessment of the Colorado River's water supply.

The report released Wednesday by the National Research Council says agriculture, which uses 80% of the West's water, is the likeliest target for shifting water supplies to growing urban areas. But the council, an agency of the National Academy of Sciences, cautions that "the availability of agricultural water is finite."

Rising population "will inevitably result in increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices" in sharing the Southwest's most precious natural resource, the report says.

The Colorado River Basin includes seven states: parts of California, the nation's biggest farm producer; Wyoming, and five of the 12 fastest-growing states: Nevada, Arizona, Colorado, Utah and New Mexico.

Until now, water needs have been met by selling or leasing water rights from farms to cities. As population growth demands more of a shrinking water supply, battles could erupt over dwindling farm land and rural landscapes drying up. Some farm production might have to shift elsewhere because of urban growth.

The report says climate reconstructions using tree-ring data and projections with computer models show extended droughts were common in the past and will be longer, more severe and more frequent in the future. "That's not a happy picture," says Ernest Smerdon, a former University of Arizona engineering dean and one of the report's authors.

"The preponderance of scientific evidence suggests that warmer future temperatures will reduce future Colorado River stream flow and water supplies," the report says. Technological measures such as water conservation, de-salting plants and underground storage can help but are not a long-term "panacea for coping" with less water and more people.

"If people think they can save enough water to meet all the future demands, our judgment (is) that it's not going to be that easy," Smerdon says. "(We) are not predicting doom. We are just saying that there are critical issues to be addressed."

The panel does not recommend specific steps except a regionwide study by federal agencies and the states of urban water use. An issue certain to arise is how much agricultural water could be shifted to cities. The report says farm water may be "the most important, and perhaps final, large reservoir of available water for urban use in the arid U.S. West."

Smerdon says the report aims "in plain language" to emphasize the need to act.

The states share the Colorado River under a compact adopted in 1922, an extraordinarily wet period of mountain snows and plentiful river flows. In drier decades since, demand has exceeded supply. A drought since 2000 has shrunk some reservoirs to 50% or less of normal.

Key Water Source Is Affected By Global Warming, Report Finds (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

Global warming will worsen drought and reduce flows on the Colorado River, a key water source for several western states, according to a report released Wednesday.

The study, prepared by a National Research Council committee, paints a sobering picture as the water needs of a rapidly expanding population test the limits of a river system strained by the effects of climate change.

"The basin is going to face increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices," said Ernest Smerdon, who chaired the panel of academicians and scientists who wrote the report. "Increasing demands are impeding the region's ability to cope with droughts and water shortages."

Such measures as conservation, desalination and water recycling would be helpful, the authors said, but wouldn't offer a panacea.

The report, which examined climate modeling and tree ring data, reaffirms a more pessimistic assessment of river hydrology that has emerged in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0135285

Scientists have concluded that the Colorado river system, which supplies water to 25 million people and several million acres of crop and ranch land, has been drier and more prone to severe drought than was the case in the early 20th century, when the river's flows were divvied among the seven basin states.

It turns out that period was unusually wet, prompting an overly generous estimate of how much water would be available to farms and cities. Ancient tree rings, which provide graphic evidence of past precipitation patterns, indicate it had been three centuries since the basin was last awash with that much water.

The most recent drought began in 2000 and has left the river's biggest reservoirs, Lake Mead and Lake Powell, roughly half empty.

"Now that is not a happy picture," Smerdon said. "What we want people to do is to be aware of these scientific facts and take them into account as they plan for development, for drought-contingency plans."

Global warming will only make matters worse, said Connie Woodhouse, a University of Arizona associate professor of geography who helped write the report. "It's going to enhance the droughts" that are part of the natural climate cycle.

Although the river's flows returned to normal in 2005 after five years of dramatic lows, they fell again last year. Federal scientists say that if they remain below average or even average, Lake Mead might never completely refill.

The study, which was sponsored by the National Academies, the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation and several water agencies, notes that temperatures have risen in the western United States over the past century and are expected to keep climbing.

"All of the models are predicting very significant warming in the future," said Smerdon, a former engineering college dean at the University of Arizona in Tucson.

The report acknowledges some uncertainty over whether climate change would alter the amount of precipitation in the basin. But as the mercury rises, water demands would increase. There would be more evaporation from croplands and reservoirs, and wild land vegetation would suck more moisture from the soil, reducing runoff.

"I think a reasonably savvy person would have to say you're going to see less water in that river," said Brad Udall, director of Western Water Assessment at the University of Colorado in Boulder, who was not a member of the report committee. "The real question is how much less. Is it 5 percent less or is it 40 percent less and by when?"

The U.S. Department of Interior, which oversees the Colorado's management, is reviewing a drought plan the states put together last year. Because California holds some of the most senior rights to the river, Arizona, Nevada and Mexico would experience cuts in deliveries before California, said Roger Patterson, assistant general manager of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California.

The river is a major source for Metropolitan, Southern California's major urban water supplier. Last year about 30 percent of the agency's water deliveries came from the Colorado, which provides about 10 percent of California's overall urban and agricultural supplies.

Most of the state's river allotment -- the biggest in the system -- goes to the Imperial Irrigation District, which distributes water to the croplands of the Imperial Valley, one of the nation's biggest lettuce producers.

Noting that farms remain the dominant water user in the Colorado basin, the report called agricultural water "the most important and perhaps final large reservoir of available water for urban use in the arid U.S. West."

But that supply is also finite, the authors emphasized, and shifting water from farm to city could have negative impacts. Transfers could hurt rural economies, lower food production and rob wildlife of leaking irrigation water that nourishes important habitat.

Great Forests Hold Fateful Role in Climate Change

PINE FALLS, Manitoba -- Here on the edge of the silent and frozen northern tier of the Earth, the fate of the world's climate is buried beneath the snow and locked in the still limbs of aspen trees.

Nearly half of the carbon that exists on land is contained in the sweeping boreal forests, which gird the Earth in the northern reaches of Canada, Alaska, Scandinavia and Russia. Scientists now fear that the steady rise in the temperature of the atmosphere and the increasing human activity in those lands are releasing that carbon, a process that could trigger a vicious cycle of even more warming.

The prospect of the land itself accelerating climate change staggers scientists, as well as woodsmen such as Bob Austman, who stopped recently in a quiet stand of birch on the edge of the boreal forest to examine a jack rabbit's tracks.

"There are big forces out there," he said succinctly.

DOJ_NMG_0135286

Those forces, which scientists are only starting to understand, could free vast stores of carbon and methane that have been collecting since the last ice age in the frozen tundra and northern forests. Their release would push the world's climate toward a heat spiral that would raise ocean levels, spawn fierce storms and scorch farmlands, scientists believe.

But the land is impartial. It could also be enlisted to help abate global warming, as both a storehouse for man-made carbon dioxide and a natural sponge for greenhouse gases. Policymakers are considering changes to protect and expand the forested areas that store carbon; outside the boreal forest, they are experimenting with techniques to bury man-made carbon dioxide in underground vaults and porous seams.

"The world is both victim of climate change and a possible solution to it," said Stewart Elgie, associate director of the Institute of the Environment at the University of Ottawa.

Carbon is freed from the land in numerous ways. Permafrost melting because of warmer weather exposes peat, deadwood and buried pine needles to decay, freeing the carbon they contain. Fires, raging through forests more often because of hotter and drier weather, send wood -- and its carbon -- up in smoke. Insects thriving in milder winters girdle trees and send them to rot on the forest floor. Miners and oilmen build roads that expose the earth and warm the land, and loggers cut down old forests and replace them with young ones that will take decades of growth to absorb and store the same amount of carbon.

As the released carbon rises, it adds to the belt of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere, trapping even more heat, which causes more warming. Scientists call it a "feedback loop." Others have a more ominous term: the carbon time bomb.Risk Poorly Understood

"We are taking risks with a system we don't understand that is absolutely loaded with carbon," said Steven Kallick, a Seattle-based expert on the boreal forests for the Pew Charitable Trusts. "The impact could be enormous."

Scientists acknowledge they are not certain how the carbon time bomb will explode, or when. Many of the consequences of global warming that experts once predicted would take centuries are occurring in decades, such as the melting of the world's glaciers and ice caps. But other changes might be more gradual.

"With permafrost, it may take longer for change to get moving. But it may keep moving, even if we get our emissions under control," said Antoni Lewkowicz, a professor of geography at the University of Ottawa. "It's like a big boulder. Once you get it moving, it won't stop."

Brian Amiro, head of the department of soil science at the University of Manitoba, is part of a research team involved in a project called Fluxnet. The researchers have erected more than 400 towers throughout the world, outfitted with instruments to measure the exchange of carbon between earth and air. The boreal forest, sometimes called "the lungs of the world," breathes in more carbon in years when the forests grow, and loses more carbon in years of bad forest fires, drought or insect infestation.

Lately, there has been a string of bad years. The number of forest fires in Canada doubled in the 1980s and '90s from the previous two decades, and some scientific models indicate they will double again this century, Amiro said. Logging, mining and oil exploration have carved roads deeper into the forests. Temperatures have risen faster toward the north -- by as much as five degrees since the 1950s -- than in more temperate zones.

"The environmental triggers are going to become much more significant," said Faisal Moola, director of science at the David Suzuki Foundation, a Vancouver-based environmental organization.

There are mixed views about whether the process can be stopped. The levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere -- the highest in at least 420,000 years -- mean average temperatures will continue to rise, accelerating the thawing.

But humanity's footprint could be changed. Development, mining and logging account for 25 percent of the carbon loss in forests, Elgie said. Logging releases almost twice as much carbon dioxide each year as all the passenger vehicles in Canada, he said.Credits for Preservation

Here in Pine Falls, a town of 1,400 about 80 miles northeast of Winnipeg, the giant Tembec pulp mill billows steam and smoke into the crystalline sky. The 1920s-era mill makes newsprint from spruce and pine trees, and Vince Keenan, a forester for the company, said Tembec has responded to calls for change. It has set aside 12 percent of its 2 million-acre logging forest here, and up to one-fourth of its product is now made from recycled paper. Changes in mill practices have reduced greenhouse gas emissions by nearly 50 percent since 1990, he said.

But a broader step would be to set aside vast areas of the forest now designated for mining or logging and preserve them. This could be done by setting up a system of "carbon credits," in which, for example, an industrial plant would offset its pollution by paying money to preserve land in the forest that could store an equal amount of carbon.

"Right now, the only way to make money in the boreal forest is to cut trees down," Elgie said. "If you had carbon credits, you would be able to make money by keeping the trees up and storing carbon."

That system appeals to some native Indian groups, now torn between the desire to keep their traditional lands and the need for income from logging or mining.

DOJ_NMG_0135287

"Preserving the land is important to us," said Carl Smith, an elder of the Brokenhead Ojibway First Nation on the Winnipeg River near Pine Falls. "Once the land is gone, you're gone."

Smith also is president of the Manitoba Model Forest, a group set up 15 years ago to balance the competing views of how the forest here should be used. One of its goals is teaching schoolchildren about the forest, a job that falls to Bob Austman, the woodsman, whose family has lived in and on the boreal forests of Manitoba for three generations.

He sees nothing but beauty here. As he and Brian Kotak, an environmental scientist, tramped in minus-10-degree cold through a stand of birch near the Winnipeg River recently, it seemed hard to see the Earth as a potential danger.

"The dilemma," Austman said, "is that we live on a planet with 6 billion people. This land is under increasing pressure."Turning a Minus Into a Plus

South of the great swath of forest in central Canada, the wrinkles of the land smooth out, stretching toward a straight horizon. The Great Plains are frozen and still in winter. But in Weyburn, 70 miles southeast of Saskatchewan's capital, Regina, pumps bob relentlessly amid the snowy wheat fields, sucking crude oil from a mile underground like a host of mechanical mosquitoes.

What goes back into the ground here heartens some environmentalists. The giant EnCana oil and gas company, which operates more than 700 oil pumps in this field, pumps carbon dioxide deep down to drive more oil out of the porous rocks.

Almost inadvertently, the company has become the world's largest working example of carbon storage, or sequestration, a technique being hailed by international experts as one tool to reduce greenhouse gases. Darcy Cretin, operations superintendent at the EnCana plant, is slightly amused by the environmental scientists who have flocked here to see the maze of pipes, pumps, valves and sensors planted in the prairie.

"We have to keep explaining we are doing this to make more oil," he said. "The carbon sequestration is an extra."

When the oil brought up at Weyburn dwindled after 40 years of pumping, EnCana struck a deal with the Dakota Gasification Co. It owns a plant in Beulah, N.D., that converts coal to natural gas. Combustion at the gasification plant makes carbon dioxide, which was being vented into the air. EnCana offered to buy the gas, and in 1999 the U.S. company built a 200-mile pipeline into Canada. The foot-wide pipe emerges from its underground route at a chain-link fence on the edge of EnCana's property.

The company pumps the carbon dioxide under high pressure into the oil field. The gas acts as a kind of solvent, driving the oil out of porous rock. The greenhouse gas remains underground, leaving buried nearly 5,000 tons a day that would otherwise have gone into the atmosphere.

Experts believe this scheme of carbon storage could be used more widely in cases where the gas could be easily collected at a single point and moved by pipeline to a storage field. The approach would not work where the carbon dioxide could not be collected easily, such as from the tailpipes of moving cars. But nearly 40 percent of the carbon dioxide released to the air comes from big power plants or industrial areas, where the gas could be captured.

A committee of more than 100 experts from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change concluded in 2005 that carbon sequestration has "considerable potential" to help reduce greenhouse gases, and a lengthy study at Weyburn by the International Energy Agency found virtually no leakage. The British Columbia government this month announced that all its coal-fired electric plants will be required to utilize carbon sequestration to eliminate greenhouse gas emissions.

For oilmen such as Cretin, the prospect of helping reduce a greenhouse gas by pumping it underground seems a natural fit.

"This is pretty easy," he said. "It's basic stuff for us."

U.S. Is Sued Over Position On Marijuana (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 21 — Frustrated by government policy and inaction, a group of advocates for medical marijuana sued two federal health agencies on Wednesday over the assertion that smoking it has no medical benefit.

The group, Americans for Safe Access, a nonprofit organization based in Oakland, filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court, challenging the government's position that marijuana, "has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States."

In its lawsuit, the group contends that federal regulators have publicly issued "false and misleading statements" about the medical benefits of marijuana.

The lawsuit, which named the Department of Health and Human Services and the Food and Drug Administration, seeks a court order to retract and correct statements that the group called, “incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws.”

A lawyer for the medical marijuana group, Joseph Elford, said the lawsuit was filed now because administrative avenues had been exhausted and because of mounting scientific and anecdotal evidence to the contrary.

Mr. Elford said a recent study by the Clinical Research Center at San Francisco General Hospital, which was approved by the F.D.A. and other federal agencies, found that smoking marijuana relieved pain and certain symptoms of H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS.

A spokeswoman for the health department said Wednesday in a telephone interview that “the agency does not comment on litigation as a general policy.”

The spokeswoman, Christina Pearson, said the agency stood by its publicly stated position and pointed to an April 20, 2006, statement. In that advisory, which Ms. Pearson said was current, the federal government asserts that “there is currently sound evidence that smoked marijuana is harmful.”

It goes on to say that “no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana,” which is not an approved drug.

Group Sues U.S. Over Medical Marijuana Claims (AP)

By Lisa Leff, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

(AP) - OAKLAND, California-Armed with a new study that shows smoking marijuana eased pain in some HIV patients, medical marijuana advocates sued the U.S. government Wednesday over its claim that the drug has no accepted medical benefits.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court by Americans for Safe Access accuses the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services of engaging in "arbitrary and unlawful behavior" that prevents "sick and dying persons from seeking to obtain medicine that could provide them needed, and often lifesaving relief."

The group wants a judge to force the department and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to stop giving out information that casts doubt on the efficacy of marijuana in treating various illnesses.

"The FDA position on medical cannabis is incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws requiring the government to base policy on sound science," Joe Elford, chief counsel for the group, said in a statement.

California is one of 11 states where marijuana use is legal for people with a doctor's recommendation, but because the U.S. government does not recognize the drug's medical benefits, patients can still be arrested and prosecuted by federal authorities.

Last week, researchers from the University of California, San Francisco reported in the journal Neurology that a test involving 50 HIV patients showed that those who smoked pot experienced much less pain than those given placebos.

Americans for Safe Access said in the lawsuit that Health and Human Services has rejected its requests to retract the assertion that cannabis "has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States," a position the agency has advertised since 2000.

The Department of Health and Human Services did not immediately have a response to the lawsuit.

Medical Pot Advocates Sue Feds Over False Info (SMCT)

San Mateo County Times, February 21, 2007

Medical marijuana advocates have sued the federal Department of Health and Human Services, accusing it of lying to the nation about the drug's lack of accepted medical use despite scientific studies showing its efficacy.

The lawsuit, filed today in federal court in Oakland, comes a week after the release of a controlled, clinical University of California, San Francisco study showing HIV patients who smoked marijuana found relief from chronic foot pain.

"We are asking the courts to weigh in on the science ... and force the government to stop making false statements about medical cannabis," said Steph Sherer, executive director of Americans for Safe Access.

ASA attorney Joe Elford said the lawsuit is brought under the federal Administrative Procedure Act, which provides for judicial review and reversal of any agency action found to be arbitrary and capricious.

ASA in October 2004 had petitioned the Department of Health and Human Services and its subordinate Food and Drug Administration under the Data Quality Act, a 2000 law requiring information circulated by federal agencies to be fair, objective and meet certain quality guidelines. That law lets citizens challenge government information believed to be inaccurate or based on bad data; ASA's petition claimed the government has ignored scientific studies and medical consensus on marijuana's efficacy as medicine.

DOJ_NMG_0135289

HHS denied the petition in 2005 and denied an appeal in July 2006. Those decisions are arbitrary

Advertisement

and capricious, Elford said, and so Americans for Safe Access has been biding its time ever since to sue.

"We aimed to file this lawsuit at a time when the country was talking about the science," Sherer said, but her group doesn't think it even needs the newly released UCSF study to bolster its case; it believed the science was solid enough when it petitioned HHS in 2004.

"The federal government has had enough information in front of it for years to break the gridlock on this issue," she said. "We're suing to demand that the FDA stop holding science hostage to politics."

Sherer is one of four medical-marijuana users used as examples in the lawsuit. She suffered a neck injury in 2000 and later developed kidney problems from the ibuprofen and other painkillers she'd been prescribed. The government told her marijuana had no medical use, so she was delayed in seeking a doctor's advice to the contrary and finding relief, she says.

California voters approved medical use of marijuana by passing Proposition 215 in 1996, but federal law still bans the drug's cultivation, possession and use. Despite years of lobbying by advocates, it remains on the nation's list of most-restricted drugs -- along with substances such as heroin and LSD -- without accepted medical use. And despite a 1999 federal Institute of Medicine study urging more research, studies like UCSF's still face enormous obstacles and so remain rare.

Medical marijuana patients Angel Raich of Oakland and Diane Monson of Oroville sued federal law enforcement officials in 2002, claiming the federal government lacks authority to prosecute California's patients and providers. The U.S. Supreme Court in June 2005 ruled 6-3 to uphold federal prosecutions, finding that even marijuana grown in back yards for personal medical use can affect or contribute to the illegal interstate marijuana market and so is within Congress' constitutional reach.

But the court, in a footnote, did "acknowledge that evidence proffered by respondents in this case regarding the effective medical uses for marijuana, if found credible after trial, would cast serious doubt on the accuracy of the findings that require marijuana to be listed" among the most-restricted drugs.

Medical Pot ID Card Cost To Skyrocket (SMDJ)

San Mateo Daily Journal, February 22, 2007

State fee hikes due to a shortfall of clients for California's medical marijuana identification cards is trickling down to local programs, including San Mateo County which plans to nearly quadruple the cost by next month.

At its meeting Feb. 27, the Board of Supervisors plan to increase fees from $45 to $174. Medi-Cal beneficiaries will still receive a 50 percent discount.

The county only received word from the state Department of Health Services about the fee increase in January, said Beverly Thames, the county health department spokeswoman.

The change is effective March 1 but participants will only feel the pinch as their cards expire annually.

The ID program must be funded entirely by fees rather than taxpayer dollars at both the state and county level. The state is changing its portion of the fees collected from $13 to $142 per card. The county charges its own fee for processing and verification.

Each county participating in the ID program is setting its own fees but, coupled with the state mandate, the totals are way past $100. Other jurisdictions, such as Lake County, are mulling pulling out of the state program altogether rather than raise their prices.

The cards are theoretically used to reduce the chance a legal marijuana user is arrested. Officials believe a state-issued card is more likely to be accepted by law enforcement than a doctor's note. Medicinal marijuana users are required to have the cards but the county is required by state law to provide them.

San Mateo County only charges a minimum fee to cover its administrative costs, Thames said.

In 2006, San Mateo County issued 510 cards compared to the approximately 3,000 the state expected.

The county, like others in the state, began offering the cards after 56 percent of voters passed Proposition 215, or the Compassionate Use Act. The law protects users who have a recommendation from a licensed physician but does not give guidelines for the amount of marijuana they can have in their possession.

In anticipation of a large client base, the state used a $1 million loan for a ID database and computer system. With fewer users than the 15,000 expected, the administrative costs passed on to each user is running higher.

The statewide fee increase is opposed by the Drug Policy Alliance, Americans for Safe Access, the Marijuana Policy Project and Safe Access Now. The groups believe, according to the DPA Web site, that "medical marijuana patients are already faced with excessive health care costs, and this increase would put the ID card program out of reach for many."

The DPA argues if more than 24 of the state's 58 counties — particularly Los Angeles County — join the program, the increase in users will drop the per-card cost significantly.

Long-Term Marijuana Use May Impair Lung Function (HDN)

HealthDay News), February 22, 2007

(HealthDay News) - People who smoke marijuana for a long time face many of the same kinds of respiratory problems - such as phlegm, coughing and wheezing - as long-term cigarette smokers, say researchers at the Yale School of Medicine.

They reviewed previous studies from 1966 to 2005 that examined the association between marijuana and pulmonary function and respiratory complications. Some of the studies found a link between short-term marijuana use and relaxation and opening of the air passages.

However, other studies identified an association between long-term marijuana use and increased risk of respiratory symptoms, suggestive of obstructive lung disease. The data did not show an association between long-term marijuana smoking and airflow obstruction (emphysema), the Yale researchers said.

Their study is published in the current issue of the journal Archives of Internal Medicine.

There were several common kinds of limitations in the studies they reviewed, the Yale researchers noted. These included: inadequate control of the complicating effect of tobacco smoking; lack of standardized measures for the amount or duration of marijuana use; and lack of standardized measures of the outcomes that were evaluated.

"Despite these limitations, clinicians should advise their patients of the potential negative impact of marijuana smoking on overall lung health," study first author Dr. Jeanette M. Tetrault, ambulatory care fellow at Yale School of Medicine and the Department of Veterans Affairs Connecticut Healthcare System, said in a prepared statement.

Federal Agents Crack Down On Web Pharmacies (NBC)

NBC News, February 22, 2007

Buying prescription drugs over the Internet has become standard operating procedure for many Americans who used to visit the neighborhood pharmacy. And while many Internet pharmacies are 100-percent legitimate, hundreds of others are not and are seen by law enforcement as a a dangerous problem. Including 15 in Florida whose licenses have been suspended in recent weeks by federal authorities.

NBC's Mark Potter was on a raid of one of these alleged pill mills.

TAMPA, Fla. — At a drug store near Tampa, agents and investigators from the Drug Enforcement Agency swoop in to suspend the license of an Internet pharmacy for allegedly selling painkillers over the Web illegally. In this case, boxes and boxes of Hydrocodone.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"This is probably destined for a customer who's ordered it online somewhere across the country," says DEA Investigator Chris Grush.

Authorities say thousands of Web sites and hundreds of illegal Internet pharmacies have sprung up nationwide, cutting corners on medical exams and charging six to 10 times the normal price for prescription drugs that are widely abused.

"They hide behind their profession to push these drugs out simply to make money," says DEA Special Agent in Charge Mark Trouville.

The big concern is that many online pharmacies use doctors to write prescriptions for dangerous and addictive drugs for people they have never met. Federal agents say it's not uncommon for Internet buyers to simply fill out a brief medical questionnaire.

"We have a doctor, a situation where a doctor was sitting in front of a computer screen and writing hundreds and hundreds of prescriptions a day," says Trouville.

One man says he used illegal Internet pharmacies to fuel his addiction to Xanax and Valium.

"I used my wife's name, and I used my mother's name, and I put them all on my credit card," said the man who wished to remain anonymous.

Six years ago, 18-year-old Ryan Haight died from an overdose of drugs bought online. In 2004 his mother testified before the U.S. Senate in support of a proposed federal law tightening controls on Internet pharmacies.

That bill never passed.

"I'm very disappointed, very disappointed this bill has not passed," says Francine Haight, who founded the organization RyansCause.org. "Kids are still dying; kids are still getting drugs on the Internet."

A difficult balance between medical standards and modern technology, as authorities fear electronic drug trafficking.

Colombians Convicted On Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

A high-ranking female member of a left-wing Colombian terrorist organization has been convicted with two others in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on drug charges.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said Nayibe Rojas Valderama, also known as "Sonia," was convicted, along with co-defendants Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo, on charges of conspiring to import cocaine into the United States and conspiring to manufacture and distribute cocaine -- knowing it would be unlawfully imported into the United States.

The convictions were handed down Tuesday by a federal jury after four days of deliberation.

Mr. McNulty said the convictions represented "a significant victory" against the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC), which he described as one of the most dangerous narcoterrorist organizations in Colombia.

Valderama has been identified by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as the finance officer of the 14th Front of FARC and is the highest-ranking member of the group to be convicted in the United States. She was extradited from Colombia to the United States in March 2005 to stand trial on the U.S. charges.

Sentencing in the case is scheduled for May 7. The three each face a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison or a term of years as determined by the court.

"The FARC is a double evil -- they poison the blood of our people with their drugs and spill the blood of their own with guns and machetes bought with drug profits," U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration boss Karen P. Tandy said.

"As a financial officer for the guerrilla group, Sonia Valderama was directly responsible for converting drug money to blood money -- that is, overseeing the conversion of millions of dollars of cocaine profits from cash to weapons, uniforms and ammunition to arm the most violent terrorists in this hemisphere," Mrs. Tandy said.

Evidence presented at trial showed that Valderama oversaw all aspects of the purchasing and production of cocaine in the 14th Front territory, and collected all of the proceeds from the sale of cocaine for the 14th Front. The front is a group of about 250 militants that operates in the southern part of the country.

Prosecutors Ron McNeil, Stephen May and James Faulkner said Celis arranged for the purchase of large quantities of cocaine from Valderama and the 14th Front, and coordinated the shipment of cocaine from Colombia to Panama, and from Panama into the United States.

The prosecutors said Celis conspired with Valderama and Giraldo to purchase more than 11,000 pounds of cocaine for shipment to the United States.

They also said Giraldo introduced Celis to the 14th Front for the purpose of purchasing cocaine, worked with Valderama to purchase and transport cocaine, brought equipment for the 14th Front's cocaine-production operation, and assisted Valderama in all aspects of cocaine production and sale.

The FARC controls large portions of Colombia and finances its violent conflict with the Colombian government by engaging in drug trafficking, augmented by other means such as kidnapping and extortion.

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Rebel Leader Convicted On Drug Charges by U.S.

A federal jury in Washington yesterday convicted a Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of leftist guerrillas on drug conspiracy charges.

Nayibe Rojas is the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- FARC, in its Spanish initials -- whom a U.S. federal court has convicted of drug-running, although the U.S. and Colombian governments long have alleged that FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

Prosecutors cast Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a gun-toting senior FARC official who gathered coca base from farmers and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

The jury also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo were not members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired on the drug deal. The three face prison terms of up to 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Illegals Bill Near Complete (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Senators and lobbyists are putting the final touches on a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes an easier citizenship path for illegal aliens and weaker enforcement provisions than were in the highly criticized legislation that the Senate approved last year.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who ardently supports citizenship rights for illegals, will introduce the bill as early as next week, according to Senate sources knowledgeable about the negotiations. If the Senate Judiciary Committee can make quick work of the bill, it could be ready for floor action in April.

Mr. Kennedy drafted this year's bill with help from Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and outside lobbyists. Mr. McCain and the outside groups share Mr. Kennedy's support for increased immigration and leniency for illegals already in the country.

Among the most active participants have been the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition (EWIC) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Both groups support giving current illegals a path to citizenship and increasing the flow of foreign workers into the country.

"It's good for the country," EWIC immigration lawyer Laura Reiff said of Mr. Kennedy's bill.

In particular, EWIC and the chamber have taken a leading role in drafting the section of the bill dealing with work-site enforcement, Senate staffers say. Lobbyists in both organizations have shuttled around Capitol Hill drafts of those provisions, which are supposed to impose sanctions on businesses that hire illegal aliens, according to internal e-mails obtained by The Washington Times.

"That's putting the fox in charge of the henhouse," one Senate lawyer said about the pro-business chamber's involvement in drafting the punishment of employers.

One of those e-mails obtained by The Times invited Democratic immigration staffers to a briefing in early January with "key stakeholders" to discuss workplace-enforcement provisions. The invitation listed six such "stakeholders," including the chamber and EWIC. The other groups attending the meeting, according to the e-mail, were the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Immigration Law Center, the National Council of La Raza and the Service Employees International Union.

Not included in that meeting or any of the early meetings, according to several Senate aides, were key Republican senators or their staff who crossed the aisle last year to support "comprehensive" immigration reform that most Republicans considered a form of amnesty.

"We have been held out of any discussions," said Sen. Sam Brownback, one of those who supported last year's major immigration bill. "Our staffs have asked to be involved, but they were kept out."

Even Sen. Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who as chairman of the Judiciary Committee last year ushered the immigration bill through the Senate, has been left out of the process of drafting the bill.

Mr. Specter said yesterday that he and Mr. Kennedy have discussed the need to get a bill done this year but not any details. Mr. Specter has twice complained to Mr. Kennedy, most recently at a meeting last week, that the Republican senator's staff had been left out of negotiations.

"I raised the issue again, and a Kennedy staffer said there was nothing in writing" as legislation, he said. "Neither my staff nor I have seen any draft."

DOJ_NMG_0135293

Last week, aides and Republicans said, Mr. Specter, Mr. Brownback and others were invited to a meeting where they got their first briefing on the nearly completed bill. Other Republicans invited included Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Mel Martinez of Florida.

Laura Capps, a spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy, said he has been working with "many senators and members of Congress to draft the new bill."

"The bipartisan coalition behind the bill remains strong and intact."

The one Republican who all agree has been part of the negotiations from the start is Mr. McCain, who is running for his party's presidential nomination. This worries Republicans who say that Mr. McCain is the last Republican they want representing their interests in negotiations with Mr. Kennedy over immigration legislation.

Mr. McCain and Mr. Kennedy have long embraced the same goal of giving illegal aliens a direct path to U.S. citizenship despite having broken laws to get here in the first place. Both men also denounce the view held by most Republicans that the federal government should first secure the border with Mexico and begin enforcing current laws before addressing other immigration issues such as what to do with the more than 10 million to 12 million aliens already here.

Who has been in and out of negotiations this year signals to Republicans that Mr. Kennedy will introduce a bill that more resembles the original McCain-Kennedy bill than the compromise that was ultimately approved last year.

As much as conservatives dislike last year's compromise bill, they consider it some improvement over the original bill because it lowered the number of new foreign workers permitted into the country each year and slightly narrowed the pool of illegals who would be granted "amnesty."

"If it's back to the old version without the changes we made last year, I don't think I could support that," Mr. Brownback said.

Ms. Capps said she expects Mr. Kennedy to introduce his bill "in the next few weeks."

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is "committed to getting something done this year," his spokesman said.

Along US-Mexico Border, Not Enough Hands For The Harvest (CSM)

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

The nature of farming is that it comes with many unknowns: weather, pests, competition from abroad, effectiveness of new machinery. Rick Rademacher isn't clear why the labor pool needs to be another one – especially since so many day laborers from Mexico would be eager to work in his lettuce fields here in the midst of America's "winter salad bowl."

Lifting a calloused hand to shade his eyes from the sun's glare, Mr. Rademacher gazes over a 40-acre field where nearly 40 migrant workers pluck or wrap or pack the leafy green heads. With about six weeks to go in this season's harvest, the fourth-generation grower is crossing his fingers and hoping he'll have enough workers to bring the crops in.

"We struggle daily," he says. "We just hope every day that we can fill the orders."

Empty stations on the harvest lines are more common this year throughout this swath of Arizona farm country, says Rademacher, who serves as president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association. The reasons are many: a 40,000-person limit on the number of foreign guest workers allowed into the US, tighter borders that are discouraging illegal crossings, and rising demand for day laborers in other industries, such as higher-paying construction work.

The shortage of farm workers has been driving wages higher. Last season, base pay for day laborers working in this area was $6.50 an hour. Now it's $8.50. Rademacher says it may go higher because farmers here can't attract enough employees.

He'd like to see an expanded guest-worker program to ease the labor crunch here, just five miles from the border. It would ensure that he can get his crop in – and sell it to supermarkets at a price that is competitive with prices of vegetables from overseas.

Congress is considering such a move, but not in time to reduce this season's uncertainty.

Because this 41,000-acre patch of the Southwest produces 95 percent of the nation's home-grown winter lettuce and 90 percent of its winter vegetables, its labor issues have ramifications far beyond these leafy fields.

A key one is how much consumers must pay for fresh greens. A 10 percent increase in labor costs on the farm results in a 6 percent jump in the price of a head of lettuce, according to research by Albert Kagan, a professor at Arizona State University who works on the National Food and Agricultural Policy Project (NFAPP), which is based at the school. He has run economic models for other labor-intensive produce as well, such as strawberries and table grapes, with similar results.

The NFAPP has also examined how farm labor costs at home affect the market for farm imports. If it costs 10 percent more to produce a US-grown head of lettuce, for example, lettuce imports are likely to increase by 3 percent, according to Dr. Kagan's research.

The math puts farmers like Rademacher in a bind.

DOJ_NMG_0135294

"We have to offer more to get the workers, but we try to keep our costs in line, too," he says. "If we set the price [of vegetables] too high, one of our competitors will get the business, or the [super]markets will get the vegetables from out of the country."

Not all of Rademacher's harvest machines are fully staffed, despite the higher pay. Octavio Felix, a foreman overseeing the crews on two machines, sees one solution.

"Lots of people [in Mexico] would come to work if they could get permits," says the US citizen, who returns each weekend to San Luis Río Colorado, the town across the Mexico border where his grandparents still live.

The work here is labor-intensive, though the harvest machines, at about $250,000 a pop, have eliminated most of the heavy lifting. Both of the machines Mr. Felix supervises are fully staffed with 38 migrant workers. Two others at the far end of the field have only half that number.

Down the road, at gigantic broccoli and celery patches, two more harvest machines are running with crews that are half-staffed.

There are 11,130 documented migrant workers in Arizona and about 84,270 in California, according to figures from the Pew Hispanic Center. But there are also 9,870 undocumented farm workers in Arizona and 74,730 in California.

Identical bills known as AgJOBS, now wending their ways through committees in the Senate and House of Representatives, may eventually alleviate some farm-labor problems. The legislation would confer "blue-card status" on any foreign worker who meets four requirements: 1) performed agricultural work in the US for at least 863 hours, or 150 workdays, during the 24-month period ending Dec. 31, 2006; 2) applied for blue-card status during the 18-month application period (which would begin seven months from the day the law is enacted); 3) is otherwise admissible to the US; and 4) has not been convicted of any felony or a misdemeanor that involved bodily injury, threat of serious bodily injury, or harm to property in excess of $500.

These bills aren't a panacea for America's illegal immigration problem, but they represent a step in the right direction, growers say.

"Agriculture has ... made its case for sensible immigration reform which would result in a legal, stable workforce for the industry," said Tom Nassif, president and CEO of the Western Growers Association in a Jan. 10 statement. "We now have an opportunity to proceed with reform which will be beneficial for farmers, workers, enforcement officials, and the entire nation," he said of the AgJOBS legislation.

"This country has got to get a successful immigration policy," Rademacher says. "We have work for people in Mexico who want work."

2 Groups Compare Immigrant Detention Centers To Prisons (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — Two advocacy groups for refugees said on Wednesday that the Bush administration routinely detained immigrant families in prisonlike housing that separated young children from their parents and sometimes provided inadequate medical care, food and educational opportunities, despite calls from Congress to house such families in “nonpenal, homelike environments.”

The Department of Homeland Security, which allowed the advocacy groups to visit the two detention centers that house immigrant families, has already corrected several problems identified by the groups. The two groups, the Women’s Commission for Refugee Women and Children and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Services, are expected to release their report on Thursday.

But department officials, who said they were still reviewing the report, vigorously defended the quality of services provided by the 512-bed T. Don Hutto Residential Center, which opened last year in Texas, and the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, which houses about 80 families in Pennsylvania. The centers hold immigrants and asylum seekers awaiting the outcomes of their cases.

“They adhere to the highest standards,” said Marc Raimondi, a department spokesman.

The complaints come one month after a federal inspection of 5 of the nation’s 325 immigrant detention centers found that most did not provide timely and responsive health care and sometimes failed to comply with the government’s standards of disciplining, classifying and housing detainees. Officials of the Homeland Security Department say the study was too small to be representative.

The new report found that women at the Hutto center received inadequate prenatal care and that children received only one hour of schooling a day. At both centers, children as young as 6 were separated from their parents, and separation of families and the threats of separation were used as disciplinary tools.

DOJ_NMG_0135295

The study praised the Berks center for providing adequate educational opportunities and allowing families to participate in field trips and outdoor recreation time. But it says both centers are modeled on prisons, even though they hold people who are fleeing persecution or stand accused of violating civil immigration laws, not criminal codes.

"The prisonlike conditions, this form of detention, is not necessary," said Michelle Brané, who heads the detention and asylum program at the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children.

"We release criminals," said Ms. Brané, pointing to parole and monitored supervision programs. "Yet for immigrants in civil proceedings, they have not explored those options. And these are families with children."

Mr. Raimondi said the family detention system was expanded to help end the routine practice of releasing immigrant families caught sneaking across the border. Smugglers began taking advantage of the loophole and pairing children with unrelated adults in hopes of ensuring their release, officials say. Some children were abandoned or abused. Mr. Raimondi said the centers provided a safe place for families and "serve as a deterrent to alien smugglers who needlessly endanger children's lives."

Ms. Brané said officials of the Homeland Security Department had addressed some of her concerns.

The Hutto center contracted with a local clinic to provide medical care to pregnant women. It also expanded the educational program to four hours a day from one.

Detention Facility For Immigrants Criticized (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

TAYLOR, Tex. -- The day Mustafa Elmi turned 3 years old he had to report to his cell three times for headcount. To be able to get one hour of recreation inside a concrete compound sealed off by metal gates and razor wire he had to pin his picture ID to his uniform.

Such routines characterized Mustafa's life, as well as that of his mother, Bahjo Hosen, 26, during their first seven months in the United States, the country to which they fled to escape political persecution in their native Somalia. They ended up in the T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, one of the nation's newest detention centers for illegal immigrants that the Department of Homeland Security touts as an "effective and humane alternative" to keep immigrant families together while they await the outcome of immigration court hearings or deportation.

Before the facility opened, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) routinely separated parents from their children upon apprehension by the Border Patrol. Infants and toddlers were placed in federally funded foster homes; adolescents and teenagers were placed in facilities for minors run by the Department of Health and Human Services; and parents were placed in adult detention centers.

Despite the change in policy, two national organizations decry the conditions at Hutto and have termed the facility "a penal detention model that is fundamentally anti-family and anti-American."

The center, which the DHS opened last May, is an unacceptable method "for addressing the reality of the presence of families in our immigration system," says a report written by the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, in New York, and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service, in Baltimore, and scheduled for release Thursday.

"As a country that supports family values, we should not be treating immigrant families who have not committed a crime like criminals, particularly children," said Ralston H. Deffenbaugh Jr., president of Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service.

During a tour of Hutto this month, Gary Mead, the assistant director of ICE detention and removal operations, said the facility, which is operated under contract by the Corrections Corporation of America, averaged 380 to 420 detainees daily. That day, Hutto housed 180 children and 150 adults -- four-fifths of them mothers -- from 29 countries. Seventy-five families were being detained while they awaited the outcome of their political-asylum petitions.

The 512-bed facility is part of the Department of Homeland Security's year-long push to build detention centers or contract them out to private companies to accommodate illegal immigrants apprehended along the Mexican border. A record 26,500 such immigrants are in detention daily -- up from 19,718 a day in 2005.

Hutto, located in central Texas, is used for immigrants from countries other than Mexico who are awaiting "expedited removal from the United States." That process ended the policy known as "catch and release," in which such people were given a notice to appear later before an immigration judge. Mexican nationals caught in the United States illegally are routinely sent back almost immediately.

For some years, ICE has contracted with Berks County, Pa., to run an 80-bed detention facility for families, and the report by the women's commission and Lutheran service touched on that center but focused on the much larger Hutto.

DOJ_NMG_0135296

The report lauded the goal of keeping families together but urged DHS to close the Hutto facility, saying that "prison-like institutions" are not appropriate for families. "Family detention is not one that has any precedent in the United States, therefore no appropriate licensing requirements exist," the report said.

In response, ICE spokesman Marc Raimondi said that the Hutto and Berks facilities "maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare" of the detainees. He said that ICE detention standards exceed those set by the American Correctional Association, and that the agency's practice of conducting annual reviews and weekly visits to detention facilities "significantly exceeds industry standards."

The report recommended that ICE parole asylum-seekers while they await the outcome of their hearings. It also said that immigrant families not eligible for parole should be released to special shelters or other homelike settings run by nonprofit groups and be required to participate in electronic monitoring or an intensive supervision program that would use a combination of electronic ankle bracelets, home visits and telephone reporting.

The 72-page report also criticized the educational services for children; the food service and rushed feeding times for children; the health care, especially for vulnerable children and pregnant women; the therapeutic mental health care as insufficient or culturally inappropriate; and the recreation time as inadequate for children. The review said that families were being held for months in Hutto and for years in the case of the longer-established Berks facility.

The report also cited inappropriate disciplinary practices used against adults and children, including threats of separation, verbal abuse and withholding recreation or using temperature control, particularly extremely cold conditions, as punishment.

Hosen, who traveled with Mustafa on an inner tube across the Rio Grande from Mexico and insisted that a stranger in Texas call the Border Patrol so she could surrender to authorities, lived in Hutto from June 30 to Jan. 30.

Granted political asylum and now living temporarily in a home for immigrant women and children in Austin, Hosen said that she and other parents in Hutto were threatened regularly with separation from their children for minor infractions such as youngsters running inside the prison. She lost 30 pounds while detained, and her son lost weight and suffered from diarrhea. Concerned about her son's health, Hosen asked for a multivitamin for him but was denied the request, she said.

She recalled that the day she and Mustafa arrived at Hutto and she saw the word "residential" written on the facility's sign, she was relieved after having spent almost two weeks in a detention center for adults in south Texas while her son was held in foster care. Hosen said that although she was reunited with him, little else changed. "It was just like the place I was -- detention -- nothing different," she said.

Report Criticizes Conditions At Immigrant Detention Centers (MCT)

By Chris Mondics

McClatchy Newspapers, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON - The nation's two family detention centers for illegal immigrants - one in Texas and the other in Berks County, Pa. - are plagued by problems including inadequate medical care, lack of privacy, and abusive behavior by staff toward detainees, two advocacy groups alleged in a report being released Thursday.

Of the two centers, the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility in Leesport has the more humane conditions, but even there detainees reported harassment by staff including the threat of separating parents from their children, the report said.

"Every woman we talked to in the facilities cried," said Michelle Brane, one of the authors of the report, prepared by the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service and the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children. "Many of the children were clearly sad and depressed. Some feared separation from their parents, a common threat used to ensure that children behaved according to facility rules."

Both facilities are inappropriate for children and families because they too closely resemble jails, the authors said. The detainees are largely Latinos, apprehended at the U.S.-Mexico border or in the United States, but the facilities also house immigrants from China, Greece, Ethiopia and other nations.

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, a division of the Homeland Security Department, said Wednesday that the facilities were run humanely with a high standard of care for the detainees. He said allegations that staff had threatened to separate parents from their children were unsubstantiated.

The "detention facilities maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare of the detained alien population," Raimondi said in an interview.

The report recommends a series of changes including moving families to more homelike facilities, while seeking opportunities to parole others. It comes as the government has intensified its focus on halting illegal immigration, amid growing complaints among voters and members of Congress.

Beefed-up patrols along the Southern border and highly publicized raids by immigration officials on factories believed to hire large number of undocumented workers seem to have functioned as a powerful disincentive to illegal immigration.

Immigration authorities say the number of border arrests has dropped off substantially in recent months, likely as a result of stepped-up enforcement.

The Berks facility, a former nursing home that houses about 20 immigrant families, was opened in 2001. The government opened the much larger T. Don Hutto Residential Center near Austin, Texas, last year following growing complaints from Congress that illegal immigrants apprehended by authorities were being separated from their children, or simply being released because there was no place to house them.

The Hutto center was more harshly criticized in the report, which said children there typically get only one hour of schooling a day. Apart from sleep, an hour of recreation and 20 minutes per mealtime, families are confined to communal areas for the bulk of the day.

Because of space constraints, children at Hutto are sometimes confined to different cells from their parents, the report said. While the doors are not locked, it said, infrared sensors trigger alarms if the doors are opened slightly, prompting a response from staff.

At the Berks facility, children under 6 typically are housed with their parents, the report said. Older children are housed in same-sex juvenile rooms with children from other families.

The report said some parents reported that their children, assigned to separate rooms, cry at night, but that they are not permitted to visit them.

At the Hutto facility, one woman reported she had not received a prenatal medical exam until seven months into her pregnancy. Other detainees reported delays in receiving medical care, the report said.

It said the care of pregnant women had improved at Hutto since researchers who prepared the report had visited the facility. But the report criticized Hutto for continuing to transport pregnant women to the hospital in handcuffs.

Staff at both facilities threatened to separate children from their parents as a means of control, the report said.

"All families interviewed express a general sense that they were disrespected by staff members, frequently yelled at and issued unnecessarily harsh punishments for behavior as simple as not being able to do homework for lack of a pencil," it said. "Several families told us that facility staff would threaten them with separation if they misbehaved, and on several occasions it seems that children were sent to the secure juvenile detention facility without an opportunity to defend themselves in court."

High Profile Raids Leave Immigrants Across U.S. Living In Fear (AP)

By Juliana Barbassa, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - RICHMOND, California-Fear has gripped immigrant families across the United States as federal agents raid neighborhoods, work sites and jails in a nationwide crackdown on illegal immigration.

Tens of thousands of people have been rounded up over the past several months, and many more are afraid to leave home, answer a knock on the door or leave their children alone in fear they might be next. Churches and community groups are stepping in with legal advice and financial aid for families split up or left without an income because of the sweeps.

"My kids are asking me, 'Why is this happening, mommy? Why did they take uncle away?'" said Dinora Sanchez, whose uncle was taken by immigration officials in January while riding his bike to a construction job in this low-income city northeast of San Francisco. "I'm afraid. There are no explanations I can give them."

From California to Connecticut, federal officials have launched a full-scale offensive to find and deport illegal immigrants. It's part of a two-pronged approach, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement: secure the nation's borders while stepping up enforcement within.

"We're attacking these issues on multiple fronts," she said. "It's definitely a priority now."

Documented immigrants like Sanchez, a native of Mexico, have nothing to fear, said Kice. But her uncle, who had been in the U.S. illegally for 10 years and did not have work authorization, was an obvious target.

"People who are in this country complying with our immigration laws have no reason to be concerned," Kice said.

Groups supporting a reduction in immigration have praised the shift toward more aggressive enforcement. "Enforcement actions like these play an enormous role in deterrence," said Steven Camarota, of the conservative think tank Center for Immigration Studies.

But many immigrants and their advocates say it's splitting families and hurting the legal relatives of immigrants who crossed the border illegally, as well as their co-workers, employers and the businesses that serve them.

"We have to stop this reign of terror," said Mark Silverman, director of immigration policy at San Francisco's Immigrant Legal Resource Center.

Since launching "Operation Return to Sender" last May, Immigration and Customs has rounded up nearly 14,000 immigrants who entered the country illegally or were ignoring a judge's deportation order.

DOJ_NMG_0135298

"They make a mockery of the system," Kice said, "and send the wrong message to those who follow the orders."

Some 4,400 others were rounded up in large-scale job site investigations, including immigrants working without proper authorization and those who hired them. More than 700 of those face criminal charges, including hiring illegal immigrants.

Searches of state and local jails over the past seven months identified another 5,500 immigrants who committed crimes, ensuring they'd go into custody of Immigration and Customs when they finished their sentences.

In one of the biggest sweeps so far, Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six states were raided in December, resulting in the arrests of 1,282 immigrant workers. One of those plants was in Marshalltown, Iowa, where Mexican immigrant Juan Padilla runs a western clothing store. He says he went from selling $5,000 (euro3,810) a month worth of cowboy boots, hats and slim-cut jeans last year, to just $600 (euro460) in January.

His wife, who wasn't authorized to work, lost her job at the meatpacking plant and is awaiting a court hearing. Padilla is wondering how they'll be able to support their five American-born children.

"I want my children to go to school, to have better opportunities, so they don't end up cutting meat 14 hours a day," he said. "But what can we do? Where do we go from here? I just don't know."

The enforcement action hit the growing immigrant community in the town of about 26,000 hard. More than 30 children were pulled from the school system, presumably by families who decided to leave the area.

Parents were "frightened that the immigration officials were going to come to school and take their children," said Thomas Renze, principal of Woodbury Elementary in Marshalltown.

Sister Christine Feagan, director of Hispanic ministry at St. Mary Catholic Church, agreed that the raids have been particularly hard on children, whether they're legal or not.

"You can't explain the difference to a second or third grader," she said.

As enforcement actions unfurl across the country, churches and other community organizations have been a key source of support and aid to families.

The Colorado faith-based group Congregations Building Community made sure the children of parents detained during raids didn't go home to empty houses after school, and is helping families who lost jobs pay bills through the winter.

Contra Costa Interfaith Supporting Community Organization, a coalition of 25 congregations in Northern California, protested the enforcement actions and rallied local officials to support immigrants.

Dozens of other organizations are taking donations, giving legal advice, and holding community meetings in response to the large-scale effort by federal officials to detain and deport undocumented immigrants.

"Our folks are really afraid," said the Rev. Carolyn Krantz of St. Peter Martyr Church.

The raids have targeted immigrants who have committed crimes or are evading deportation orders. But if in the course of tracking them down agents come across others they suspect of being here illegally, they will question, detain and deport them if warranted, Kice said.

"It's not uncommon for us to go to a location and discover that the target moved out weeks before," she said. "But we can find other individuals there who are immigration violators."

That's what happened to two of Maria Ramos' children, who were taken from their beds in San Pablo at dawn in January. The agents had come looking for an in-law, but instead they took Ramos' 17-year-old daughter, Elvira Mendoza, and 22-year-old son Victor Mendoza.

Elvira was released into the custody of an older brother who is here legally, but Victor Mendoza was deported back to Mexico, Ramos said.

"My heart is heavy," said Ramos, 64. "My children are what I have in life. I agree with looking for criminals, but there's no need to cause us so much pain."

While groups advocating a reduction in immigration are praising the stepped-up enforcement of existing laws, people on both sides of the debate questioned whether the crackdown would have any real effect.

Those detained add up to a tiny fraction of the millions of undocumented immigrants in the United States, and for every one deported another is there to take over their vacant apartments and jobs, they said.

"It's not like this ended immigration in Greeley," said Ron Marks, director of Congregations Building Community in Greeley, Colorado. "It just changed the individuals." 2007-02-21T03:35:18Z

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Pushes Plan To Shift Costs Of Health Coverage (USAT)

USA Today, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135299

President Bush flew to Chattanooga, Tenn., on Wednesday to promote his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions and responsibility to individuals.

"The best decisions are made by providers and patients, not by governments or insurance companies," Bush said at the Chattanooga Convention Center.

Under the president's proposal, health insurance benefits would be taxable income, but people would get a standard tax deduction for health insurance: up to $15,000 for family coverage, $7,500 for individual coverage.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee that oversees health matters, says the plan does little to help the poorest of the uninsured and undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage. "His proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on," the Massachusetts Democrat said.

White House officials see health care as one of a few areas in which they might advance their agenda with Democrats who now control Congress. The effort got a boost last week when a bipartisan group of 10 senators told Bush they want to work with him to expand health coverage.

In Chattanooga, Bush Touts Plan To Help Uninsured Get Health Coverage (AP)

By Ben Feller, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA — President Bush today pushed his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions — and responsibility — to individuals.

Bush's proposal is one of the few major initiatives from his scaled-back State of the Union address last month. It assumes market forces and changes in the tax code will expand affordable choices.

"The best decisions are made by providers and patients, not by governments and insurance companies," Bush said during comments at the Chattanooga Convention Center.

"If you want a health care system that really works, you want the decision-maker to be the individual, in consultation with somebody who knows what they're talking about — somebody trained to help that person make the proper decision," Bush said. "That'd be your doctor."

The main ingredient of Bush's proposal would be a change in the tax code that, for the first time, would treat health insurance costs as taxable income — meaning that workers' taxable wages will increase.

In turn, Bush wants a standard tax deduction for those who buy health insurance — $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for individual coverage. Those who chose insurance policies below the size of the new deduction would end up with a decrease in their tax bills.

Key Democratic leaders have denounced Bush's plan. They say it does little to help the poorest of the uninsured and undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage.

"While the president's focus on health care is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on," said Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, chairman of the Senate panel that oversees health matters.

Still, White House officials see health care as one of a few areas in which they might advance their agenda with Democrats who now control Congress. They got a boost last week when a bipartisan group of 10 senators told Bush they want to work with him to expand health coverage.

Bush received a hearty ovation as he described his plan in Chattanooga. He shared a stage with people who hold full-time jobs but can't afford health insurance for their families.

One of them was Danny Jennings, a father of two and manager of a nursery. Bush said the change in tax code would save Jennings more than $4,000 a year on his tax bill.

"There's more money in his pocket as a result of the standard tax deduction, and there's more peace of mind knowing that his kids — and he and his wife — are covered," Bush said.

People will also start paying attention to how much health procedures really cost, which is bound to help, Bush said. The president compared it to knowing how much a car costs.

And then he realized he doesn't know that.

"I used to," said a laughing Bush, who travels by limousine. "I will soon."

DOJ_NMG_0135300

Earlier, Bush toured the nonprofit Erlanger Hospital, which is allied with the University of Tennessee's College of Medicine. Erlanger serves patients from 50 counties in a 150-mile radius.

Dr. Donald Chamberlain explained to Bush how he used a robot-assisted device to minimize blood loss during a recent cancer surgery. As Bush watched a video of the invasive procedure, the doctor asked him: "Blood OK? You OK with blood?"

"Heck yeah, I'm OK with blood," Bush said, with an eye on the cameras on him. "How about you, doc?"

The White House characterizes its approach as basic fairness, in that every person will get the same tax deduction whether they get health coverage through their job or on their own.

Bush also wants to redirect federal dollars that hospitals and other institutions get to help cover costs for caring for the uninsured. With this money, states would set up programs to assist people in getting health coverage and help people with high-cost health conditions.

On the way out of town, Bush popped into Porker's Bar-B-Que restaurant, where he posed for photos, shook hands and sat down in a booth to chat with local residents.

Chattanooga Visit Goes Off Smoothly (CHA)

The Chattanoogan, February 22, 2007

President George W. Bush wound up a Chattanooga visit early Wednesday afternoon with an hour-long informal health care forum at the Convention Center.

Some 500 Chattanoogans, including many of the city's leaders, were in attendance as the President moderated the event aimed at promoting his new policies aimed at making health care more affordable.

He was on the podium with selected citizens and business owners - all of whom said they either could not afford health care coverage or had inadequate coverage.

President Bush praised Gov. Phil Bredesen, who was also on stage and explained his CoverTennessee program.

The President introduced Lt. Gov. Ron Ramsey, Sens. Bob Corker and Lamar Alexander, Rep. Zach Wamp, Mayor Ron Littlefield and County Mayor Claude Ramsey, though they did not speak at the Convention Center event.

The President arrived in Air Force One at Lovell Field just after 11 a.m.

He briefly shook hands with a small group of mostly GOP faithful who were awaiting him.

He also presented a volunteer service award to Debbie Chadwick, 43-year-old Chattanooga woman with Downs Syndrome who is a longtime nursing home volunteer.

Then he was whisked into a presidential limousine. His motorcade, which had formed hours earlier, then proceeded to Erlanger Medical Center on East Third Street.

He was led on a tour of the hospital by Erlanger CEO Jim Brexler, including demonstration of some high-tech equipment at the hospital.

The motorcade arrived at the Convention Center around 12:30 p.m.

A small group of protestors was along Carter Street across from the Convention Center, but they were outnumbered by those sporting signs in support of the President.

Security was tight for the visit and a wide swath of local freeways were shut down while the motorcade was in transit.

State troopers and Chattanooga Police were stationed at each freeway underpass along the route.

The events were not open to the public and the Erlanger visit was open only to a local press "pool" that included the Times Free Press (newspaper), WRCB Channel 3 (TV) and WGOW Talk Radio (radio).

WGOW Radio provided extensive coverage, and the three local TV stations had live coverage while the President was at the Convention Center.

President Bush called Erlanger "a pretty fantastic hospital." He said, "I thank Erlanger for being on the leading edge of compassion."

He told of trying out a robotic surgery machine and joked, "There wasn't anybody on the other end of the machine, you'll be thankful to know."

He said his mission was "affordable health care," saying that currently "it's not affordable and it's not accessible to too many people and that's not acceptable."

He introduced Health and Human Services Administrator Mike Leavitt, former Utah governor, who came with him on Air Force One and was on the podium at the Convention Center.

President Bush called Lamar Alexander "a good, thoughtful guy" and introduced former Chattanooga mayor Corker as "a fellow you know pretty well who used to be in the business of paving your roads and filling your potholes."

Speaking of Rep. Wamp, he said, "All he talks about is Chattown. I'm glad I finally listened to him. I am really thrilled to be in this beautiful part of the country."

DOJ_NMG_0135301

President Bush said private medicine works best, but he said a number of steps need to be taken to boost it, including giving tax breaks to allow individuals to afford private health care.

Erlanger physician Dr. Joe Cofer described the local Project Access program, which he said has provided more than $13.9 million in free medical care to over 1,600 patients.

He said the local program, led by Rae Bond, has help found similar programs in Knoxville and elsewhere.

President Bush said afterwards, "Thank you for recognizing that the federal government and state government can't do it all."

Sitting near the President was Danny Jennings, who said he has two children and operates a nursery at McMinnville, but cannot afford health insurance. The President said the new deduction would allow him to save about $4,500 in taxes and allow him to buy health insurance for about $47 per month.

The President urged those present to contact members of Congress in support of his tax deduction proposal. Of Congressman Wamp, he said, "You don't need to write Zach. He's already on board."

He also boosted the idea of bringing "transparency" in health care pricing, saying that will spur competition and help reduce costs. And he spoke in favor of health savings accounts that would be tax free. Another idea was having small businesses joining together to "pool their risks."

And he said, "I strongly believe we've got to do something about lawsuits." He said some counties no longer have OB/GYNs because of malpractice suits.

A single mother who is an office manager in McMinnville said she has a pre-existing condition and health care costs for her are "just outrageous."

Amy Childress, an interior designer from Nashville, said she had to drop her health plan when the cost rose to $210 a month. She said she now pays $100 per month, but the deductible is $5,000.

She told the President she is 35, and he responded, "You don't look a day over 34." Ms. Childress replied, "Most people tell me 22, but that's OK."

The President, looking abashed, noted that he is not going to be running again. He also joked, "Who invited Amy?"

Will Smith of Chattanooga said he has nine fulltime employees in his development firm, but he cannot afford health insurance for them.

There was one unscheduled stop near the end of the presidential visit. The Bush entourage stopped for some barbeque at Porker's on South Market Street.

Rep. Wamp, Mr. Brexler and several Erlanger doctors were among those feasting with the President.

Afterwards, Bush said he recommended the local barbeque.

In Tennessee, Bush Talks Up Tax Breaks For The Uninsured (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Feb. 21 -- The last time President Bush visited this state, last September, it was to campaign with GOP Senate hopeful Bob Corker against the Democrats. Wednesday afternoon, Sen. Corker was in the audience and the state's Democratic governor was on the stage at the convention center here for a folksy discussion on how to improve the health-care system.

Bush hailed the governor, Phil Bredesen, for his "innovative policies," as he talked up his new plan to increase coverage of the uninsured by tinkering with the tax code and giving states more flexibility to design low-cost benefit plans for those who lack coverage. Bredesen said it was the first time he had been invited to appear with Bush in such a setting.

Democrats in Washington are showing little enthusiasm for the Bush health agenda, but the president is plugging away, insisting he sees hope for compromise before his term ends in less than two years. Indeed, the end seemed on his mind as he bantered with several hundred audience members, arguing for greater transparency in health-care pricing.

"I don't know about you, but I don't remember ever asking how much something was going to cost when it came to health care. I do when it comes to a car -- or I used to," Bush said, quickly remembering that he is driven around in a limousine. "I will soon!" he added to laughter.

While the focus of his administration is the war in Iraq, Bush is pushing an ambitious health-care agenda, the key element of which is a tax plan to make it easier for individuals to purchase health insurance coverage in the private market. He is also proposing to restrain the growth of Medicare and Medicaid by cutting payments to health-care providers and charging higher premiums to wealthier individuals, a plan Democrats have described as dead on arrival.

Under his tax plan, every family would get a standard deduction of $15,000 and individuals would get a deduction of $7,500 if they buy health coverage, whether they obtain it through their employer or individually. Bush says this would help rectify a situation in which people who work for companies that do not offer health coverage do not get any tax break for buying insurance, as workers essentially get through employer-sponsored health plans. He argued that his plan would make insurance more affordable for middle-income workers.

"Right now there's a limited market for the individual; it makes it hard to find a product that either suits your needs or you can afford," Bush told his Chattanooga audience. Bush was joined on stage by several uninsured workers and businesses managers who he claimed would find insurance cheaper under his plan.

Many health economists say they think Bush is overstating the impact of the tax code changes, but they say he might have a bigger bang if he were to give low-income people tax credits to buy insurance, an idea the White House considered and rejected. A study released this week by the Community Research Council of Chattanooga concluded that very few of the uninsured in Hamilton County, which includes Chattanooga and its suburbs, make enough money to benefit under the current Bush plan.

In an interview, Bredesen said he is glad that Bush is starting to tackle health care more seriously but voiced doubts about the tax elements. "I get less excited about the tax deduction stuff because there are a lot of people . . . for whom that's not going to make a difference," he said.

Even as the president arrived in Tennessee, the local news was full of reports that a change in federal reimbursement policy could cost the state as much as $250 million annually for charity care, countering any relief under the president's new plan. "It certainly would be a sore blow to us," Bredesen said.

The president's plan has also elicited mixed reaction on Capitol Hill. In the House, the idea has been declared a non-starter, and House leaders are moving in another direction, hoping to expand funding for the federal-state children's health program much more ambitiously than the president contemplates. The president's plan is for "every individual on their own," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "He does nothing to control costs and he does nothing to expand the number of insured. Other than that, it is incredibly helpful."

Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), chairman of the Finance Committee, sounded more positive, describing the president's tax plan as "an outside-the-box proposal" that deserves to be part of the debate. "Whether or not it's enacted into law, he's started a discussion," he said.

Bush, In Talk-Show Manner, Promotes His Health Plan (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Feb. 21 — President Bush's plan to expand health coverage by revamping the tax code has been pronounced dead by leading Democrats on Capitol Hill. But Mr. Bush, ever the optimist, forged ahead Wednesday, conducting a chat session here in Oprah Winfrey style with people who are uninsured.

Mr. Bush held forth for nearly an hour, cracking jokes about everything from the age of one of the participants — "You don't look a day over 34," he said after learning that she was 35 — to "the hair follicle benefit," a wry reference to what he views as luxury health plans. The participants had been carefully selected, the tone was confessional, and the president, describing himself as the "educator in chief," sounded more like talk-show host in chief.

Marty Ginn, an office manager from nearby McMinnville, told Mr. Bush, "I have a pre-existing condition, I have trouble with my left knee, and the quotes were just outrageous and I'm just kind of stuck."

"That's patently unfair," the president replied after telling Ms. Ginn that under his plan, she would get a tax deduction of $7,500 to help defray the cost of coverage.

"I think it'll work for you, Danny, I really do," Mr. Bush told another participant, a nursery manager named Danny Jennings, after encouraging Mr. Jennings to make a sales pitch of his own, for some nice spring rhododendrons.

The round-table discussion, which followed a similar if less lively event with health insurance executives in Washington on Tuesday, was aimed at pitching the president's proposal to provide tax breaks for low- and moderate-income workers to buy insurance while imposing tax increases on some Americans covered by generous employer-sponsored plans. Single people would receive a $7,500 tax deduction, and families a deduction of $15,000, but anyone whose insurance cost more would pay taxes on the difference.

Despite Mr. Bush's cheery demeanor, the idea seems to be a nonstarter on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have set universal coverage as their goal and the two parties remain miles apart in their visions for helping the nation's 47 million uninsured.

Leading Democrats, including Senator Max Baucus of Montana, chairman of the Finance Committee, and Representative Pete Stark of California, chairman of a subcommittee overseeing health policy, said in interviews that Mr. Bush's plan was far too dependent on the private sector and that they did not envision anything like it becoming law.

DOJ_NMG_0135303

Mr. Stark called it “a farcical move” that was “primarily designed to encourage employers to drop group coverage.” Mr. Baucus said the plan was “too much focused on the individual market,” though he did give the president credit for “stirring up the debate” with his tax idea.

“It’s an out-of-the-box thought,” Mr. Baucus said.

Mr. Bush, undaunted, sees morsels of encouragement in a recent letter from a bipartisan group of five Democratic and five Republican senators who said they wanted to work with him on health care legislation. The Republicans, who included Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, the party whip, said they agreed in principle that universal coverage was the goal, maintaining that “the health care system cannot be fixed without providing solutions for everyone.”

The Democrats, led by Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, who had initially been critical of the tax plan, said economists had convinced them that the tax rules needed to be modernized and that “current rules disproportionately favor the most affluent.” Mr. Wyden said in an interview that the two sides had spent weeks parsing the language in the letter.

The White House, for its part, is signaling that Mr. Bush is flexible. A chief architect of the tax plan, Al Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council, said, “We realize that the ultimate legislation is not going to look exactly as the president proposed and that there’s going to be compromise on both sides.”

Whether that spells legislative possibilities for 2007 is hard to say. Democrats in Congress say they are most focused this year on reauthorizing Schip, a program that provides coverage to low-income children. As for tackling universal coverage, Mr. Stark said each of the two parties would most likely coalesce around whatever plan its 2008 presidential nominee embraces.

Some states, though, are moving ahead on their own. Tennessee, with the prodding of Gov. Phil Bredesen, who also participated in Wednesday’s round table, has committed $100 million to a new program, Cover Tennessee, intended to help employers provide basic insurance to workers willing to pay a modest amount, roughly $50 a month.

After returning to Nashville later Wednesday, Mr. Bredesen, a Democrat, said in a phone interview that he was skeptical of the president’s tax proposal and had been a bit leery of participating in the event here. He did so after assurances from Mr. Bush’s health and human services secretary, Michael O. Leavitt, that he would get a chance to make his own pitch, for Cover Tennessee.

“I didn’t particularly want to fly down there and be a set piece in a play for something I didn’t really believe in,” he said, “but he assured me that they really were there to highlight the kinds of things we were doing.”

Bush Pushes Health Care Plan In Tennessee (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. -- President Bush campaigned for his health care proposals today, praising Tennessee's effort to expand health care coverage to the uninsured — and taking a turn at the controls of a surgical robot at a Chattanooga hospital.

At an event described as a "round table" on his health care initiatives, Bush traded one-liners with a handful of workers and employers, who have had trouble getting health insurance.

One of them was an interior designer named Amy Childers, who dropped her health coverage when she turned 35 and the premium was raised to $210 a month.

"Doesn't it make sense to change the tax code so that Amy Childers can better afford health care?" the president asked. Then he joked, "You don't look a day over 34."

"Most people say 22," Childers responded, adding that she would forgive him.

The president has proposed making premiums paid for medical insurance deductible for all Americans, up to $15,000 for a family and $7,500 for individuals. Currently, employers can deduct health care premiums without limit, but individual taxpayers cannot.

The president and his staff argue that the current system unfairly penalizes consumers who must insure themselves, such as the self-employed or those working for small businesses.

They also say it creates an incentive for employers and employees to choose more expensive health care than they need, helping drive health care prices higher.

On Capitol Hill, the president's proposals have gotten a frosty reception. Democrats, who took control of both chambers of Congress last month, agree that health insurance should become more affordable for the self-employed.

But they say the biggest problem facing the system is the 40 million Americans with no health insurance, and they say the president's proposal would help only a small fraction of them become insured.

In particular, they point out that the deduction would not help taxpayers who do not itemize their income tax returns, especially poorer paid workers who are the most likely to lack health insurance. Instead, Democrats favor a tax credit for health care premiums, which would help all taxpayers regardless of their filing status.

"Health care in America is in crisis, and what is needed is effective action to ensure that every American has quality, affordable health care," Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate labor committee, said in a statement.

"While the president's focus on healthcare is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on, and replacing it with a tax break that will benefit the wealthiest Americans," he said.

Supporters Outnumber Protesters As Bush Arrives In Chattanooga (AP)

By Bill Poovey, The Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

CHATTANOOGA — Supporters and protesters turned out as President Bush arrived today for an event promoting his plans to reshape the nation's health care.

Bush was to tour Erlanger Medical Center, the region's biggest public hospital, and then stage a discussion about health care at the Chattanooga Convention Center, where hundreds of people waited for him outside.

Most carried welcome signs or waved flags on a sunny and unseasonably warm day with temperatures in the mid-60s.

Among them were several students from Chattanooga State Technical Community College, who attended in order to earn some credit for a government class, and Antonio Donate, 7, of Stockbridge, Ga., who hoped to get a glimpse of Bush.

"I don't know, I just like him," said the boy, whose father is an officer in the Army.

Dozens of protesters, several of them at odds with Bush over the Iraq war, also were outside the convention center.

Donna Cussack, 49, of Cleveland, Tenn., said she had never before protested at a presidential event.

"I'm hoping I can at least catch his eye for a moment," Cussack said as she held a sign that read, "Not in my name! No more."

The president was expected to promote administration health care proposals, including tax changes to allow deductions for health insurance and grants for states that develop programs to cover the uninsured.

Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, was expected to attend, along with Republican U.S. Sens. Bob Corker and Lamar Alexander, and U.S. Rep. Zach Wamp. Corker is a former mayor of Chattanooga.

Bush is the first sitting president to visit Chattanooga since his father in September 1992.

Protesters, Supporters Demonstrate Near Convention Center During President's Visit (CHA)

By Judy Frank

Chattanoogan, February 21, 2007

When Chattanooga resident Ethan Sklom learned last week that President George Bush was going to visit here, he knew immediately that he would be on hand for the occasion, he said.

So by 11 a.m. Wednesday, well before the President and his motorcade arrived at the Convention Center, Mr. Sklom was standing on the sidewalk at the intersection of M.L. King Boulevard and Chestnut Street, wearing the rubbery George W. Bush mask he bought last Halloween.

"You don't get many opportunities to take a stand for what you believe in," he said.

Mr. Sklom said he was part of a group of protesters who originally gathered directly across the street from the Convention Center, about a block away from a group of Bush supporters. But a police officer confronted his group and demanded that they move three blocks away, he explained, as other protesters nodded in agreement.

"The group supporting the president was allowed to stay where they were, he said, "but when we asked the police officer why we had to move, he just said, 'Because I say so,' " Mr. Sklom said indignantly.

Three blocks away, standing on a small grassy knoll directly across the street from the Convention Center, Bush supporter Billy McCurdy was likewise vehement.

He and his brother, Ronald, drove the 45 miles from their homes in Fort Payne, Ala., to Chattanooga because they thought it was important to support the President, Mr. McCurdy said.

"What I like about him is his Christian values," he said. "He's just about the best president we ever had . . . and his wife Laura is just about the prettiest first lady."

Mr. McCurdy said he believes the President and his advisors made some mistakes in fighting the war in Iraq. "They probably should have gone in at the beginning with a bigger force," he said. "If we'd had a surge like that back then, we probably wouldn't be where we are today."

But he thinks the President is a "good family man," he added, "who would like to have an end to this war like everybody else. And we're not going to get that unless we support our troops and our president."

DOJ_NMG_0135305

Nearby, Cleveland resident Donna Cussack and Chattanoogan Rebekah Binney stood holding signs criticizing the President.

"With leaders like this, who needs terrorists?" read Ms. Binney's sign. "Not in my name!" Ms. Cussack's declared.

The two women, who met for the first time on the sidewalk outside the Convention Center, were critical of the President's policies on issues ranging from Iraq to the environment to civil liberties to national universal ID legislation.

"They're taking away our freedoms, and saying they're doing it to protect our freedom," Ms. Binney said angrily.

Katie Wilson, who handles marketing for Chattanooga Symphony and Orchestra, used her lunch hour Wednesday to walk over to the Trade Center and join the crowd of Bush supporters standing there.

"The reason I'm here today is because I support (the president's) plans and policies and tough decisions that support our way of life," she explained.

For example, she said, President Bush has championed small business and entrepreneurs.

"I think small business and the entrepreneurial spirit are key elements of America," she said. "We should all support the individuals who seek to make their own livings and build a business."

Some of the people outside the Trade Center said religion played a part in their decisions to be there.

"Jesus wouldn't go to war," declared ordained minister Bonnie Setliffe Jacobs, noting that her last assignment prior to her retirement was at Signal Mountain United Methodist Church.

Carrying a large sign covered with photos of victims of the war in Iraq, she said she viewed the president's visit as an opportunity to protest a variety of wrongs, including the toll that the war is taking on the nation's poor.

"It's killing people," she said. "People don't have money for health care. They join the military because they can't get jobs, and then they get sent to Iraq and killed . . . Poverty is a weapon of mass destruction."

Deborah Weaver and Soherah Stringers, both members of the Chattanooga community of the international Community of Twelve Tribes, arrived early on the sidewalk across from the Trade Center.

The two were part of a group of five Twelve Tribes members who spent their time passing out free copies of an 8-page religious newsletter entitled "What Makes For Peace."

Ms. Weaver said they were not there to support the president, or to demonstrate against him.

"We want to show people a different way," she said. "We appreciate people in the government and in authority, because we know how difficult a position that is. But we are not participating politically, because we believe in the separation of church and state."

Democrats Blast Bush Health-care Proposal (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts

Market Watch, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Top Senate Democrats on Wednesday charged that President Bush's proposal to change how the tax code treats employer-provided health benefits would do little to help the uninsured.

"Unfortunately, President Bush has proposed solutions to this country's health care system that would only serve to undermine the quality and reliability of care for those Americans lucky enough to have insurance," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in a statement.

Bush, in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits. Under current law, such benefits are provided to the employee tax-free, while individuals who buy their own health insurance don't get a tax break.

Under Bush's plan, all workers would receive a standard deduction of up to $15,000 for married couples and $7,500 for individuals for health insurance.

Each dollar of employer-provided health insurance above that level would be taxed as income. The White House estimates that around 80% of workers are below the limit. While the deduction would be indexed to inflation, analysts note that health care costs have outpaced the general rise in prices, meaning more workers would find themselves above the deduction limit in coming years.

Bush highlighted the plan in his weekly radio address last Saturday, and is making the case for the plan in events this week. On Tuesday, Bush met with insurance providers and other business leaders at the White House. On Wednesday, Bush toured a Tennessee hospital and held a public discussion with health experts.

"We're worried about helping make sure people can afford health care. But the tax code is so structured that if you're an individual or somebody working for a company that can't afford health care, you're disadvantaged relative to a company that is," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0135306

The White House argues that the current tax treatment encourages employers to spend more on health plans than would otherwise be the case, helping to drive up health-care costs.

But critics say the plan would likely encourage employers to drop health benefits.

"While the President's focus on healthcare is important, his proposals will only worsen the crisis by undermining the quality coverage that millions of working families now rely on, and replacing it with a tax break that will benefit the wealthiest Americans," said Senate Health, Energy, Labor and Pensions Committee Chairman Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., in a statement.

At Walter Reed, 'We're Going To Fix It' (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

A top Army general vowed yesterday to personally oversee the upgrading of Walter Reed Army Medical Center's Building 18, a dilapidated former hotel that houses wounded soldiers as outpatients.

Gen. Richard A. Cody, the Army vice chief of staff, used terminology similar to that of a military campaign to describe his plan to overhaul the broken building, including giving it a more "appropriate" name, and the sluggish bureaucracy for outpatient care.

"We own that building, and we're going to take charge of it," Cody said at the Pentagon. "The senior Army leadership takes full responsibility for the lack of quality of life at Building 18, and we're going to fix it."

Cody blamed "a breakdown in leadership" for the troubling conditions but said no one has been fired or relieved of command. He did point to lower-ranking officers and noncommissioned officers lacking "the right experience and the authority to be able to execute some of the missions."

"That's what we're correcting right now," he said.

Cody and William Winkenwerder Jr., the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, said at a news conference that they frequently visit Walter Reed and were surprised and disappointed by the living conditions and the fact that they had learned about them from media reports. The Washington Post reported Sunday and Monday on the challenges facing outpatients at Walter Reed.

"We get concerns all the time directed to us. But we never got a concern sent our way about this issue, which is a little surprising. I'm not sure why that is," Winkenwerder said.

Standards of medical care at Walter Reed remain high, he said, but he acknowledged: "The trust has taken a hit here. And I think it's our job to repair that trust and to re-earn that trust. And that's what we're going to do."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), the top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, blasted the Army yesterday, saying in a statement that it has known for years about shortcomings at Walter Reed.

"You could put all of the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton and it wouldn't fix the personnel, management and recordkeeping problems that keep them languishing in outpatient limbo out there for months while paperwork from 11 disjointed systems gets shuffled and lost," Davis said.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) echoed Davis's concerns after she toured Building 18 and spoke to soldiers.

"The problem is much more serious than one building," she said in an interview. "It's going to be easy for everyone to duck this problem after the building is fixed if we don't fix the completely dilapidated administrative system."

Norton said that she thinks Congress will have to compel the Army to overhaul its outpatient care system but that immediate steps are needed to help soldiers trapped in the existing bureaucracy.

Army Secretary Francis Harvey said an independent review group of about eight people will be established to look at outpatient care. Winkenwerder said the group would report back to the Pentagon in a "short time frame."

Cody called the state of Building 18 -- where 76 soldiers live -- "inexcusable" and said he will "personally oversee" its renovation. He said the building had been upgraded several times and called the furniture "very nice" but said the walls and infrastructure were not "up to speed" and required inspections were not done or were not rigorous enough.

Harvey said the building would be renamed after an Army doctor, medic or nurse who was killed in action.

Cody said the Army will review all its procedures for handling wounded soldiers and their families and will seek to streamline systems for assistance.

Staff writers Steve Vogel and William Branigin contributed to this report.

Obama, McCaskill Sponsor Bill On Care For Veterans (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135307

Several lawmakers are taking action to improve the conditions and care for veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Long considered a premier military medical facility, it is now under fire after The Washington Post reported last weekend that parts of the hospital have suffered from extreme neglect.

Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) are sponsoring legislation to improve the lives of recovering veterans at Walter Reed, while Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), a cosponsor of the Obama-McCaskill legislation, said that he would explore ways to direct new funds to Walter Reed and make immediate improvements to its veteran housing.

Meanwhile, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) wrote a letter yesterday to Secretary of Defense Robert Gates demanding information on the current state of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities. She also asked him to explain how conditions were allowed to deteriorate.

Lawmakers Seek Action On Walter Reed Problems (CQ)

By Patrick Yoest

Congressional Quarterly, February 22, 2007

Lawmakers reacted sharply this week to a report that injured soldiers at the Army's premier medical facility were receiving substandard care due to housing and administration problems.

A recent Washington Post article suggested that buildings housing injured soldiers at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington had physically deteriorated and many soldiers faced months-long delays in receiving care.

Senate Veterans Affairs Chairman Daniel K. Akaka, D-Hawaii, said he would hold a hearing on the issue next month, since many of the soldiers housed at Walter Reed will soon become veterans.

"I will purse the situation at Walter Reed and other military treatment facilities that are handling the bulk of returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans to ensure that the government is helping those who have been injured in service to our country, and their families," Akaka said.

House <eterans Affairs Chairman Bob Filner, D-Calif., has not publicly said he would hold a similar hearing.

Sens. Patty Murray, D-Wash., and Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates calling for an inspector general's investigation into outpatient care and the availability of psychological counseling for soldiers and their families.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars called for a congressional investigation of the reported problems, and the American Legion said it planned its own investigation.

Meanwhile, Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said Tuesday he plans to introduce legislation along with Sens. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., and John Kerry, D-Mass., to improve conditions at Walter Reed.

According to Obama's office, the bill will include new reporting requirements and will mandate a lower ratio of caseworkers to patients, as well as more training for caseworkers.

"Caring for our returning heroes is one of the things we can still get right about this war, and that's why the deterioration of the conditions at Walter Reed is both appalling and unacceptable," said Obama, a Democratic presidential contender.

The Army and the Navy announced Tuesday they would form an independent review group to investigate outpatient care at both Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md.

But lawmakers expressed frustration that the Defense Department had not requested money to address the problem earlier.

"The Defense Department is never shy about asking for supplemental funds for operations and equipment," said Jeff Miller, R-Fla. "I cannot imagine why housing for recuperating wounded would not be a similarly high priority."

VFW national commander Gary Kurpius sounded similar notes.

"If money was needed to ensure that Walter Reed had the necessary personnel and programs to properly serve our wounded and their families during a time of war, then people were derelict in their duty for not reporting the need, and then for not following up on their reports," Kurpius said.

AARP To Push For Social Security Fix (POL)

By Jeff Patch

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

AARP officials said Wednesday they will push hard to revamp Social Security to maintain the social insurance program's solvency and fiscal health.

Changes need to be made in the program to head off rising health care costs and declining financial security, especially among baby boomers, said CEO Bill Novelli, legislative policy director David Certner and John Rother, executive officer for policy and strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0135308

“The next generation could be the first in American history that is less well off than their parents,” Novelli said.

Though Social Security is often deemed a “third rail” of American politics for its sensitivity, the program can and should be reformed, Novelli said.

“Of all the big domestic issues, Social Security might be the easiest to deal with,” Novelli said.

AARP released a poll showing a consensus for reform in some of the key areas of Social Security.

The survey, which highlighted several reform provisions that a majority of Americans support or are willing to consider, is the first major stock-taking on the issue since President Bush’s 2005 push to create private savings accounts within the program floundered.

Of eight possible options, a majority of respondents favored three measures that would raise revenue for Social Security in some fashion: increasing the income cap to $150,000; increasing the payroll tax by 0.5 percent for both workers and employers, and changing the benefit formula to make the program more progressive.

The online survey of 1,514 people over 21 was conducted for AARP by Knowledge Networks from Jan. 19 to Jan. 29. A majority of people were willing to consider investing part (15 percent) of the trust fund, although only 40 percent actually support it at this time. Efforts to raise the retirement age, change the longevity index, cut benefits for new retirees and implement modified price indexing were opposed by large margins.

“There is striking agreement among Republicans and Democrats,” Rother said, with the main difference occurring when considering the trust fund option.

The political environment represents a rare opportunity for a deal, with Democrats looking to score legislative victories and President Bush seeking to salvage a legacy, officials said.

“Everything should be on the table,” Novelli said.

AARP officials said 52 percent of voters in the midterm elections were older than 50. Twenty-five percent were AARP members. Seniors will not tolerate continued dithering, Novelli said.

“The public wants an end to the bickering,” he said. “They want action. We have a narrow window of opportunity before the 2008 campaign heats up and legislation cools down.”

AARP is pushing two broad campaigns to confront these issues. Its new campaign about health care and financial security, which is focused on all age groups – especially children – is called “Future Champions.” AARP recently began airing ads featuring children, for its push to enact “fair and equitable bipartisan solutions.”

Last month, the group announced an initiative with the Business Roundtable, the association of business executives, and Service Employees International Union, one of the nation’s largest unions. The pitch, called “Divided We Fail,” seeks to develop bipartisan changes on health and financial security issues. The associations say that although they differ on some policy points, a consensus exists to enact change.

AARP has set up four coalition offices in the four early primary and caucus states – Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina – to push health care and financial security issues in the 2008 presidential campaign.

No need to waste time and energy on the Social Security problem. It'll all sort itself out within the next decade or so - when it collapses. If you're under 60 years old and you expect to receive SS benefits in your lifetime, then you're a drooling idiot.

by sumawolf on 02.21.2007 at 06:48 PM

Why scrap anything ! Read up on the entire subject and learn how the US Government has been taking money out of SS for years with the promise of paying it back into the system and never doing so . Thats where all the money went and now they want to add illegal immigrants also ? Go figure ! The solution is stop stealing from SS US Government and no illegal immigrants period !

by drbillybob on 02.21.2007 at 05:23 PM

How about this; we just scrap the whole thing and make it a "Senior Welfare Program" for those in need? Increasing payroll taxes, means testing and increasing age limits are all steps in that direction.

Why not just scrap it now and encourage our younger workers to invest in privately held tax-advantaged savings plans? It's the only thing that makes fiscal sense.

Women Call For Change In Caucus (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Questions of Sensitivity Strain Alliance of Hispanic Democrats

This week's congressional recess has provided a timeout for feuding members of the Hispanic Caucus, whose tempers have been simmering over issues such as the group's governance and whether the chairman labeled one of the female members a "whore."

The chairman, Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.), is trying to hold together the group of 20 Democrats and smooth over multiple rifts.

"We've all got to come together, put personalities aside," Baca said yesterday by phone from California. "We've got 45 million Hispanic constituents we have to think about."

But several female members of the mostly male caucus say Baca himself is a source of problems, and one, Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), resigned last month in protest. There were six female members and 15 male members before Sanchez quit.

Sanchez, who declined to comment yesterday, has said that Baca called her a "whore" in a conversation with another Latino politician in Sacramento last summer. She said she did not hear the remark firsthand but learned about it later, and she has not revealed the source. She has said the slur demonstrates Baca's lack of respect for women.

Baca has denied making the comment. "I never used the five-letter word," he said. "All of a sudden because we have a female speaker, I and the caucus are being accused of being insensitive. I think we're being falsely accused."

Baca acknowledged that he made a crude remark about another member, Rep. Hilda Solis (D-Calif.), saying that she "was a kiss-up" to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). But he apologized privately to Solis. "She wants a public apology, so, okay, I am apologizing in The Washington Post," he said.

At a closed meeting last week designed to mend fences, Sanchez made an appearance and, along with several other women, aired grievances, said sources familiar with the caucus's workings. The women said their requests of the caucus staff are not taken seriously, among other things.

Baca pledged yesterday to correct problems but added that the complaints so far have been vague. "They haven't specifically spelled out where the problems are," said Baca, who was unchallenged in caucus elections in November. "I've only been in office five weeks. I will answer any concerns, but give me a chance."

When Baca was elected, Solis, Sanchez and her sister, Rep. Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), disputed the election procedure and unsuccessfully pushed for a new vote by secret ballot. They now say they want the governance to be restructured along the lines of the Blue Dog caucus, which disperses power among three co-chairs instead of a single chairman.

Baca said yesterday that any reforms must be approved by the caucus but that it seems odd the women didn't broach the subject before the recent elections. "Why now? Why change in midstream?" he asked. "If people wanted to do this, why didn't the body do it prior to electing the chair on Nov. 15? I ran unopposed. That's why this whole thing is really ludicrous."

Rocky relations between Baca and Loretta Sanchez and some other caucus members stretch back at least a year, to when the political action committee affiliated with the caucus gave about $3,000 to help Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy, run for California offices.

Baca said he recused himself from any of the decision making regarding his sons and the PAC. Both sons lost their bids to women. The Sanchez sisters and Solis were among six caucus members who severed ties with the PAC, saying the committee should support federal office seekers, not candidates running for state or local election.

The Baca sons returned the money to the PAC, but resentments linger, Baca said.

"It's a personal thing," Baca said about the squabbles inside the caucus. "I hope this thing goes away and we can work together as Democrats."

At Mock Briefing, Less Give-and-Take And More Sharing (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

"Tonight, we have truly what is a 'man bites dog' story," host Bob Schieffer told the crowd at the National Press Club.

That, at least, was the plan: The "dogs" -- NBC News's David Gregory and five other White House correspondents -- had agreed to submit to questioning by the "man," White House press secretary Tony Snow, who usually is at the receiving end of such grillings.

DOJ_NMG_0135310

But Snow wouldn't bite. "For those of you who are expecting theatrical savagery on my part, forget about it," Snow advised the crowd of 250 and a live C-SPAN audience Tuesday night. Instead, the hour turned into a mutual rehabilitation session. Snow argued that reporters are not the jackals that the public supposes them to be. The reporters reciprocated with warm tales about covering the Bush White House; one spoke about the perk of seeing Snow's bare knees.

"If there is a flash of tempers between me and Tony, it's not about him and me, it's nothing personal," said Gregory, whose televised clashes with Snow have become legend.

Snow grinned. "What you see quite often at the briefings are sharp exchanges, but David's right: It's not personal," the press secretary agreed. "I not only like but admire everybody else sitting up here on this podium. It is a real pleasure and a privilege to work with them, to get to know them. . . . It is a wondrous thing."

For those requiring something even more cloying, there was a large tray of cookies at the exit.

Only occasionally did a barb pierce the evening's pleasantries. "How often have you gone home and you said, 'Man, I'll tell you what, if I could do it over again, I really would have been nicer to that press secretary?' " Snow queried.

"When I have something to announce, I'll announce it," Gregory replied, using a standard line of President Bush's spokesmen.

The New York Times' Sheryl Stolberg smiled sweetly at Snow as she confided to the crowd, "I often tease Tony and tell him that he's the most useless press secretary ever."

"Thank you," Snow responded with an aw-shucks look.

Mostly, though, the journalists grappled with one another rather than with Snow. "This will surprise you, but I think there are some people who play to the cameras," the Associated Press's Terry Hunt said of the White House briefings.

"No!" said CBS Radio's Mark Knoller, in mock surprise.

Gregory, wearing a natty purple tie, would not stand for this. "I think what Terry Hunt said is wrong and actionable," he deadpanned. "People think people are playing to the cameras. I can't control what Tony does."

Snow changed the subject, but Knoller soon brought the talk back to his showboat colleagues' hectoring of White House briefers. "I'm not there to debate them," he said.

"I see it a little bit differently," Gregory said, to laughter. "I'm just trying to push him to what I think would be more candor than he's prepared to offer."

The talk of candor must have moved Snow to offer up some. "There will be times when I tap-dance around something because it would be best answered off the record," he admitted.

The confessions continued. "The best thing I like about being on radio is the anonymity," Knoller said. "It means that if you're thumbing through the adult magazines at Barnes & Noble, nobody's going to know who you are."

Awkward laughter followed. Snow quaffed some water and raised his eyebrows. "It's a joke!" Knoller insisted.

Stolberg was the final panelist to be questioned by Snow ("Thank you for saving the best for last," she told him), but she proved the liveliest. She retold an exchange between her daughters: "My younger daughter said, 'Mommy, have you met the president?' And the older one said, 'The president has met Mom.' "

She also had some controversial views on the dusty Texas town where Bush has his ranch. "You know what I think is fun about being a White House correspondent? Crawford!" she said. "We can go in shorts, and the press secretary comes in shorts," she added.

Others on the dais recoiled. Gregory arched his eyebrows at Newsweek's Richard Wolffe. "And it's only 400 degrees," the NBC man said.

"The best thing about Crawford," Knoller chimed in, "is you can go to work and you don't have to go through metal detectors."

"And it's only 400 degrees," Gregory repeated.

American Urban Radio's April Ryan quietly told Gregory to "settle down."

"You always have Cindy Sheehan there," Snow offered.

But enough dissension. It was getting late, and it was time to make nice some more.

"It's very easy to overlook how cool it is to work in the White House," Snow proposed.

"Hard to beat," Wolffe concurred.

"A rare privilege," said Stolberg.

"Best job I have ever had," said Ryan.

"An amazing honor," said Knoller.

Role Reversal: The White House Press Corps Faces Answers Questions From Tony Snow (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

In what CBS's Bob Schieffer called a "man-bites-dog story," White House press secretary Tony Snow put A-list reporters on the spot Tuesday night, in front of C-SPAN cameras.

The forum, the first collaboration between the White House Correspondents Association and National Press Club, provoked unusually candid remarks by the reporters, who usually are loathe to talk about such delicate subjects as how ideology and blogs affect their work. And Snow acknowledged that they made some good points.

Snow, a former editorial writer who came to the White House after working as the host of "Fox News Sunday" and an anchor for Fox News, set a jocular tone for the colloquy with six of the best-known and most outspoken White House correspondents.

"For those of you expecting theatrical savagery on my part," he began, "forget about it. I'm just too nice. Having been on both sides – having been in the press, and also being a press secretary – one of the things you don't see quite often in the briefings is how much fun we do have."

Here are some excerpts of memorable exchanges from the hourlong session before an overflow crowd of more than 400, as televised by C-SPAN:

Tony Snow to David Gregory of NBC News: "How often have you gone home and stared in the mirror and you said, 'Man, I tell you what. If I could do it over again, I really would have been nicer to that press secretary.' "

Gregory, laughing and closing his eyes as if to concentrate: "Let me think how often that's happened. I wanted to say at the outset: That's an interesting question. And when I have something to announce, I'll announce it."

Snow: "Did you write that before you came?"

Gregory: "When it comes to Tony and I, neither one of us are trying to make it easy for the other. That's not the reason we're there. He's got a job to do, I have a job to do. And in some cases, those missions can conflict: I'm trying to get more out of him, he's perhaps trying to offer less than I'm trying to get. That's the intersection of some tension."

Snow to Terence Hunt, AP White House correspondent: "One of the questions people kept asking me when I first started is: Are you going to get rid of the cameras in the briefing room? And my sense is you really can't any more. If you had your druthers, would you have them on, or off?" (The daily White House briefing was off-camera until the Clinton administration.)

Hunt: "I would have 'em off … This will surprise you, but there are some people who, I think, play to the cameras. Yeah, it's true! You, of course, didn't have that back before the cameras were allowed in … Having said that, we've come this far, I don't think you can turn back the time and go back to not having cameras in the briefings."

Sheryl Gay Stolberg of The New York Times, on coming to the White House from Capitol Hill, where reporters have relatively free rein: "Coming from that environment, the White House felt utterly constraining. I often tease Tony and tell him he's the most useless press secretary ever."

Snow: "Thanks, Sheryl."

Stolberg: "I'm trying to get information out of you. You're trying not to give me information."

Snow: "I'm not sure that's quite the case."

Stolberg: "You ARE trying to give me information?"

Snow: "Yeah, but sometimes – "

The AP's Hunt, to laughter: "At a slow pace!"

Snow: "No. My view on this is pretty simple, which is: On a big story, if we don't get our side out, we have no right to complain if it's not reported. So we've certainly tried to be more aggressive, for instance, before a big speech and so on. There are going to be times when for various reasons – national security, or sometimes even the propriety of dealing with other individuals in Washington, around the world – you are, in fact, going to clam up for a little while until others have had their chance to speak. I've been getting lots of questions tonight about the decision the British government's made. Well, the prime minister has not yet made his announcement, and it's a little presumptuous for me to start characterizing or pronouncing on something that hasn't happened yet. So, 'stonewall,' 'useless press secretary.' But sometimes that, in fact, is the appropriate thing to do. On the other hand, again, I'm a big believer that if we come and complain that you haven't reported something and you have to ask for it, then that's our fault."

DOJ_NMG_0135312

Gregory: "Can I jump in on the television part of this? Because what, I think, Terry Hunt said is wrong and actionable, frankly." (Gales of laughter.) "Look, this is a little bit self-serving, because I work in television. But I think that there is great utility, both for the White House and for us in these briefings being televised. I mean, this is democracy in action. This is an important part of the government in action. I think you were hired in large measure because you had an ability to assertively lay out the president's case in a way that perhaps hadn't been done before you were brought on. So the president recognized that: I need a forceful advocate who can be seen on television and who can seize that platform. At the same time, there are many of you watching. If you're watching on C-SPAN or you're here tonight, you want to watch not only the give and take but the topics to be addressed, and see the only representative of the White House on a daily basis, when the president does not speak, say what he wants to say but also be responsive to members of the press. And whether or not you think we accurately or justly represent the views of the American people, that's something that's very much up for debate. But it is a useful exercise. There's also a down side to it. If people think people are playing to the cameras, I can't control what Tony does." (Laughter, including from Snow.) "But I hope that some of my colleagues here will vouch for this."

April Ryan of American Urban Radio Networks: "I agree."

Gregory: "There is utility, and I also think there's a downside. Politics and political coverage has become so polarized in this country … It's the Internet and the blogs that have really used this White House press conference to somehow support positions out in America, political views. And they will clip and digitize portions of these briefings to fit into their particular argument. I think people try to divine motives of the questioners and certainly draw conclusions about the answers or non-answers based on their own political issues."

Snow: "I'm glad you raised the blog issue, because I think there'll be kind of a generational divide. Do any of you guys look at blogs much?"

Mark Knoller of CBS News, who was introduced as "the White House historian" because of his meticulous and unmatched recordkeeping: "I write a few, but I don't look at 'em much."

Stolberg of The New York Times: "I'm all for blogs. I'm all for the First Amendment. I think people ought to be empowered."

Snow: "We've got this new democratic age in the media. I'll occasionally punch it up. And it's amazing: You get this wonderful, imaginative, hateful stuff that comes flying out. Maybe one of the most important takeaways is the classical line: Not only should you not believe your own press, you probably shouldn't believe your opposition blogs, either. What do you think, Richard?"

Richard Wolffe, Newsweek senior White House correspondent: "I totally agree. David hit on a good point here that a lot of the blogs are trying to divine motive and bias. There seems to be this sort of witch hunt that's out there. A lot of the blogs are unduly devoted to media criticism which, itself, is kind of interesting given all the things you could comment on … The interesting thing, in looking at the political coverage as people try to look at what we do, is that they want us to play a role that really isn't our role. Our role is to ask questions and get information. The press briefing isn't Prime Minister's Question Time. It's not a chance for the opposition to take on the government and grill them to a point where they throw their hands up in surrender. Now, obviously there's a contentious spirit there. We're trying to get information. But it's not a political exercise, it's a journalistic exercise. And I think often the blogs are looking for us to be political advocates more than journalistic ones."

Snow: "Another sign of the times: My BlackBerry just went off."

Gregory: "Want me to answer that?"

Snow: "The president says 'hi.' "

April Ryan: "I told you he was watching."

Snow: "Do you not think, April, that it is impossible as a reporter to try to bracket out your personal views or approach to things, or do you think that when you walk in as a journalist, somehow personal views go out the window and you can ask a crisp but thoroughly unslanted question?"

Ryan: "I've been there 10 years and I have to look at all sides – not just your side, but every side, and there's not necessarily two sides. But, Tony, you have to come in and see the full picture … I thank God for cameras. I thank God that it's on the record. Because the American public needs to see, there needs to be accountability. Those cameras keep everyone accountable."

CBS's Mark Knoller: "I'd like to ask my colleagues whether they're worried about the cases where a series of pointed questions risks dissolving into a debate. Do you sometimes worry that we're debating with Tony if we're not getting the answers we want? I make a great point of trying to ask pointed and blunt questions. But I'm not there to debate him. And if I don't like the answer that he's giving, well, I'm going to report what he said and what he didn't say. And I don't feel that I need to debate him in order to try to browbeat him into giving me what I'm looking for."

Gregory: "I see that a little bit differently." (Laughter.) "I don't see it as browbeating him or debating him. I see it as trying to provoke a little something that's closer to the real deal. Tony or any press secretary comes out there with a certain brief to argue or to impart. … When we're in the middle of a war and there are qualitative judgments being made, either by the White House or by its critics, and you're trying to push the White House – and, in this case, push Tony, to give an answer that he may not want to give, I think follow-ups and pointed questions are not inappropriate. So I don't necessarily see it as debating. But I agree with you, Mark, that at a certain point, you're either going to get it or you're not going to get it. But it's not a matter of going in there and saying, 'I want to get this such thing.' I assume he's not going to break down and say, 'Oh, gosh, you know, that's right. And what Nancy Pelosi said about the president, that's exactly right, and we fouled it all up.' I'm not looking for that. But I'm just trying to push him to what I think would be more candor than he's prepared to offer."

Snow: "We've got several parents up here. David, when you go home, what kind of reaction do you get from being on TV?"

Gregory: "I don't know, frankly. My kids seem caught up in their own many personal needs. But I will say that my oldest son, Max – he does pay attention – and he saw some video of the president where he was making a call from Camp David, so he was dressed casually. And he said, 'Daddy, how come the president doesn't have his news clothes on?' "

Snow: "My kids don't give a rip. They see me on TV, it means I'm not at home … It's very easy to overlook how cool it is to work at the White House. If we ever are insane enough to forget that, when you see your kids walking around in it, there's something very special. You just think, 'Whooooa! This is great!' "

Gregory: "It's funny, because Terry's daughter would watch the briefings and then thought that there shouldn't be any cameras."

For Norton And The City, The Wait May Be Over (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

It can't be easy being in Congress without a vote, but the District's delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton, has stuck it out for 16 long years, never truly a part of the club but always relentlessly knocking on the door seeking admittance.

Now, Norton is sure, success is in her sights. With Democratic leaders pledging to get it done and ample Republican support, the bill giving both the District of Columbia and Utah an additional voting seat is cruising along.

"Won't we be surprised if it doesn't happen -- but I tell you, it's in the stars," Norton said yesterday.

Not a moment too soon for Norton, a third-generation D.C. native, who had a long career in civil rights and as a tenured professor before serving in Congress. "This is really personal for me," she said. "My grandfather was a firefighter here."

The District's quest for voting rights and statehood has taken many roads for decades. Twenty years ago, legal experts believed only a constitutional amendment could give the city voting rights. But ultimately, only 16 of the 38 states needed voted to ratify the amendment. Most contemporary legal thinking, including an endorsement by the American Bar Association last year, declares the bill constitutionally sound.

Norton's bill, co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), must clear two committees before it is brought for a floor vote. Norton is hoping that will happen in March. Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Pelosi is committed to finalizing the bill's language, moving it through committees and having a floor vote as soon as possible.

The way the legislation is written, Norton could not automatically vote if it became law -- she would have to run for Congress in a special election. But Hill sources say that could change as the bill makes it way through the system.

What is likely to secure the measure's future is that it include a provision to add a congressional seat for Utah, which would probably be Republican, thereby balancing out the Democratic gain from the District.

"This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity because it's seldom that you have a pairing of two jurisdictions," Norton said. "Either it happens now or it won't happen for a long time."

Cheney At Odds With McCain Over Rumsfeld (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday challenged GOP presidential hopeful John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld was one of the country's worst defense secretaries.

"John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong," said Cheney, a friend of Rumsfeld. He also disclosed that the Arizona senator had apologized to him for a previous comment that the vice president had "badly served" President Bush on Iraq.

"John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld," Cheney said in an interview with ABC News.

DOJ_NMG_0135314

At a campaign event in Los Angeles, McCain said he stood by his remarks about Rumsfeld. He did not mention the vice president, and his campaign declined to comment on Cheney's remarks.

Despite having low job approval numbers overall, the vice president continues to be very popular among rank-and-file Republicans, and many of them are likely to vote in next year's GOP presidential caucuses and primaries.

McCain, who lost the Republican nomination to Bush in 2000, is expected to formally announce his second run for the White House next month. He faces strong challenges from Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, and Rudy Giuliani, the ex-mayor of New York.

On the campaign trail this week, McCain has talked at length with voters about Iraq and defended his staunch support of Bush's 21,500-troop buildup there while criticizing the way the war has been handled.

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement — that's the kindest word I can give you — of Donald Rumsfeld, of this war," McCain said in Hilton Head Island, S.C., on Monday. "The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," McCain added.

Rumsfeld stepped down last year after a rocky six-year tenure.

A former defense secretary himself, Cheney was asked about McCain's comments while on the USS Kitty Hawk at the Yokosuka Naval Base in Japan. He called Rumsfeld a great secretary.

"I know a little bit about the job. I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances," Cheney said. "He and John McCain had a number of dustups over policy, didn't have anything to do with Iraq."

Last month, McCain blamed both Cheney and Rumsfeld for a "terribly mishandled" war.

"The president listened too much to the vice president . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense," McCain was quoted as telling The Politico, a Capitol Hill newspaper and Web site.

A few days later, Cheney said, McCain approached him on the Senate floor, said he had been quoted out of context and offered an apology.

"I was happy to accept," Cheney said.

Democrats assailed McCain.

"He is trying to have it both ways by criticizing a war he always supported, while also trying to stick close to the president," said Luis Miranda, a Democratic National Committee spokesman. "If McCain wants to apologize, it should be to our brave troops and the voters he's misleading, not to Cheney and Rumsfeld."

Cheney Chastises McCain (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 22, 2007

President Bush and Vice President Cheney both say they have sworn off commenting on the ’08 race, so their words are being parsed for glimmers of their view of the race to succeed them. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., was at odds with this president for years but has emerged as the most fervent backer of the White House Iraq policy of any high-profile official outside the administration.

But Cheney made it clear during an interview with ABC News Wednesday that he was none too pleased with McCain’s declaration on Monday at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.: "I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history.” McCain was greeted with applause.

Rumsfeld was forced from his job after November's election. Cheney, who was defense secretary under President George H.W. Bush, from 1989 to 1993, said at a Pentagon ceremony honoring Rumsfeld upon his departure in mid-December: "I believe the record speaks for itself: Don Rumsfeld is the finest secretary of Defense this nation has ever had."

The vice president is on a week-long trip to Japan and Australia and gave a 10-minute interview to ABC’s Jonathan Karl aboard the USS Kitty Hawk, docked off the coast of Tokyo at Yokosuka Naval Base in Japan. Here is their exchange about McCain:

Karl: “You probably heard John McCain again come out and say that your friend Donald Rumsfeld is perhaps the worst secretary of defense ever. What do you make of that?"

Cheney: “I just fundamentally disagree with John. John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld.”

Karl: “So what's your take on where Secretary Rumsfeld fits in?"

DOJ_NMG_0135315

Cheney: “I think Don's a great secretary. I know a little bit about the job. I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances. He and John McCain had a number of dust-ups over policy, didn't have anything to do with Iraq -- other issues that were involved. John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong.”

Karl: “I know we're just about out of time, but I wanted to clarify: Senator McCain had said that the problem with President Bush is he listened to you too much. So this is what he was apologizing to you for?”

Cheney: “Yes, yes.”

Karl: “What did he say?”

Cheney: “Well, he came up to me on the floor a couple of days later, the next time I was on the floor of the Senate, said he'd been quoted out of context, and then basically offered an apology which I was happy to accept.”

In January, McCain had told Roger Simon, chief political columnist of The Politico, during an interview at his Senate office: "The president listened too much to the vice president . . . Of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the vice president and, most of all, the secretary of defense."

Asked if he admired Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., for refusing to apologize for her 2002 vote to authorize the use of force against Iraq, the vice president started to answer but then demurred. “I'm not going to get involved in the presidential campaign,” he said. “The president and I have both sworn off commenting on the give-and-take of the campaign in both parties. It's already well under way and so I'll withhold comment for now.”

Similarly, Bush said jokingly at his East Room news conference last week after a question about Democrats: “I'd just like to establish some ground rules here with those of you who are stuck following me for the next little less than two years: I will resist all temptation to become the pundit-in-chief and commenting upon every twist and turn of the presidential campaign. As much as I like politics, and I'm intrigued by the race … I won't comment.”

The vice president, did, however take a shot at House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif. Earlier, during remarks at a rally for troops on the Kitty Hawk, Cheney had said, to applause: “I want you to know that the American people will not support a policy of retreat. We want to complete the mission, we want to get it done right, and then we want to return with honor."

Karl said during the interview: “You just made a very clear statement in your speech saying the American people do not support a policy of retreat.”

“I believe that,” Cheney said.

Karl pressed: “Is that policy that we hear from the Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi -- from other Democrats, is that a policy of defeat?”

The vice president replied: “Yes.”

Cheney Argues Rumsfeld Served Well (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Vice President Cheney objected yesterday to Sen. John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld "will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history" and added that the senator had apologized to him for saying Cheney had misled President Bush on Iraq.

Cheney, speaking in an interview with ABC News yesterday during a week-long swing through Asia, said he "fundamentally disagrees" with the Arizona Republican's statement Monday about Rumsfeld, made while McCain was campaigning for president in South Carolina.

Bush replaced Rumsfeld in November after Democrats captured both chambers of Congress, a move that many congressional Republicans believe the president should have made before the election as the situation in Iraq soured. Although Rumsfeld's refusal to send a larger force to Iraq early in the invasion is seen by some as a crucial mistake, Cheney has maintained that Rumsfeld did an outstanding job under trying circumstances.

"I think Don's a great secretary. I know a little bit about the job," said Cheney, a former defense secretary. "I've watched what he's done over there for six years. I think he did a superb job in terms of managing the Pentagon under extraordinarily difficult circumstances."

Cheney also countered McCain's assertion that the vice president misled Bush when it came to Iraq. "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized," Cheney said. "Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

McCain is expected to formally announce next month his second run for the White House. Long a vocal advocate of putting more troops into Iraq, he has strongly endorsed Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional combat troops to Iraq even as he has harshly criticized Rumsfeld and Cheney for the way the war has been waged.

"Well, he came up to me on the floor a couple of days later, the next time I was on the floor of the Senate, said he'd been quoted out of context, and then basically offered an apology, which I was happy to accept," the vice president said.

McCain declined to comment on Cheney's remarks. "The senator's position on the war is well known," said Danny Diaz, McCain's spokesman.

"Ghosts Of Abu Ghraib": Fearlessly Facing The Shame (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

"Ghosts of Abu Ghraib," a new HBO documentary produced and directed by Rory Kennedy, daringly approaches a scandal that hardly anyone wants to see reexamined -- least of all, one can safely assume, the Bush administration and the Pentagon.

The reason is not just that what happened at Abu Ghraib is, to understate in the extreme, unpleasant. The documentary says it's also because this breakdown was not so much nervous as inevitable -- and not so spontaneous, having been sanctioned by the top brass, including former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Skillfully and sparingly told without a narrator, with only occasional on-screen captions to help the narrative along, the film brings to life a sadly shameful moment in recent American history and does it without histrionics. But Kennedy (youngest of Bobby Kennedy's offspring) might have erred at the outset of her film by inadequately establishing the national mood that helped make Abu Ghraib possible: the understandable sense of shock, outrage and violation we all felt after the insane 2001 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The visual reminders of those attacks consist of photographs and footage that show only physical destruction, the ghostly and ghastly remains of buildings. There doesn't appear to be a dead body in sight, almost as if the atrocities committed were extreme examples of architectural criticism. That weakens Kennedy's case. The photos she shows from Abu Ghraib are very explicit and, unlike the versions shown in newspapers and on television in 2004 when the story broke, uncensored.

We see naked prisoners in humiliating situations -- a man tied at the end of a leash, like a dog; a group of naked prisoners arranged in a lopsided human pyramid; men positioned in ways to suggest homosexual acts. Kennedy was right to show these pictures, but she should have been less genteel in what she showed of the 9/11 attacks. America violated the rules on interrogation of prisoners at Abu Ghraib, and for that, there is no excuse. But one must take into account the fury felt in the aftermath of 9/11 over monstrosities that also violated every covenant of "civilized" warfare.

This discrepancy doesn't really lessen the film's power. And in interviews with some of the men and women who perpetrated the torture, or who posed cheerfully (almost like tourists at Niagara Falls) with the victims, we see them looking anything but furious or consumed with wrath. Instead, they smile in the photos and, in the interview segments, they speak with a kind of numb, casual regret -- but nothing like wrenching shame or sorrow.

Perhaps just as unnerving and dispiriting as the photos is the story told by a former Abu Ghraib prisoner (photographed so as to disguise his identity) about how he begged guards to provide medical treatment for a fellow prisoner: his father.

When the man realized his father was ill, suffering shortness of breath and other symptoms, he says, he repeatedly begged that his dad be taken to a medical facility, only to be rebuffed by guards, told to go back to his cell and eventually threatened with being shot if he protested further. Fighting back tears as he finishes the story, the man remembers holding his stricken father in his arms as he died. The father, however, would not be listed officially as a fatality resulting from torture or neglect.

Kennedy suggests the torture was not an outbreak of lunacy but the direct result of policies handed down by Rumsfeld that were designed to circumvent the Geneva Conventions (which specify that prisoners of war be "treated humanely") and U.N. conventions against torture, to which the United States is, at least technically, a signatory. That was done by, among other things, refusing to classify the up to 6,000 inmates of Abu Ghraib as prisoners of war; Rumsfeld instead calls them "unlawful combatants" at a news conference. Then the term "torture" was redefined so narrowly in government memos that it would be almost impossible to commit it.

When the scandal broke, the administration sent out "conscious disinformation," one former official recalls, including the trivializing assertion that what happened at Abu Ghraib was just " 'Animal House' on the night shift." (Earlier, one of the military police stationed there recalls thinking of the place as " 'Apocalypse Now' meets 'The Shining,' except this is real and we're in the middle of it.")

It could easily be argued that it was the torturers and not the tortured who suffered the most as a result of what happened at Abu Ghraib. The damage done to the reputation of the United States was critical and criminal, and the torture that occurred can be seen as but a symptom of a much larger corruption: the pursuit of the war itself and the fallacious "evidence" fed to the American people to justify it.

The wider moral of the film is simpler and nonpolitical and painfully, poignantly evident: When you treat people as less than human, you become less than human yourself. "Ghosts of Abu Ghraib" will haunt those who see it long after the final frames have flickered out.

FEDERAL DIARY: Retiree Health Care Back On Hill Agenda (WP)

By Stephen Barr, D4

Washington Post, February 22, 2007

It's a classic pocketbook issue.

Since 2000, federal employees have been able to pay their health insurance premiums on a tax-free basis. Many federal retirees think they should get similar treatment.

But extending "premium conversion," as it's called, to retirees would require a change in tax law, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and others, who have pushed for that change in the last three congressional sessions, are back at it.

"We're talking about a modest amount of money, but to those on fixed income, this could have a real impact," Davis said as he again introduced a bill to extend the tax break. The bill would result in average savings of $820 a year for federal retirees, he estimated.

Under the bill, federal civil service and military retirees would pay their monthly health-care premiums through a pretax deduction from their annuities. The bill also would permit active-duty military personnel to deduct from their taxable income certain supplemental premiums or enrollment fees for Tricare, their military health insurance.

The tax code permits employees to pay for health insurance with deductions that are excluded from income and Social Security payroll taxes. It does not, however, allow employers to offer premium-conversion benefits to their retirees, the sore point that the Davis bill would address.

In recent years, Davis has gotten such legislation through the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which he chaired until this Congress. But the measure has always faltered because the House Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax policy, has balked at taking up the issue.

The likely cost of the bill appears to be the sticking point. According to a Congressional Budget Office estimate, extending the tax break to federal retirees would cost about $600 million over 10 years.

Davis hopes to build bipartisan support for this year's measure. Reps. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the House majority leader; Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), who has a seat on Ways and Means; and Jon Porter (R-Nev.) have signed on as chief co-sponsors.

The Washington area congressional delegation and about half of the Ways and Means Committee also have agreed to be listed as co-sponsors of the bill, Davis said.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association and the Military Coalition, a group of 35 military and veterans organizations, are supporting the Davis effort.

"More than just retirees should care about this legislation," said Margaret Baptiste, president of the employees association. "Imagine the shock of a newly retired federal employee when she receives her first annuity check and learns that the federal government no longer uses pretax compensation to pay her share of health insurance premiums . . . just when it's needed the most."Hazards at Interior

An Interior Department study has found a number of health and safety hazards at the department's Main and South buildings, with about a dozen classified as potential threats to employees and the environment.

Mike Cyr, division chief for facilities management services, said that planning to correct hazards is underway and that a meeting with employee groups has been scheduled for March 1 to discuss the study's findings.

The study, conducted by a consultant Jan. 22-25, found that Interior needs to improve handling of hazardous waste, such as oil, paint, and fluorescent lamp tubes that could release mercury into the atmosphere if broken.

"Because no system for the proper disposal of hazardous waste or unneeded hazardous materials is provided to employees, the only options available to employees are to abandon these items in various mechanical spaces or discard them illegally," the study said.

The study was released by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, a watchdog group that has contended that the department's handling of a headquarters renovation project has routinely subjected Interior employees to chemical vapors, welding fumes and debris dust. About 2,000 employees work in the headquarters complex.

Frank Quimby, a department spokesman, said air quality is tested daily and meets standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency. Although the study found at least two areas where asbestos had crumbled and was loose, "there has been no dangerous exposure to employees," Quimby said. "These areas are fairly out of the way."

Studies to identify possible hazardous workplace conditions are planned for all of the department's major facilities. In this case, Quimby said: "We don't think it is something that should alarm employees or people who visit the building, because there is no actual threat to human health and safety. These are all potential threats."

Fresh Inflation Data To Keep Fed On Guard (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A widely watched gauge of consumer prices rose last month at the fastest rate since June, interrupting what had been a steadily improving inflation outlook in recent months.

The Labor Department said its index of "core" consumer prices, which excludes food and energy, rose 0.3% in January, after a string of three consecutive monthly increases of 0.1%. Those modest gains had begun to persuade economists that inflation was decelerating.

While any one-month pickup by itself is unlikely to cause alarm, economists said the uptick in core prices last month will keep Federal Reserve officials on guard for signs of renewed inflation pressures.

"The Fed is focused on inflation, and there are good reasons they are taking that stance," said Joel Naroff, chief economist of Naroff Economic Advisors, in a research note to clients. "This report tells us that inflation is still above" the level policy makers would prefer, and "that means the Fed will remain on inflation watch for quite some time."

Last month's increase in core prices was fueled by unusually sharp price increases for health care, which rose 0.8% from December, and in tobacco and smoking products, which leapt 1.5%. Darryl Jayson, vice president of the Tobacco Merchants Association, pointed to a recent wholesale-price increase for some premium brands and continuing tax increases on cigarettes -- including a new $1-a-pack levy in Texas -- as contributing factors.

Compared with a year earlier, core prices in January were up 2.7%, higher than December's 2.6% rate. Fed policy makers pay close attention to this measure because it offers a less-volatile picture of inflation trends over time. Overall, consumer prices rose 0.2% last month and were up 2.1% from a year earlier.

Last month's rebound in core prices probably wasn't a complete surprise to Fed officials, who have continually reiterated their concern that inflation could flare up again. Minutes of the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, released yesterday, indicated that Fed policy makers "did not yet see a downward trend in core inflation as definitively established," and they attributed part of the recent slowdown to temporary factors such as lower energy prices.

Still, Fed officials are unlikely at this point to see the January uptick in core prices, which was 0.256% before rounding, as a challenge to their view that inflation will slow over the course of the year.

Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen acknowledged yesterday that core inflation was "on the high side of expectations." But in a speech to a business group in Santa Clara, Calif., she added: "This followed three straight months" of low core inflation. "After smoothing through the volatility, this measure of inflation also has eased in recent months."

Ms. Yellen said she is still concerned about inflation pressures because the unemployment rate is probably lower than can be sustained over time without pushing up inflation. Economic growth would have to remain subdued "for a time" for the Fed to be sure the "economy is heading for a soft landing, with inflation continuing to move lower."

Also yesterday, the Conference Board, a New York private research group, said its index of leading economic indicators rose a modest 0.1% in January after a 0.6% gain in December. The group said the index "suggests that slow to moderate economic growth is likely to continue in the near term."

Consumer Price Gauges Rise More Than Expected (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

The Federal Reserve may expect more subdued inflation this year, but a small jump in consumer prices last month served as a reminder that those expectations are still far from being fulfilled.

As a result, analysts said, the Fed may yet find itself raising interest rates. Any cuts, it seems, will have to wait.

DOJ_NMG_0135319

Prices accelerated last month on a wide variety of goods and services, from fresh fruit to hotel rooms to the cost of a hospital stay, the Labor Department reported yesterday. The overall rate of inflation climbed 0.2 percent in January after a rise of 0.4 percent in December.

Though inflation growth, as represented by the Consumer Price Index, slowed from December, it advanced faster than economists and Wall Street investors had expected. The rate of core inflation, a gauge that does not include food and energy and is closely monitored by the Fed, also surpassed economists' forecasts. It jumped 0.3 percent in January, compared with 0.1 percent in December.

The numbers stung Wall Street, and investors pushed many stocks lower yesterday. Bond traders, betting that the Fed would not lower interest rates anytime soon, nudged down the price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note.

Before the Fed can act on interest rates in either direction, analysts said, it needs to have a clear indication that inflation is settling into a pattern, either higher or lower. But since the summer, consumer prices have been fickle, falling, flattening and then rising again.

"You can make a reasonable case that maybe inflation goes a little lower, or you can make a reasonable case that maybe it goes a little higher," the chief economist of MFR, Joshua Shapiro, said. "I think they're sitting there waiting to see if it breaks. If it breaks decisively one way or the other, then they'll act."

Minutes from the January meeting of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee, released yesterday after the customary three-week delay, indicated that the Fed was not on the verge of any significant shift in tone. "All members agreed that the predominant concern remained the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired," the minutes said.

They also showed that Fed officials discussed whether their tough tone on inflation was still appropriate and unanimously concluded that it was. All 11 Fed bankers who voted at the meeting agreed that "a change was not warranted at this time."

The Fed still has a lot to be concerned about, as the data released yesterday showed.

One factor officials pointed to during the January meeting as a potential obstacle to lower inflation was rising wages.

Yesterday, the Labor Department reported that the average earnings for workers in nonmanagement positions continued to advance at a brisk pace. After inflation, average earnings on both a weekly and hourly basis rose 2.1 percent in January. As recently as July, inflation was swallowing wage gains, leaving workers with negative real earnings.

The core inflation rate increased 2.7 percent from a year earlier, well above the 1 percent to 2 percent the Fed typically prefers. That reversed a four-month trend when the year-over-year core inflation rate fell or remained flat. After climbing as high as 2.9 percent in September, year-over-year core inflation fell to 2.6 percent in November and December.

"Inflation is still sticky, and higher than the Fed wants it to be," said Mickey D. Levy, chief economist with Bank of America. "And as long as it stays above 2 percent, the Fed is going to continue to express concern about it."

Overall inflation in January was 2.1 percent compared with a year earlier, down from 2.5 percent in December.

The Fed meets next on March 21. Most analysts expect it to keep the benchmark short-term interest rate at 5.25 percent, where it has been since August. But, as prices of contracts that allow traders to bet on future interest rates show, traders expect a rate cut before 2008.

Sharp rises in the costs of medical care (the most in more than 15 years) and tobacco (the most in almost 5 years) helped elevate core inflation in January, leading some economists to argue that temporary factors were causing an exaggeration of the figures.

"At first sight, the jump in January core consumer price inflation seems to signal renewed inflationary vigor," Kenneth Beauchemin of Global Insight wrote in a research note. But Mr. Beauchemin noted that the price increase for medical care in January was the fastest since 1991.

Food prices also rose the fastest in almost two years.

On the bright side, there were hints that the outlook for inflation in the long term was improving. Energy prices dropped 1.5 percent in January, after a 4.2 percent increase in December. Housing prices, including rent, rose at a slower pace.

When he addressed Congress two weeks ago, the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, said two major factors in the forecast for lower inflation this year were lower housing and energy costs. And many economists said yesterday that January's figures alone were not a reason to expect inflation to start rising at a troubling pace. "That's not going to cause them to run out and panic," Mr. Shapiro said.

But, as Mr. Bernanke has said, there is a degree of uncertainty to the Fed's forecast.

Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook, argued that the January consumer price data should alarm the Fed because it is probably a sign of things to come. A combination of rebounding economic growth, low unemployment and slowing worker productivity will push inflation higher, he said.

"Clearly this is not what the Fed wants to see," he wrote in a research note. "Bernanke has recently testified that core prices had been retreating, but January's numbers suggest we may have seen the lows for inflation in this cycle."

Slowing Economy Isn't Cooling Prices (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Inflation flared last month as rising prices for medical care, food and other items more than offset falling fuel prices, raising concern in financial markets that a slowing economy has not yet tamed price pressures.

Stock and bond prices fell after the Labor Department released its latest inflation figures, which convinced many investors that the Federal Reserve is not likely to cut interest rates any time soon and that it might have to raise them to subdue prices.

The department's consumer price index, a widely followed inflation gauge, rose 0.2 percent last month, as a 1.5 percent drop in fuel prices helped offset higher prices for many other goods and services.

The index was 2.1 percent higher than in January of last year -- a milder increase than the 2.5 percent rise for all of 2006. That's consistent with other recent data suggesting that overall, the economy has cooled.

But investors saw ominous trends in the details. Prices for gasoline and fuel oil tumbled last month because of falling crude oil prices, as natural gas prices fell because of unseasonably warm weather. Both trends have reversed in February, suggesting inflation will be higher this month.

And because oil prices swing so much, economists seek signs of underlying inflation by studying so-called core measures, which exclude volatile food and fuel prices. The department's core consumer price index jumped 0.3 percent in January -- the largest monthly increase since June. That left core prices 2.7 percent higher than a year earlier.

The higher core inflation resulted primarily from a rapid 0.8 percent increase in medical costs, including prices for prescription drugs, hospital care and visits to physicians' offices.

Food prices rose 0.7 percent in January, the biggest increase since April 2005. Airfare and hotel room rates climbed. Prices also increased for electricity, water, and sewer and trash collection, the department said.

"Inflation is not yet under control," Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group, told clients. "Clearly this is not what the Fed wants to see."

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told Congress last week that the central bank is likely to hold interest rates steady for a while to see whether slowing economic growth nudges inflation lower.

Inflation pressures have eased in recent months, but the monthly figures can jump around, so it will be "some time before we can be confident" that price pressures will continue to ease as the Fed forecast, Bernanke said.

He stressed that inflation remains too high, and Fed policymakers worry that it may climb higher. They are prepared to increase interest rates if necessary to force inflation lower, he said.

Bernanke and his colleagues are unlikely to raise interest rates because of one monthly inflation report but will if they see a series of similar reports in coming months, analysts said.

Fed policymakers forecast inflation to fall this year and next because of slower economic growth, cooled in large part by the slumping housing market. Recent data -- including flat retail sales, lower industrial production and plunging home construction in January -- show the economy is probably growing at a modest pace, around 2 percent a year, analysts said.

The Conference Board, a private business group, said yesterday that its index of leading economic indicators -- data such as building permits, consumer expectations and stock prices that hint at where the economy is heading -- rose slightly last month, by 0.1 percent. Analysts saw that as a sign that economic growth will keep to a modest pace in the months ahead.

Some of the price increases last month reflected temporary factors, such as crop freezes in California that boosted prices for some fruits and vegetables.

But analysts worried that some of the trends in the inflation report are likely to continue. Medical costs, for example, were 4.3 percent higher in January than a year earlier, and inflationary pressures in that sector are expected to continue as the aging U.S. population consumes more health care.

The increase in many food prices reflects federal efforts to encourage the production of ethanol as an alternative fuel, said Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research. Higher demand for ethanol has boosted prices for corn, an ingredient in the fuel's production, as well as for other grains as farmers have shifted resources to produce more corn, he said. Corn is the main source of high-fructose corn syrup, a widely used ingredient in sweetened beverages and processed foods.

Yamarone said overall inflation is contained. But he forecast fuel prices to stay close to where they are now as food prices rise this year.

"You'll see people complaining less about their gasoline bills and more about their grocery bills," he said.

If inflation continues at this pace, workers may also complain about lagging pay. Average weekly earning for most workers fell 0.3 percent in January from the month before after adjusting for inflation, the Labor Department said in a separate report.

These wages, paid to factory and non-managerial workers, were 2.1 percent higher last month than in January 2006, after adjusting for price changes.

Inflation Fears Rise As Price Index Gains 0.2% (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke and his fellow policymakers worried during a meeting last month that inflation might not moderate as expected, a concern at least partially borne out by Wednesday's report that consumer prices rose more than expected in January.

According to newly released minutes of the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, the officials also discussed the possibility of changing an outlook statement closely watched by the markets. The statement for months has cited inflation as the biggest threat to the economy and warned that more interest rate increases could be needed to keep price pressures in check.

In the end, the Fed kept that language, and its bias toward rate increases. While the inflation rate has been lower in some measures, "all meeting participants expressed some concern about the outlook for inflation" and warned that "a failure of inflation to moderate as expected could impair the long-term performance of the economy," the minutes said.

The Fed has kept its target for short-term interest rates unchanged for five consecutive meetings after raising them 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006. The target for short-term rates, which influences borrowing costs economywide, is 5.25%, the highest in six years.

Brian Bethune of Global Insight says recent indicators show economic growth wasn't as rosy as the Fed estimated at last month's meeting. Still, the bump in the consumer price index means the Fed needs to keep a close eye on inflation. He expects rates to be steady for most of 2007.

The Labor Department said inflationary pressures at the consumer level rose in January as higher costs for food and medical care offset lower energy prices.

The CPI rose 0.2% in January following a 0.4% gain in December after adjusting for seasonal variations. Excluding often-volatile food and energy prices, the so-called core CPI rose 0.3% in January. That followed a 0.1% increase in December and was the biggest rise since June.

In the past year, core consumer inflation was 2.7%.

Economists, including central bank officials, pay particular attention to the core rate because it is considered a more reliable indicator of underlying inflation trends. Prices for a wide variety of goods, such as tobacco, hotel stays, clothing and medical care, rose.

Investors sold stocks after the report's release, fearing higher inflation would lead the Fed to raise interest rates in 2007. Some economists, such as those at UBS, said the January CPI increase was more likely because of temporary factors than an indication of a long-term trend. But others, such as those at Bear Stearns and First Trust Advisors, said the report sounded alarms.

"Inflation seems to be contained, but there are some causes for concern," says Richard Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research. "One report does not a trend make," he says. But "Two or three more reports like this, the likelihood of a Fed rate hike increases." The Fed next meets March 20-21.

Fed Remains Cautious On Inflation (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The Federal Reserve grew more confident that inflation was moderating at its January policy meeting, minutes released on Wednesday revealed, but policymakers still did not see a downward trend in core inflation as “definitely established.”

The minutes show that all members of the Federal Open Market Committee agreed that the predominent risk remained inflation rather than growth.

Policymakers were more relaxed about the outlook for both inflation and growth than they had been in December.

However, while they regarded the risks from housing as “notable” they saw a new risk that demand might run too hot, potentially adding to pressure on prices.

US inflation rose faster than expected last month, led by increases in prescription drug prices, according to a separate fresh government figures.

Consumer prices rose 0.2 per cent in January while core inflation - excluding volatile food and energy prices - rose 0.3 per cent, according to the report.

DOJ_NMG_0135322

The inflation increase tempered investor expectations of a rate cut later this year and pushed stocks lower, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling 0.25 per cent to 12,754.51 at the open.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury bonds rose to 4.7 per cent form 4.68 per cent as the market priced in a greater probability that the Fed would keep rates on hold for several months.

The surprisingly strong inflation figures stiffened the dollar, which beat back a brief rally by the yen when the Bank of Japan's policy board raised interest rates for the first time in six months with an increase to 0.5 per cent

Meanwhile, Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said: "The 0.3 per cent gain in the January core CPI ended a three-month sequence of tepid 0.1 per cent readings. The details point to unwinding of unusual recent weakness in a number of categories rather than the start of a trend in the core CPI."

Rising medical costs led the increase and helped offset a sharp fall in oil prices that had helped ease price pressures late last year.

Gasoline prices were 3 per cent lower than the previous month and 32 per cent lower than their peak in July 2006.

Mr Ahmed said: "The January report confirms that the fourth-quarter's sharp moderation in core inflation was partly due to transient factors."

"The future path of core inflation will be determined by the interplay between upward pressures from resource utilisation and unwinding of earlier price shocks," he added.

Global Economy Shrugs Off Oil, Housing Strains (WSJ)

By Yuka Hayashi, Joellen Perry And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The Bank of Japan's move to raise interest rates for the first time since July underscores the surprisingly upbeat state of the world's major economies, which continue to perk along despite the damage done by high energy prices and sagging housing markets.

The world's central bankers are so confident that growth will remain steady and inflation under control that their main worry is less the immediate future than whether conditions are breeding excessive speculation in financial markets.

Yesterday's move by the Bank of Japan reflected that confidence in its own economy as well as the broader world economy. Lifting rates to a still very low 0.5%, the bank said it "judged that our economy is likely to continue its...virtuous circle of production, income and spending," and that "uncertainties over the future course of overseas economies, including that of the United States, are abating."

Indeed, though the U.S. economy has slowed substantially from its torrid pace of a year ago, it has kept growing fast enough to keep unemployment down despite the housing slump. In the 13 countries that use the euro, growth is expected to abate from last year's six-year high but remain well above the sluggish pace of prior years. Data released yesterday show Spain joined Germany and Italy as standouts in the fourth quarter.

Globally, inflation is still low by recent historical standards, though higher than some central bankers would prefer. U.S. consumer prices, excluding food and energy, rose 2.7% over the past 12 months, the government said yesterday. Oil prices are off their peaks. Global stock markets are buoyant. (See related article.3)

"It's a pretty benign picture," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at U.S. forecaster Global Insight. "You've got at least moderate growth and inflation that looks for the moment like it's not out of control." The biggest risk he sees: too much of a good thing -- namely, a global economy so robust that it pushes up prices and prompts the U.S. and European central banks to boost interest rates.

Despite the rise of China, the U.S., Japan and Europe account for more than 70% of the global economy, according to J.P. Morgan Chase economists.

Central bankers' latest concern is that investors are underpricing risk, and bidding up prices of assets from corporate bonds to houses and in the process driving down returns on those assets, such as long-term interest rates. While for now that fosters global growth, some policy makers worry this can't last, and that an abrupt reversal in market perceptions about risk could trigger a drop in asset prices as investors pull back that could threaten growth.

Concerns about excessive risk-taking are being aired more frequently. "We want markets to be aware of the risks in one-way bets in general," European Central Bank President Jean-Claude Trichet said after meeting with his counterparts from other banks earlier this month. "We, in particular, think of carry trades" -- borrowing in countries like Japan with low rates to invest at higher rates in Europe and the U.S. -- "but not only carry trades."

Mr. Trichet and other policy makers also have expressed concern about a herd mentality in markets, possibly exacerbated by hedge funds piling onto similar trades, increasing the potential for excessive loss if the bets go bad.

Most central bankers remain more inclined to deem complacency a risk than a reason to raise rates. But in Tokyo, while attributing yesterday's rate increase primarily to confidence in the Japanese economy, Bank of Japan officials expressed concern that persistently low interest rates could fuel the carry trade, distorting markets in ways that could produce convulsive impacts on currencies, interest rates and global growth.

The BOJ governor, Toshihiko Fukui, said at a news conference that "extremely distorted movements in the financial market," including the yen carry trade, could "eventually have a negative impact on the real economy and prices." The central bank wanted to squelch expectations that Japanese rates would stay so low for very long in order to discourage investors from taking "extreme positions," he said.

U.S. Federal Reserve officials offer differing interpretations of markets' recent calm. Chairman Ben Bernanke attributes much to fundamental factors, such as emerging countries' funneling plentiful savings to the U.S. But Vice Chairman Donald Kohn sees more cause for worry.

"It would be imprudent to rule out sharp movements in asset prices and deterioration in market liquidity that would test the resiliency of market infrastructure and financial institutions," Mr. Kohn said in a speech in Washington.

Afterward, Mr. Kohn said markets are currently priced for "a very benign situation....I do get a little concerned -- or I wonder maybe -- at some of the low levels of volatility and the low levels of expected volatility."

Fed officials generally don't see market speculation as a reason to tighten monetary policy, or even keep it tight. Rather, they have cited the lack of spare economic capacity and an elevated inflation rate as a reason to maintain short-term interest rates at 5.25%, with a bias to raising them further.

Minutes from the Fed's Jan. 30-31 meeting, released yesterday after the customary lag, indicate that Fed officials had become less worried about the prospect for both growth and inflation. Data show "somewhat smaller risks to economic growth as well as improved prospects for core inflation," the minutes said.

Data released since that meeting show retail sales, housing starts and industrial production all weakened in January, and the strong fourth-quarter growth number, 3.5%, is likely to be revised down substantially next week. If unemployment also starts to edge higher, as Fed officials expect, they may begin to signal more concern about slowing growth and less about rising inflation in coming months. The minutes suggest there was more debate than usual in January about whether to continue saying inflation risks might yet require higher interest rates, as the Fed statement ultimately did.

In the European economy, recent surprises have nearly all been on the upside lately. "The euro area really surprised on all levels late last year, weathering both a downturn in demand from the U.S. and a rise in the euro, and we expect the positive momentum to continue this year," says Julian Callow, chief European economist with Barclays Capital in London. Exports remain the 13-nation bloc's mainstay, but the labor market is also improving and that could bolster consumer spending. The number of people at work in Germany, which has the region's largest economy, reached a five-year high in 2006.

Despite signs that this year's growth won't match last year's, the signs of strength are likely to push the ECB to raise interest rates this year, with many analysts predicting a boost to 4% by June from today's 3.5%.

Political uncertainty is a risk, as well, with the surprise resignation yesterday of Italian Premier Romano Prodi, elections approaching in France, and Britain facing a change in leadership as well. (See related article.4)

Yesterday's move in Tokyo was the first since the BOJ in July ended its five-year-old stance of keeping its benchmark rate at zero, an emergency measure taken to nurse Japan out of a long period of low growth and falling prices. Prices are hardly rising, today. Japan's core consumer-price index -- which excludes volatile fresh-food prices but includes energy -- rose just 0.1% in December from a year earlier. Economists think the index could fall over the next several months because of declines in oil prices.

The Japanese economy surged at an annualized growth rate of 4.8% in the final three months of 2006. But economists say much of that was due to an unsustainable bounce-back of consumer spending after six months of very slow growth.

Stocks Brush Off Inflation Data, Crude's Rise (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay And Craig Karmin

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

The stock market reacted with little more than a shrug -- with the Dow down and the Nasdaq up -- as crude oil topped $60 a barrel for the first time this year and investors fretted about monetary policy in the U.S. and Japan.

The Bank of Japan raised its key interest-rate target a quarter percentage point, to 0.5%, a move that will increase borrowing costs there and could discourage investment, including in U.S. shares. (See related article1.)

DOJ_NMG_0135324

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 48.23 points, or 0.4%, to 12738.41, ending five days of gains. It is up 2.2% on the year.

In the U.S., fresh inflation data from the Labor Department showed bigger increases in consumer prices in January than Wall Street expected. Analysts interpreted the report as a sign interest-rate cuts by the Federal Reserve aren't imminent, contrary to some investors' hopes.

"If [Fed policy makers] are going to err, they're going to err on the side of keeping inflation under control," said Gordon Fowler, chief investment officer at Philadelphia money-management firm Glenmede Trust.

That would likely mean holding rates steady awhile longer, Mr. Fowler said, perhaps well into the second half. In turn, that could mean little or no "cheap money" flooding into the stock market from investors benefiting from reduced borrowing costs.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 2.05 points, to 1457.63, up 2.8% on the year. But the technology-focused Nasdaq Composite Index edged up 0.2%, or 5.38 points, to 2518.42, up 4.3% on the year.

Refinery and pipeline problems pushed crude-oil futures for April delivery up $1.22, or 2.1%, to $60.07 a barrel, its first close above $60 this year. Still, oil is off 1.6% this year at the New York Mercantile Exchange and down 22% from its record in July.

In currency markets, the Bank of Japan's decision failed to lift the yen, as traders said a popular financial maneuver, known as the carry trade, remained intact. The carry trade involves borrowing money in a country with low interest rates and putting that money into countries that pay higher rates. Because Japanese rates have long hovered around zero, the yen has been particularly popular for borrowing in this kind of trade.

If Japanese rates continue rising, as expected, many fear the carry trade could unwind rapidly, rattling currency and bond markets world-wide. Financial markets in countries with higher rates, from New Zealand to Iceland, could be particularly vulnerable.

Because Japanese rates remain so low, analysts were quick to dismiss the move by the Bank of Japan as an immediate threat to the carry trade. Also, Japanese officials suggested that any further rate increases will come gradually.

"It's going to take more than that to upset the carry trade," said Adnan Akant, a currency specialist at New York money manager Fischer Francis Trees & Watts.

The yen fell against the dollar to 120.88 yen compared with 119.99 yen, touching one-week lows against the U.S. currency during the trading session.

Outside the U.S., stocks fell in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, fell 0.5%, or 1.20 points, to 252.44.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed2 and bond prices fell3. The 10-year note fell 3/32 point, or 93.8 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.692%. The 30-year bond fell 5/32 to yield 4.790%.

The dollar strengthened4. In addition to the gain on the yen, the euro was steady at $1.3139.

McCain Slams Bush On Global Warming, Iraq Policy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

The Arizona senator criticizes White House decision-making during a tour of the L.A. and Long Beach ports.

Republican presidential candidate John McCain was anything but subtle Wednesday as he took swipes at the Bush administration during a meticulously staged appearance with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on the bustling docks of Los Angeles Harbor.

President Bush's record on global warming? "Terrible," McCain declared. His pursuit of the Iraq war? "A train wreck."

If the point of the Arizona senator's visit was to put distance between himself and his party's unpopular president, McCain was following a pattern set by Schwarzenegger in his reelection campaign. For McCain, the task is especially important because his vocal support for Bush's recent troop buildup in Iraq threatens a voter backlash.

In what was billed as a nonpolitical event to call for tougher federal action to stop global warming, McCain joined Schwarzenegger for a hazy morning helicopter tour of the Long Beach and Los Angeles ports. The Republican duo flew over the future site of a hydrogen power plant that would pump carbon dioxide into the ground instead of the air.

Later, standing side by side amid the roar of engines as cranes hoisted cargo containers onto ships and trucks, Schwarzenegger lavished praise on McCain ("a great, great senator, a great national leader"), raising the question of whether he supports him for president.

All signs to the contrary, Schwarzenegger said, "We're not doing presidential politics here" — but not before McCain wisecracked: "I think it's the endorsement, yes."

DOJ_NMG_0135325

One of McCain's chief Republican rivals, Rudolph W. Giuliani, had to settle recently for a private steak dinner and cigars with Schwarzenegger in the governor's Sacramento hotel suite.

But on the San Pedro docks, Schwarzenegger offered McCain access to his usual retinue of trailing TV crews, and McCain used the opportunity to pound Bush on a number of fronts.

"I would assess this administration's record on global warming as terrible," McCain said, recalling that he got "no cooperation from the administration" at Senate hearings on the subject. He pronounced himself "very happy to see the president mention global warming and a renewed commitment from the administration to this issue." But he added tartly: "It's long overdue."

(White House spokesman Tony Fratto declined to respond directly to McCain but said Bush had "set an ambitious goal for our nation to cut greenhouse gas emissions, and we're meeting it.")

Asked about the scathing remarks he has made on the administration's conduct of the war, McCain said his criticism started three years ago "when I saw that this train wreck was taking place, and that we needed more troops, and we needed a different strategy."

As the campaign has heated up in recent weeks, McCain has repeatedly criticized the administration.

In South Carolina on Monday, McCain said former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would "go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history." ("I stand by my comment about Secretary Rumsfeld," he responded to a question on that topic in San Pedro.) In an interview last month with a politico.com columnist, McCain said that Bush had been "very badly served" by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney, who shot back Wednesday.

"I just fundamentally disagree with John," Cheney told ABC News. "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

Cheney praised Rumsfeld for doing a "superb job."

"He and John McCain had a number of dust-ups over policy," Cheney said. "Didn't have anything to do with Iraq — other issues that were involved. John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong."

McCain, whose campaign spokesman, Danny Diaz, declined to respond to Cheney's comments, was not entirely acidic toward the Bush White House at his harbor stop with Schwarzenegger. He said he was still "strongly supporting" Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops to U.S. forces in Iraq, a stand that could cost McCain support among the independents and moderates who are crucial parts of his political base.

As for the fight against global warming, an effort that Schwarzenegger made a centerpiece of his reelection campaign, McCain portrayed California as a model for Congress to take action. He voiced support for the kind of mandatory reductions in carbon emissions that California enacted last year.

"I'm here," he said, "because I think that California leads the nation, and we all know that in many respects — much to the dismay sometimes of us in Arizona, particularly when it comes to the theft of Arizona's water."

Schwarzenegger Lavishly Praises McCain (AP)

By Michael R. Blood, Ap Political Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger offered his most lavish praise yet Wednesday for any 2008 presidential candidate, calling John McCain a "great senator" and "very good friend" who shared his views on critical issues like the environment.

The celebrity governor stopped short of a formal declaration of support for McCain's budding candidacy, but their appearance together in the Port of Los Angeles was a strong reminder that the two maverick Republicans share a well-developed friendship.

The Arizona senator joked that he was endorsed by Schwarzenegger. Then Schwarzenegger said their joint appearance wasn't about politics.

"We share common philosophy and goals for this country," McCain noted.

The governor called McCain a "great, great leader

Coming off a decisive re-election in November, the governor appears eager to assume a more prominent role in national affairs. His push to move California's presidential primary to Feb. 5 from June could give the state — and by association him — much greater influence in the 2008 presidential sweepstakes.

With McCain at his side, Schwarzenegger called for a national low-carbon fuel standard for transportation fuels, similar to standards in California intended to make fuel burn cleaner. It wasn't clear how such a standard would be put in place, or if it would become a centerpiece of McCain's nascent campaign.

"I know that Senator McCain sees the value of bringing to Washington the same kind of programs that we have put into place right here in California," Schwarzenegger said.

DOJ_NMG_0135326

The senator and Schwarzenegger have shared a bond going back years. McCain has headlined fundraisers for Schwarzenegger in California, and they've campaigned together. The governor's 2006 campaign manager is now a senior adviser to McCain's campaign.

GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-cut Pledge (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The two front-runners for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani -- have not signed an anti-tax-increase pledge that has been embraced by several of their rivals.

The reluctance of the party's two leading candidates to sign the pledge, which has been signed by every Republican presidential nominee since 1988, raised concerns among conservative tax cutters about Mr. McCain's and Mr. Giuliani's commitment to reduce tax rates at a time when all of the Democratic presidential contenders have vowed to raise income taxes if they are elected.

"I can't imagine that McCain wouldn't sign it or that Giuliani wouldn't sign it. I can't imagine any Republican not signing that," said Jack Kemp, architect of the tax cuts signed by President Reagan in the 1980s.

The pledge, which asks the candidates to sign a statement declaring they will "oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates," could become an issue for both men as they vie for the support of their party's economic conservatives -- especially for Mr. McCain who was a foe of President Bush's tax cuts until he began actively running for president last year.

The Arizona senator, who has been aggressively reaching out to the conservative base of his party to secure the nomination, was one of only two Republicans who voted against Mr. Bush's $1.35 trillion across-the-board tax cuts in 2001. He also opposed accelerating the tax cuts in 2003, but changed his mind last year and voted to extend the tax cuts, including those on stock dividends and capital gains.

Mr. Giuliani has yet to fully set forth his views on tax policy, but, like Mr. McCain, has said that the Bush tax cuts, most of which are due to expire in 2010, should be made permanent.

"Senator McCain has over a 20-year record of opposing tax increases and the senator's record speaks for itself," said Danny Diaz, chief spokesman for the McCain campaign.

"The senator supports making the tax cuts permanent. There has been no stronger voice in Washington, D.C., for fiscal discipline," Mr. Diaz said.

But when asked if the senator would or would not sign the pledge never to raise tax rates if he should become president, he replied, "no comment."

A spokesman for Mr. Giuliani yesterday also declined to say whether the former mayor, who leads Mr. McCain in many voter preference polls, intended to sign the pledge.

"Mayor Giuliani has a strong record of cutting taxes" in New York, said Maria Comella, deputy communications director for the Giuliani campaign. When asked directly if he will sign the pledge, she replied, "His record speaks for itself."

The pledge is a written document that has been circulated among Republican candidates since 1986 by Americans for Tax Reform (ATR), a tax-cut advocacy group that has been an influential force in the tax-cut battles of the past two decades. Every Republican presidential nominee since then has signed it, making it a ritual threshold for candidates to demonstrate their opposition to higher taxes.

Grover Norquist, president of ATR, said yesterday that the pledge has been signed by several Republican presidential contenders, including former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, and former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III.

"In my conversations with each of the campaigns, it is my expectation that before the summer's out all of the Republicans running for president will have signed the pledge," Mr. Norquist said last night.

Mr. Romney, who has made his economic conservatism the centerpiece of his campaign, signed the pledge on Dec. 31, a few days before he left the governorship.

Those who have not signed it, besides the two front-runners, include Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel (who has signed previously as a senator) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

"McCain has signed it in the past and I assume he will sign it again, and I expect Mr. Giuliani to sign it," Mr. Norquist said.

Some Republican tax cutters expressed dismay yesterday that neither of the two front-runners had signed the pledge at this point in the two-year election cycle.

"I can't imagine why they wouldn't sign a statement against raising the tax rates. Someone might not want to bind themselves down to any tax increases, on cigarettes or something like that, but this says tax rates," Mr. Kemp said.

DOJ_NMG_0135327

"I'd sign it, but I'm not running. But the bigger issues are reforming the tax code to make it simpler and more efficient and bringing the tax rates down for maximum economic growth," he said.

So You Want To Run ... (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

I want you to know I've shelved the idea of writing a book called "The Idiot's Guide to Winning the Republican Presidential Nomination." But that doesn't mean I don't have ideas. Here are a few rules the G.O.P. contenders should follow if they want to sweep this thing.

First: Be the Snowball. The conventional view is that Feb. 5 is going to be the decisive day of the race, when California, New Jersey, Illinois and a bunch of other states will probably have their primaries. That's wrong.

Since so many states will be voting then, the candidates will be stretched thin in all of them. As a result, the Republican candidate who does best in the first three states — Iowa, New Hampshire and, on Feb. 2, South Carolina — will sweep on Feb. 5 through sheer momentum.

You want to be that snowball rolling downhill. Focus your efforts on the first three, especially New Hampshire. Win those, and the big states will take care of themselves.

Second: Remember the Rule of Three. When three big candidates go up against one another, two of them often get into a mutually destructive grudge match and the third skates through to victory. (Right now, the McCain and Romney camps seem set to brawl, leaving Giuliani alone.) Whatever you do, don't let yourself become one of the duelists.

Third: Don't Be a University. Most campaigns organize their policy experts like academic departments — economists on one committee, social policy types on another, religious leaders on a third. They come up with utterly conventional recommendations.

You want to organize your committees according to priorities. For example, create a Flourishing Families Committee. Get economists, religious activists and psychologists in one room to figure out how government can reduce stress on struggling families. You'll be surprised by how much interdisciplinary creativity you can unleash and how much closer you get to the problems of real people.

Most of all, you'll break free from the useless categories most pundits use to define Republicans: social conservative, free market libertarian, neoconservative. If you define yourself by those categories, you're dead.

Fourth: Be the Change. You are running to lead a traumatized party. Many Republicans think their party can recover from recent setbacks by returning to the old verities: cutting spending, cutting taxes, attacking government bureaucrats.

That's wrong. The world has changed since the glory days of the 1980s, and no amount of Reagan nostalgia will bring those conditions back.

For example, Republicans in the 1980s could win by promising to expand freedom and reduce overbearing government. But today, post-9/11, most Americans aren't anxious because their freedoms are being impinged. They're anxious because there's chaos all around: foreign policy chaos, fiscal chaos, cultural chaos. The authority structures they rely on have let them down.

You need to lead the party to a new definition of Republicanism. This is a Republicanism that can provide safety, order and authority, so people can feel secure enough to pursue their dreams. This doesn't mean championing a big government. It means championing a strong government that can do the jobs it is supposed to do.

Your main job over the next few months is to come up with a governing philosophy that explains how individual freedom can be enhanced by a strong, limited and energetic federal government.

Fifth: Make an Offer They Can't Refuse. If your last name is Giuliani, McCain or Romney, social conservatives are never going to love you. Don't try to pander to gain their devotion. Instead, offer them a deal.

Tell them: You social conservatives may not agree with me on everything. You may doubt my recent conversions on your issues. You may not even like me. But I'm the guy who can deliver on four programs you want. Then pick out four programs you and they can agree on and repeat them in every speech for the next year.

Sixth: Get Ready for Phase II. Over the next several months, the surge in Iraq will dominate debate. But by late summer, the surge will either have succeeded or failed. A new, broader debate will start. One candidate will define the landscape by coming up with a new Grand Strategy for the war against extremism. Be that guy.

Seventh: Win the T.R. Primary. Many of you admire Theodore Roosevelt. You've got his picture on your walls. Every day, as the campaign madness swirls around, wake up and ask, Would T.R. be proud of what I'm doing? If not, take a risk. Do something else.

Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Hillary is not David Geffen's dreamgirl.

"Whoever is the nominee is going to win, so the stakes are very high," says Mr. Geffen, the Hollywood mogul and sultan of "Dreamgirls," as he sits by a crackling fire beneath a Jasper Johns flag and a matched pair of de Koonings in the house that Jack Warner built (which old-time Hollywood stars joked was the house that God would have built). "Not since the Vietnam War has there been this level of disappointment in the behavior of America throughout the world, and I don't think that another incredibly polarizing figure, no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is — and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? — can bring the country together.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family. Americans are dying every day in Iraq. And I'm tired of hearing James Carville on television."

Barack Obama has made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles.

She didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going." But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed.

"Hillary is livid that Obama's getting the first big fund-raiser here," one friend of hers said.

Who can pay attention to the Oscar battle between "The Queen" and "Dreamgirls" when you've got a political battle between a Queen and a Dreamboy?

Terry McAuliffe and First Groupie Bill have tried to hoard the best A.T.M. machine in politics for the Missus, but there's some Clinton fatigue among fatigued Clinton donors, who fret that Bill will "pull the focus" and shelve his wife's campaign.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Mr. Geffen says, adding that if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it. "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

She is overproduced and overscripted. "It's not a very big thing to say, 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Mr. Geffen says. "She's so advised by so many smart advisers who are covering every base. I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms."

The babble here is not about "Babel"; it's about the battle of the billionaires. Not only have Ron Burkle and David Geffen been vying to buy The Los Angeles Times — they have been vying to raise money for competing candidates. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket magnate, is close to the Clintons, and is helping Hillary parry Barry Obama by arranging a fund-raiser for her in March, with a contribution from Mr. Spielberg.

Did Mr. Spielberg get in trouble with the Clintons for helping Senator Obama? "Yes," Mr. Geffen replies, slyly. Can Obambi stand up to Clinton Inc.? "I hope so," he says, "because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective."

Once, David Geffen and Bill Clinton were tight as ticks. Mr. Geffen helped raise some $18 million for Bill and slept in the Lincoln Bedroom twice. Bill chilled at Chateau Geffen. Now, the Dreamworks co-chairman calls the former president "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country."

They fell out in 2000, when Mr. Clinton gave a pardon to Marc Rich after rebuffing Mr. Geffen's request for one for Leonard Peltier. "Marc Rich getting pardoned? An oil-profiteer expatriate who left the country rather than pay taxes or face justice?" Mr. Geffen says. "Yet another time when the Clintons were unwilling to stand for the things that they genuinely believe in. Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The mogul knows it's easy to mock Hollywood — "people with Priuses and private planes" — and agrees with George Clooney that it's probably not helpful for stars to campaign for candidates, given the caricatures of Hollywood.

I ask what he will say if he ever runs into Bill Clinton again. " 'Hi,' " he replies. And will he be upset if Hillary wins and he never gets to sleep in the Lincoln Bedroom again?

"No," he says with a puckish smile. "It's not as nice as my bedroom."

Obama, Clinton Rivalry Flares Over Donor (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Brendan Riley

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135329

The rival presidential campaigns of Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama traded accusations of nasty politics Wednesday over Hollywood donor David Geffen, who once backed Bill Clinton but now supports his wife's top rival.

The Clinton campaign demanded that Obama denounce comments made by the DreamWorks movie studio founder, who told New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd in Wednesday's editions that while "everybody in politics lies," the former president and his wife "do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The Clinton camp also called on Obama to give back Geffen's $2,300 contribution.

Campaigning in Iowa, Obama refused.

"It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," the Illinois senator said.

For her part, New York Sen. Clinton sidestepped questions, leaving the issue to her aides to discuss.

"I'm just going to stay focused on my campaign and I'm going to run a positive campaign about the issues that affect the people in our country," she told The Associated Press in an interview in Nevada. She was participating a candidate forum in Carson City.

The Clinton team seemed eager to continue the attack. With Obama in Iowa, aides arranged for former Iowa attorney general Bonnie Campbell to criticize him in a conference call with reporters.

In the newspaper interview, Geffen also said Bill Clinton is "a reckless guy" and he does not think Hillary Clinton can bring the country together during a time of war, no matter how smart or ambitious she is.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs added another criticism of Clinton.

"It is also ironic that Senator Clinton lavished praise on Monday and is fully willing to accept today the support of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who said if Barack Obama were to win the nomination, he would drag down the rest of the Democratic Party because 'he's black,'" Gibbs' statement said.

Ford later apologized. The Clinton campaign said it disagreed with Ford, but the senator has embraced his support.

Another Democratic presidential candidate, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, said at the candidate forum that Obama should denounce Geffen's comments. "We Democrats should all sign a pledge that we all be positive," Richardson said.

Obama Dismisses Clinton Campaign Complaint (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 22, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, in Iowa today, responded to criticism from fellow senator and candidate Hillary Clinton's campaign that he's engaged in "slash and burn" politics.

Obama dismissed the Clinton campaign's demand that he apologize for remarks made by a Hollywood financial supporter who strongly criticized Clinton.

Obama said he "can't be responsible for the statements of every individual" and said voters and candidates alike have more pressing issues that deserve focus.

"My suspicion is that the voters in Iowa are more concerned about what both myself and Senator Clinton think about Iraq," Obama, a U.S. senator from Illinois, said.

Obama met with reporters at the state Capitol this afternoon prior to a scheduled town hall meeting tonight at the Polk County Convention Center. The event was expected to draw thousands of people. He also attended a private meeting with Iowa House and Senate Democrats.

Clinton's staff complained today about remarks by Los Angeles media mogul and former Clinton supporter David Geffen, who now supports Obama. "Everybody in politics lies, but they (the Clintons) do it with such ease, it's troubling," Geffen said in a New York Times column by Maureen Dowd.

Clinton's campaign demanded that Obama denounce Geffen's remarks and return donations he had made to the campaign.

"I think what's so surprising and disappointing is that Senator Obama has a discussion with the people of Iowa and America about the politics of hope and the need to change the tone of politics in this country," former Iowa attorney general

Bonnie Campbell, a senior campaign strategist for Clinton, said. " I find it inconsistent that he would not distance himself from what was clearly a personal attack on

Senator Clinton and the Clinton presidency, for that matter."

Although his campaign issued a response shortly after Clinton's statement, Obama said he had only heard of the comments upon getting off his plane in Des Moines.

"It's not clear to me, why would I be apologizing for someone else's remarks? I confess that I haven't read the whole article. My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have problems with the Clintons, but that doesn't affect this campaign," he said.

"I've said repeatedly I have the utmost respect for Senator Clinton. I consider her an ally in the Senate, and I will continue to consider her in that way throughout this campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0135330

Other Democratic presidential candidates and their staffs have already weighed in on the issue. Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said, in a statement, “The Democratic Party doesn’t have time for this kind of negative politics. David Geffen should apologize today for his statements about Bill and Hillary Clinton … The country doesn’t want to go down this road of personal insults.”

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson called for a positive campaign pledge. “We Democrats should sign a pledge that we are going to be positive. That is what the American people want and that is how we’re going to win it,” he said.

Today marked Obama’s second visit to Iowa in as many weeks. Obama chose the Iowa event over a Carson City, Nev., forum sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

Obama cited a tight schedule as the reason he was unable to attend the Nevada forum.

“We were interested in campaigning here in Iowa; we had already started scheduling some things,” he said. “I have a slight disadvantage, as some of my other Senate colleagues do in terms of not having that many days … and we thought it was more important to be here in Iowa.”

Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

An increasingly acrimonious competition between Sens. Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton to enlist the Democratic Party's leading fundraisers and operatives burst into the open yesterday, overshadowing what was billed as the presidential campaign's first gathering of candidates in Nevada.

While Clinton (N.Y.) and Obama (Ill.) have not for the most part taken their competition public, their campaigns in recent weeks have been trumpeting each victory, such as the recruitment of a major Boston-based rainmaker by Obama and a prominent African American state senator from South Carolina by Clinton.

The back-and-forth between the two campaigns has largely been fodder for political insiders. Yesterday, however, David Geffen, the music and film producer who is one of the party's most prominent donors, made the fight more public. In an interview with New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Geffen said that Clinton is "the easiest to beat" of the Democratic field and skewered her unwillingness to apologize for her 2002 vote to use force in Iraq. "It's not a very big thing to say 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Geffen said.

Geffen, who was a co-host of an Obama fundraiser Tuesday night in Los Angeles, saved even sharper criticism for former president Bill Clinton, to whom he was close before a falling-out over the pardoning of financier Marc Rich at the end of Clinton's second term. "I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Geffen said in an oblique reference to questions surrounding the former president's private life.

After seeing the comments yesterday morning, the Clinton campaign immediately issued a call for Obama to disavow Geffen's remarks and return his $2,300 donation, arguing that they were contrary to Obama's pledge to run a positive campaign.

"A day after Barack Obama goes out and eschews the politics of slash-and-burn, his campaign embraces the politics of trash," said Phil Singer, Clinton's deputy communications director, referring to a speech Obama made Tuesday in Las Vegas.

Obama communications director Robert Gibbs took a markedly different course. After refusing to get in the "middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," Gibbs pointed out that Hillary Clinton had recently praised Robert Ford, another South Carolina state senator who endorsed her and said the Democratic ticket would be in serious trouble if Obama was the nominee because of the color of his skin. Clinton distanced herself from that remark, and Ford later apologized for it.

Obama weighed in later. "It's not clear to me why I would be apologizing for someone else's remarks," he said in Iowa, where he had gone instead of the candidates forum because of a prior commitment. "My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have differences with the Clintons, but that doesn't really have anything to do with our campaign."

At the forum in Carson City, Nev., ABC's George Stephanopoulos, the moderator, asked Clinton whether she agreed with her campaign spokesman that Obama should disavow Geffen's comments.

Clinton did not answer directly. "I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said. "I think we should stay focused on what we're going to do for America." She then added, to applause: "And, you know, I believe Bill Clinton was a good president. I'm very proud of the record of his two terms."

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson sided with Clinton and called on Obama to denounce Geffen's comments. "I think these name-callings are not good," he said. "I don't know Mr. Geffen. I don't know what was said. . . . But we don't need that. We Democrats should sign a pledge that we all be positive. That's what the American people want."

While her campaign was on the attack against Obama, Clinton found herself on the defensive once more over Iraq. She was challenged again to explain her vote for the 2002 resolution authorizing the war and her reluctance to call that vote a mistake or to express regret for it.

"My vote was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances that I had at the time," Clinton said. "And I have taken responsibility for my votes and I believe that none of us should get a free pass. It is us up to the voters to judge what each of us has said and done."

Yesterday's forum was sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME). In addition to Clinton and Richardson, participants included Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, former senator John Edwards (N.C.), Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (Ohio) and former senator Mike Gravel (Alaska).

The forum highlighted the West's emerging role as a significant player in the Democratic nomination process. Nevada is scheduled to hold its caucuses five days after the Iowa caucuses, the second contest on the 2008 Democratic calendar.

AFSCME President Gerald McEntee said the union hopes to endorse one of the Democrats before the primary elections. But he said the process will be slower, given the union's experience of having endorsed Howard Dean four years ago, only to see his campaign implode.

Iraq and health care dominated the forum. Vilsack offered the clearest call for Congress to stop funding the Iraq war and bring the troops home. But Biden warned that hasty withdrawal could leave the region in chaos. "People say just get out," he said. "Everybody wants to get out, no one faster than I want to get out. But if that civil war metastasizes into a regional war, we're going to be sending your grandchildren back."

Dodd was asked whether Clinton should apologize for her vote on the war. "Senator Clinton will speak for herself," he said, adding: "When you've made a mistake, there's nothing wrong with admitting that, in my view. . . . It was a mistake, in my view, to vote the way we did five years ago on that resolution."

Edwards, who also supported the authorization of the war, issued what sounded like a clear challenge to the New York senator to say she is sorry for her vote.

"We need a leader who will be open and honest with you and with the American people," he said. "Who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake, who will take responsibility when they've made a mistake."

Asked whether what Clinton had said about her vote was inadequate, he replied, "Whether it's good enough is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge."

Clinton, Obama, Come Out Swinging (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- One day after Sen. Barack Obama made a glittery statement with a Hollywood fundraiser that brought in an impressive $1.3 million, the top two Democratic presidential contenders went after each other in the first big food fight of the 2008 presidential election.

It started when David Geffen slammed Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York in remarks published Wednesday morning, accusing the presidential candidate of lying with "such ease" compared to other politicians, dismissing her husband, former President Bill Clinton, as "reckless," and blasting the Clinton "machine." Geffen, a powerful Hollywood producer and executive, was once a major Clinton supporter but has switched to Obama and was a host of Tuesday's bash.

The Clinton campaign, perhaps stung by Obama's successful incursion into Hollywood, which at one time was unchallenged Clinton country, hit back hard, saying Geffen's comments contrasted poorly with the Illinois senator's self-promotion as a new breed of politician, unifying and optimistic.

"If Sen. Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson. "While Democrats should engage in a vigorous debate on the issues, there is no place in our party or our politics for the kind of personal insults made by Sen. Obama's principal fundraiser."

The Clintons have long been known for skilled, aggressive political infighting, and Geffen's comments provided a way for the Clinton campaign to test how Obama, relatively new to the national stage, would take a punch. It also was the first of what will no doubt be many attempts by rivals to knock the halo off Obama's head.

The Obama camp—eager to show that it knew how to handle criticism and could stand up to an experienced political warrior like Clinton—issued a biting statement.

DOJ_NMG_0135332

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," said Obama communications director Robert Gibbs. "It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom."

Obama also took the opportunity to go on offense, suggesting that Clinton was being hypocritical, since she had not disavowed the recent comments of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford. Ford, who has endorsed Clinton, said last week that if Obama were the Democratic nominee, "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose, because he's black and he's top of the ticket. We'd lose the House and the Senate and the governors and everything."

Gibbs said Wednesday that it is "ironic" that Clinton has praised Ford and accepted his support.

If both candidates had reasons for engaging in what might seem like a minor squabble, the spectacle of Clinton and Obama duking it out so early in the campaign was nonetheless striking. It was the sort of rat-a-tat-tat political spat that usually breaks out in the snowy cold of New Hampshire in the critical days before the nation's first presidential primary, rather than 11 months before that contest and almost two years before the 2008 election.

Geffen interview sparked spat

What ignited the battle of words was an interview with Geffen in Wednesday's New York Times by columnist Maureen Dowd, in which Geffen portrayed himself as disenchanted with both Clintons, their failure to always stand firm on principle and their style of political battle. "Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said.

He called Bill Clinton "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country." Geffen slammed Hillary Clinton for refusing to apologize for her vote to authorize the Iraq war. "It's not a very big thing to say, 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Geffen said.

Asked if Obama would be able to stand up to the Clinton machine, Geffen said, "I hope so, because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective."

This rhetorical eruption came one day after Geffen—along with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, his partners in DreamWorks SKG—hosted a $2,300-per-person fundraiser for Obama at the Beverly Hilton, site of the glitzy Golden Globe Awards.

There was no red carpet, but stars of the entertainment world showed up in packs. Flashes popped in the hotel lobby as tourists spotted stars like Jennifer Aniston. She walked past purposefully, though she tossed her hair, turned and smiled when a fan with a digital camera yelled her name.

An all-star cast

Actors Ben Stiller, Eddie Murphy, Morgan Freeman, and Christine Lahti also showed up. Singers Jackson Browne and the Dixie Chicks' Natalie Maines were there. And so were producers Norman Lear, Ron Howard, Lawrence Bender, producer of Al Gore's "An Inconvenient Truth," and J.J. Abrams. The heads of several major studios also attended.

Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington bought tickets but did not show up.

Despite the star power, the event was a low-key affair. No cameras were permitted inside the fundraiser, which drew 300 guests and raised about $1.3 million, according to Katzenberg. Hotel security guards ejected camera crews and ushered out several reporters who had not registered as guests, explaining that they were acting on instructions from the organizers.

Barack, Hillary Trade Body Blows (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. -- The Battle of Beverly Hills has begun.

Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama traded their first body blows Wednesday after Obama backer and Hollywood media titan David Geffen accused the Clintons of lying, recklessness and trying to establish an American monarchy.

The fight was waged through a series of heated e-mails from both campaigns Wednesday -- in which Clinton's top spokesman accused Obama of being a "slash & burn" politician and Obama's staff slammed the Clintons for using the Lincoln Bedroom as a cash register in the 1990s.

It hit a crescendo during a Democratic presidential candidates forum here Wednesday, when Clinton suggested that Obama and his campaign were engaging "in the politics of personal destruction."

Later, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Bill Clinton's former UN ambassador, agreed, calling on the Illinois senator to apologize.

The fracas began on Tuesday night, when Geffen, a media billionaire who was once a major Clinton moneyman, co-hosted a $1.3 million fundraiser with his DreamWorks partners and Clinton boosters Jeffrey Katzenberg and Steven Spielberg, who is hosting a Clinton fundraiser next month. Geffen also invited New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd to his Beverly Hills mansion to extol Obama and trash the Clintons.

DOJ_NMG_0135333

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family," Dowd wrote in her column Wendesday, quoting Geffen, who unsuccessfully lobbied Bill Clinton to pardon convicted murderer Leonard Peltier in 2000.

Geffen went on to say Republicans are rooting for Clinton because "they believe she's the easiest to defeat," adding that the country was better served by bosses in "smoke-filled rooms" than by Clinton's pollsters and high-priced advisers.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said of the Clintons.

The remarks largely upstaged the first forum of the 2008 primary, which Obama skipped for his West Coast swing.

The forum candidates were each interviewed separately here, with Clinton pledging to enact universal health care for all Americans by the end of a second term in the White House.

Former vice presidential candidate John Edwards criticized her approach, saying, "Anybody who comes into your state and tells you that they have a universal health care plan but they don't have a revenue source ... they might have a bridge in Brooklyn to sell you, too."

When moderator George Stephanopolous asked Clinton if Obama should renounce Geffen, she replied, "I sure don't want Democrats and supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of the personal destruction. And I believe Bill Clinton was a good president."

She left the heavy hitting to her spokesman Howard Wolfson, who said earlier, "While Senator Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics ... was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband."

Added Wolfson: "If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money."

Campaigning in Iowa, Obama told the Associated Press, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," he said.

His spokesman Robert Gibbs said, "It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping in the Lincoln Bedroom."

Later, Geffen released a statement saying Obama had no reason to apologize because he held no official position with the campaign. The anti-Clinton tirade, he said, "reflect solely my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons."

An Insult From A Hollywood Money Man Sets Off A Democratic Feud (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. - What's a million dollars and a little back-stabbing among fellow Democrats?

Enough to set off the first full-scale fight of the fledgling 2008 presidential campaign between the front-runners, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

And perhaps enough to kill talk of a new, less hostile politics - and maybe even speculation about a Clinton-Obama or Obama-Clinton ticket.

At the center of the feud is David Geffen, the entertainment mogul who co-founded DreamWorks studio, helped Bill Clinton raise millions from Hollywood, then turned on his old friend. He hosted a star-studded fundraiser for Obama this week, then trashed the Clintons.

Geffen raised $18 million for Bill Clinton in the 1990s, when Clinton treated Southern California like an ATM. Hillary Clinton wanted the same ready cash.

But the Geffen who slept in the Lincoln Bedroom during the Clinton years is no longer their friend. Some say it's because a Geffen friend was passed over when President Clinton was handing out pardons on his last day in office. Some say it's more personal than that.

Either way, Geffen hosted a gala fundraiser for Obama on Tuesday, raised $1.3 million and introduced him to such glitterati as actress Jennifer Aniston and actor Eddie Murphy.

Twisting the knife, Geffen then told The New York Times that the Clintons are liars, that Hillary Clinton is coldly ambitious and that the former president hasn't changed his ways, an apparent reference to his womanizing.

"Everybody in politics lies, but they (the Clintons) do it with such ease, it's troubling," he said.

Clinton's camp fired back Wednesday, accusing Obama of hypocrisy for telling a Nevada audience Sunday that he opposes "slash and burn" politics even as his top fundraiser was attacking the Clintons.

"I want to run a very positive campaign and I certainly don't want the candidates or supporters to engage in the politics of personal destruction," Clinton said when she was asked about the brouhaha Wednesday.

Her aides went further.

"While Senator Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics ... his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband," said Howard Wolfson, Clinton's campaign communications director.

DOJ_NMG_0135334

"If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr. Geffen from his campaign and return his money. ... (T)here is no place in our party or our politics for the kind of personal insults made by Senator Obama's principal fundraiser," Wolfson said.

Obama's camp returned fire, saying the Clintons liked Geffen well enough when he was raising money for them.

"It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom," Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said.

Gibbs accused Clinton herself of hypocrisy for accepting support from a South Carolina Democrat who's said that Obama's race would hurt him.

"It's a slim possibility for him to get the nomination, but then everybody else is doomed," said South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who's black. "Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose - because he's black and he's top of the ticket."

Gibbs said it was "ironic that Senator Clinton lavished praise on Monday ... and is fully willing to accept today the support of South Carolina state Senator Robert Ford."

Democrats begin voting for their presidential nominee next January.

In Both Parties, 2008 Politeness Falls To Infighting (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

The sun was not yet up yesterday, and members of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign team were confronted with the kind of attack that most infuriates them: one questioning the character of Mrs. Clinton and her husband.

To make matters worse, it came from David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big supporter of the Clintons but has since turned on them and is now backing Senator Barack Obama for the Democratic presidential nomination.

What followed was a remarkably caustic exchange between the Clinton and Obama campaigns that highlighted the sensitivity in the Clinton camp to Mr. Obama's rapid rise as a rival and his positioning as a fresh face unburdened by the baggage borne by Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York. The Clinton camp seemed also to be sending a warning to mudslinging critics that they would be dealt with fiercely.

It began with a column in The New York Times by Maureen Dowd, in which Mr. Geffen said the Clintons lie "with such ease, it's troubling" and that the Clinton political operation "is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective." Mr. Geffen called Mr. Clinton a "reckless guy" who had not changed in the last six years, and suggested that Mrs. Clinton was too scripted.

In a statement it fired off at 9:46 a.m., the Clinton campaign called on Mr. Obama to sever his ties to Mr. Geffen and return the portion of the $1.3 million that Mr. Geffen helped raise on Tuesday at a reception in Beverly Hills.

"While Senator Obama was denouncing slash-and-burn politics yesterday, his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Senator Clinton and her husband," Howard Wolfson, the Clinton campaign communications director, said in a statement.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for Mr. Obama, responded with a statement less than an hour and a half later, saying it was "ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen" when he was "raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln Bedroom."

The punch and counterpunch went on all day, transfixing the political world and overshadowing a gathering of all the Democratic candidates except Mr. Obama, the junior Illinois senator, at a union-sponsored forum in Nevada at which Mrs. Clinton faced criticism from some opponents about her Iraq stance.

The Democrats were not the only ones dealing with intramural warfare. On the Republican side, Vice President Dick Cheney struck back at criticism leveled against him and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld by Senator John McCain of Arizona, underscoring the often tense relationship between the White House and Mr. McCain.

The presidential campaign has been a relatively polite affair in its early stages, and the day marked an abrupt change of tone that exposed the intensity of the bad feeling bubbling just below the surface in both parties. None of the players showed much inclination to back off.

In an interview with ABC News in which Mr. Cheney was asked about Mr. McCain's criticism of Mr. Rumsfeld, the vice president responded by bringing up other McCain comments critical of Mr. Cheney's role in managing the war in Iraq, and said Mr. McCain had subsequently said he was sorry.

"John said some nasty things about me the other day," Mr. Cheney added, "and then the next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

DOJ_NMG_0135335

In response, Mr. McCain seemed to go out of his way to re-emphasize his assertion that Mr. Rumsfeld would be remembered as one of the worst defense secretaries in history, and to criticize the Bush administration more generally when he appeared at a news conference in Los Angeles to discuss initiatives to deal with global warming.

When asked about the administration's environmental record, Mr. McCain said, "I would assess this administration's record on global warming as terrible."

Asked by a reporter about his comments about Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. McCain said, "The criticism of the conduct of the war I have voiced for more than three years when I saw that this train wreck was taking place."

Some minutes later, after the news conference had ended, Mr. McCain, unbidden, said to the reporter, "Sir, I stand by my comments about Secretary Rumsfeld, by the way."

Similarly, Mr. Geffen affirmed his view of the Clintons, saying he had been quoted accurately and that Mr. Wolfson was wrong in calling him the finance chairman of the Obama campaign (he said he had no formal role in the campaign).

Mrs. Clinton, asked Wednesday afternoon if Mr. Obama should denounce the Geffen remarks, declined to join in the hand-to-hand combat, but expressed general disapproval with the remarks while also defending her husband, which drew huge cheers from the audience of union members she was addressing.

"I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said at the forum of Democratic presidential candidates in Carson City, Nev. "I think we should stay focused on what we're going to do for America. And, you know, I believe Bill Clinton was a good president, and I'm very proud of the record of his two terms."

When pressed, she said she would leave it up to the Obama campaign to make its decision on Mr. Geffen, then noted that she was "excited" to be in Nevada "with the other candidates who came," a comment that only drew attention to Mr. Obama's choice to skip the event.

The Geffen remarks bubbled up throughout the forum. One candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, said Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen's remarks. "If we're going to win, we have to be positive," Mr. Richardson said. "I think these name-callings are not good."

As he arrived in Iowa late yesterday afternoon, Mr. Obama was met with questions from reporters about the clash.

"It's not clear to me why I would be apologizing for someone else's remarks," Mr. Obama said. "My sense is that Mr. Geffen may have differences with the Clintons, but that doesn't really have anything to do with our campaign."

When asked whether he was proud of Mr. Geffen's support, the senator declared: "He hosted an event for me yesterday. Absolutely."

Obama advisers described the Geffen remarks as an insignificant blip and said they saw no political danger in letting them stand. While some supporters of Mrs. Clinton said they were worried that the campaign had lost its cool over Mr. Geffen, several Clinton advisers insisted that they were not overreacting.

One adviser, who is not part of Mrs. Clinton's day-to-day inner circle but speaks to her regularly about politics and fund-raising, said Mr. Geffen's comments might not shock "political insiders" in Washington or New York who are used to hearing bad things about the Clintons. But such criticism, especially from a former Clinton supporter like Mr. Geffen, could surprise and concern average voters in Iowa, New Hampshire and in other politically important states where they are starting to form impressions of Mrs. Clinton as a presidential candidate.

Other advisers said the Clinton camp was simply frustrated that Mr. Obama had received glowing media coverage, and was eager to call out his campaign for hypocrisy by contrasting the Geffen remarks with Mr. Obama's pledge to be positive.

"Obama has gotten under the campaign's skin for weeks now — especially his free ride in the media —and Hillary's people were just waiting for their first chance to attack his image as Mr. Positive," said one Clinton adviser who is not part of the day-to-day political operation.

Clinton-Obama Fight Rattles Party Faithful (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Forget President Bush. The Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama presidential campaigns have gone after each other in an unusually early and nasty exchange, provoked by a big Hollywood donor.

An email fusillade yesterday left many Democrats shaking their heads that party infighting -- like everything else about the 2008 presidential campaign -- is starting so soon, nearly a year before the first nominating votes.

Aides argued all day over who started the exchange. Unaffiliated strategists in both parties suggested the Clinton campaign had overreacted, thus telegraphing concern over Mr. Obama's fresh-faced appeal and risking the ire of Hollywood backers and black voters. But they also said the Obama camp shouldn't have taken the bait and muddied its candidate's call for a new, positive politics.

The spark was a New York Times column quoting anti-Clinton remarks by film and recording mogul David Geffen, a former Bill Clinton supporter. On Tuesday night, he and his DreamWorks SKG co-founders, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, hosted a $1.3 million fund-raiser for Mr. Obama, a first-term senator from Illinois.

Mr. Geffen was quoted calling Sen. Clinton, of New York, an "incredibly polarizing figure" who was too scripted to admit her 2002 Iraq war vote was a mistake, and saying her husband was "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition."

By the time most political reporters got to their offices, they had an email from Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson: "While Sen. Obama was denouncing slash and burn politics yesterday, his campaign's finance chair was viciously and personally attacking Sen. Clinton and her husband."

He demanded Mr. Obama denounce Mr. Geffen's comments, remove him from the campaign and return his money. An Obama spokesman said Mr. Geffen has no official title or role in the campaign; Mr. Geffen said the same in a statement standing by his remarks.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs soon fired back. "We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," he wrote, before noting, "The Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when [he] was raising them $18 million and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom." That was a reference to the Clinton-era controversy over using the White House as a fund-raising tool.

Within an hour, Mr. Wolfson sent a final volley, in an email headlined "Obama Embraces Slash & Burn Politics." It noted that this week, in a campaign appearance in Nevada, Mr. Obama had railed against "the slash and burn politics that have become the custom in Washington."

On the subject of hypocrisy, the Obama camp countered that Mrs. Clinton had "lavished praise" Monday in South Carolina on a black state senator who supports her -- though he recently was quoted as warning that if Mr. Obama were the party's nominee, the Illinois senator would lose and drag the entire Democratic ticket with him "because he's black." The Clinton advisers said the campaign -- though not Mrs. Clinton personally -- had quickly issued a statement that "we strongly disagree" with the state senator. And he issued an apology, "if I caused anybody -- including myself -- any pain."

Later, campaigning in Iowa, Mr. Obama said, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark," according to the Associated Press.

For her part, Mrs. Clinton declined to be drawn further into the dispute at a forum of eight candidates in Carson City, Nev., yesterday. "I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said. Asked twice whether Mr. Obama should rebuke Mr. Geffen, she replied, "I'm going to leave that up to the other campaign."

Then, in what was seen as a dig at Mr. Obama, she said, "I'm glad to be here in Carson City." Mr. Obama had skipped the event, citing his prior campaign commitments in Iowa.

Later at the forum, another rival, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, was asked whether Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen. He quickly said yes, then added, "I don't know what was said."

Gentle Jabs Turn To Punches For Clinton, Obama (LAT)

By Tina Daunt And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

Remarks by David Geffen spark the first direct attacks between the two camps.

In her run for the White House, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton eventually was going to face the legacy of the more unsavory episodes of her husband's two terms as president. But in a surprise Wednesday, the first person to draw wide attention to some of the old controversies was not a Republican candidate or the "vast, right-wing conspiracy" that the Clintons have assailed, but a leading liberal at the heart of Hollywood.

Comments from entertainment mogul David Geffen, which were highly critical of the Clintons, reverberated through the presidential campaign and prompted the first direct attacks between the camps of Clinton — a New York senator — and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. Considered the two leading Democratic candidates, they until now had traded only gentle jabs in genteel language.

Geffen talked about why he had soured on the Clintons, his longtime allies, and was instead backing Obama. He called Sen. Clinton an "incredibly polarizing figure," criticized her husband's 2001 pardon of fugitive financier Marc Rich and suggested that Bill Clinton's personal habits would damage his wife's campaign, hurting Democratic hopes of retaking the White House next year.

DOJ_NMG_0135337

"Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it's troubling," Geffen said of the Clintons in a New York Times interview published Wednesday.

The comments marked an escalation in the battle between Sen. Clinton and Obama for Hollywood money. Geffen, who had raised millions of dollars for the Clintons over the years, on Tuesday hosted a $1.3-million fundraiser for Obama.

His remarks prompted the Clinton campaign to demand that Obama sever all ties to Geffen and return his campaign donations, citing Obama's past denunciation of "slash and burn" tactics. The interview also sparked a brawl of the billionaires in Los Angeles.

Responding to Geffen's comments, media mogul and Clinton supporter Haim Saban said: "David is allowing his emotions to cloud his better judgment, and I'm frankly surprised, to say the least, at the venom in his statement."

Saban, who made a fortune on the Mighty Morphin' Power Rangers, wrote in an e-mail to the Los Angeles Times that Geffen "knows in his heart of heart, that Hillary is the most qualified person to be the next president of the USA. Why would he lie to himself?"

The dispute comes at a crucial time for Clinton, who had been counting on strong support from Hollywood to help her post big fundraising numbers and build momentum by enhancing her front-runner status in the party. Supermarket magnate Ron Burkle remains one of Clinton's most ardent backers, and her strategists are hopeful that a Burkle fundraiser set for March will raise even more than Geffen raked in this week for Obama.

But Clinton now risks allowing Geffen to become a focal point among donors and primary voters in search of an alternative to her candidacy. That possibility gained potency this week when Obama, a figure in national politics for only three years, proved he could draw interest from major donors in a town that has long been dominated by the Clintons and was expected to line up behind Sen. Clinton's candidacy.

Husband's role

Moreover, the episode highlighted the predicament facing Clinton as she decides what role her husband should play in her campaign.

Bill Clinton remains popular among many key constituencies, but Geffen's comments dredged up controversies that could haunt the couple in 2008, such as fundraising tactics in which donors were rewarded with White House sleepovers, and the pardons he issued at the end of his term to Rich and others. By calling the former president a "reckless guy" and doubting that he "has become a different person" since leaving office, Geffen also seemed to be reviving images of Bill Clinton's impeachment over his dalliance with former intern Monica S. Lewinsky — an episode that contributed to the Clintons' polarizing reputation.

Wednesday's eruption coincided with Bill Clinton's official entry into the campaign with a fundraising letter to supporters.

"The attacks on Hillary haven't stopped, and she hasn't stopped winning," the former president wrote.

In Hollywood, Clinton campaign officials have moved aggressively to limit Obama's inroads and force longtime donors to back the former first lady.

Her campaign chairman, Terry McAuliffe, recently warned donors that Clinton would remember those who did not back her. "You are either with us, or you're against us," McAuliffe told potential donors during a dinner at Saban's house.

So far, the appeal has not succeeded. Some, such as Geffen and fellow DreamWorks studio co-founder Jeffrey Katzenberg, have been drawn to Obama, 45, while others are following the lead of Norman Lear in supporting multiple candidates to foster a dynamic debate.

When Lear, the legendary TV sitcom producer, was told of McAuliffe's comments this month, he responded: "What's Hillary going to do? Jail me?"

Adopting Lear's strategy are singer Barbra Streisand, former Paramount Pictures head Sherry Lansing and another DreamWorks founder, Steven Spielberg — all of whom are giving early contributions to multiple candidates.

Democratic Race Gets Rolling With Nevada Forum (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. — Democratic presidential candidates defended their histories on Iraq, offered their ideas for ending the war and opened fault lines on taxes and health care Wednesday in the first major forum of the 2008 nomination race.

Eight hopefuls showed up for the forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. The only absentee was Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, in Des Moines for a town meeting.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton faced questions on two awkward issues from moderator George Stephanopoulos of ABC News, a former aide in her husband's White House. First he asked why she won't say her 2002 vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq was a mistake. "My vote was a sincere vote based on the facts and assurances I received at the time," Clinton said.

Stephanopoulos also asked Clinton about a "press-release scuffle" that broke out Wednesday between her campaign and Obama's over comments made by Hollywood mogul David Geffen to The New York Times. Geffen called Bill Clinton "a reckless guy" who gave his enemies ammunition; criticized Hillary Clinton for refusing to admit a mistake on the war; called them both liars; and said he had gotten in trouble with them for helping Obama.

The Clinton camp demanded that Obama cut ties with Geffen and return cash associated with him. The Obama camp said Clinton should renounce support from South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford. Ford, who is black, said Democrats would lose with Obama "because he's black." He later apologized. Geffen, meanwhile, said his remarks reflect "my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons" and he has "no formal role" in Obama's campaign.

Asked whether Obama should denounce Geffen's remarks, Clinton replied: "I'm going to leave that up to the other campaign." She said she wants to run "a very positive campaign. I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction." She added that she is "very proud" of her husband's two terms.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who was Bill Clinton's U.N. ambassador and Energy secretary, said Democrats should pledge not to attack one another. Asked whether Obama should denounce the Geffen comments, he replied: "Yes. If we're going to win, we have to be positive."

Nevada is a newcomer to the early primary season; its caucuses are scheduled Jan. 19. The forum, held before 750 in a community center and 400 more in an overflow site, was the first of at least five events scheduled this year in the state.

Iraq dominated much of the session. Former North Carolina senator John Edwards and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd tried to set themselves apart from Clinton. Edwards, who wants to start bringing U.S. troops home now, said it is time for a leader "who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake." He said he was "wrong to vote for this war." Dodd said that "I made a mistake and I don't know" are two responses politicians dislike. He added it was "a mistake" to vote for the war and called for "a surge of diplomacy."

Another senator who calls his vote a mistake, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware, said he had "vastly underestimated" the Bush team's incompetence. The question now is "What next?" he said, and pushed his plan to partition Iraq.

Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack did not cast votes on Iraq. "What have you done today to end this war in Iraq? It needs to be ended now," Vilsack exhorted the audience. Richardson said Congress should "deauthorize" the war.

Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich, an early war opponent, said it must be hard for candidates to say they were "tricked, deceived, misled" and said he wasn't. Former Alaska senator Mike Gravel said the war isn't worth "one more American dead."

The Democrats endorsed expanded health care but differed on how to pay for it. Clinton said she wants to find a way to provide universal care "without putting billions more into the system when we already spend so much more than anybody else." Vilsack and Richardson said they would expand coverage without tax hikes.

Edwards has proposed a universal health care plan financed by repeal of Bush's tax cuts on households making over $200,000. Anybody who says they don't need new revenue to pay for universal care, "they might have a bridge in Brooklyn they want to sell you, too," he said.

Clinton In Attack On Obama Over Donation (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The US presidential campaign on Wednesday took a nasty turn when Hillary Clinton demanded that Barack Obama, her closest rival for the Democratic nomination, return campaign donations from a Hollywood mogul who had made “vicious attacks” on her personality.

Mrs Clinton’s office was responding to a column by Maureen Dowd in Wednesday’s New York Times in which David Geffen, the Hollywood executive and prominent Obama supporter, was quoted as having disparaged Mrs Clinton.

Mr Geffen, who organised a $1.3m (€1m, £660,000) election fund-raising event for Mr Obama in Los Angeles on Tuesday was a one-time supporter of Bill Clinton who fell out with the former president and his wife in 2001.

Mrs Clinton on Wednesday called upon Mr Obama, who launched his campaign last month with the promise to put an end to the “slash and burn” politics of Washington, to return the money donated by Mr Geffen and to repudiate his remarks.

“If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks, remove Mr Geffen from his campaign and return the money,” she said. “There is no place in our party for the kind of personal insults made by Senator Obama’s principal fundraiser.”

Mr Geffen was quoted as having said: “I don’t think another polarising figure – no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is – and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? – can bring this country together.” He also criticised Mrs Clinton for refusing to admit she made a mistake in voting to authorise the Iraq war in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0135339

On Wednesday, Mr Obama, who is posing an increasingly credible challenge to Mrs Clinton's frontrunner status for the Democratic nomination, came close to accusing her campaign of hypocrisy.

In a statement, Robert Gibbs, Mr Obama's communications director, referred to the fact Mr Geffen had stayed at the White House in the 1990s when Mr Clinton was president.

"It is ironic that the Clintons had no problem with David Geffen when he was raising them $18m and sleeping at their invitation in the Lincoln bedroom," Mr Gibbs said.

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters."

Mr Obama, who is the first African American with a serious shot at the White House, also referred to an incident in South Carolina last weekend where Robert Ford, who is a prominent black supporter of Mrs Clinton's campaign, said Mr Obama's nomination would doom other Democratic candidates "because he's black". Mr Ford apologised.

"This campaign is already getting out of control," said a seasoned Democratic operative in Washington. "It is only February 2007 and they're already at each other's throats."

Hillary, Obama Producing Their Own Hollywood Drama (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The two top Democratic presidential candidates sparred yesterday as a political battle played out Hollywood-style in a possible preview of the fight to come for superstar dollars.

Democrats with eyes on the White House are playing roles in the Hollywood primary, which is almost as crowded as the real contests in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Starring in yesterday's drama were Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, whose rival campaigns feuded over some comments made by a major Hollywood player who helped raise $1.3 million for Mr. Obama.

The fundraising figure impressed pundits, but the headline of the day featured remarks that music and movie producer David Geffen made about Mrs. Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

The fundraiser on Tuesday was hosted by Mr. Geffen's DreamWorks/SKG colleagues Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg. Mr. Spielberg has promised to hold similar parties for Mrs. Clinton and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, but Mr. Geffen is supporting Mr. Obama.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family," he told New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd.

Mr. Geffen in the column called Mrs. Clinton "polarizing" and said he thinks Republicans will use Mr. Clinton against his wife if she gets the nomination. He called the former president a "reckless guy." Mr. Geffen also criticized Mrs. Clinton for refusing to apologize for her October 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war.

The Clinton campaign demanded Mr. Obama disavow the comments, quoting his own promise to avoid "slash-and-burn" politics.

"If Senator Obama is indeed sincere about his repeated claims to change the tone of our politics, he should immediately denounce these remarks ... and return his money," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson.

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs noted that Mr. Geffen had raised millions for Mr. Clinton and famously slumbered in the Lincoln Bedroom.

"We aren't going to get in the middle of a disagreement between the Clintons and someone who was once one of their biggest supporters," Mr. Gibbs said.

He added that Mrs. Clinton accepted the support of South Carolina state Sen. Robert Ford, who said recently that if Mr. Obama got the nomination, "everybody else is doomed."

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose -- because he's black and he's top of the ticket. We'd lose the House and the Senate and the governors and everything," Mr. Ford said, according to the Associated Press. He later apologized when his remarks drew wide criticism.

Mr. Wolfson wasn't satisfied with Mr. Gibbs' response, saying it called into question whether Mr. Obama "really believes his own rhetoric."

He added, "When one of Senator Clinton's supporters made an inappropriate statement, her campaign disavowed it immediately and the supporter apologized for his words. Why won't Senator Obama do the same?"

Mr. Geffen said yesterday the quotes were accurate and reflect "solely my personal beliefs regarding the Clintons."

DOJ_NMG_0135340

News reports and the Dowd column both have blamed the Geffen-Clinton rift on Mr. Clinton's not pardoning Leonard Peltier, an American Indian sentenced to life imprisonment 30 years ago for murdering two FBI agents and on whose behalf Mr. Geffen has advocated.

At a campaign forum in Nevada yesterday, Mrs. Clinton managed to dodge a question about the dust-up while working in a dig at Mr. Obama, the only candidate who did not attend because he was campaigning in Iowa.

"I want to run a very positive campaign, and I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she said.

But when asked by forum host George Stephanopoulos whether Mr. Obama should denounce Mr. Geffen's remarks, Mrs. Clinton said: "I'll leave that up to the other campaign. I'm glad to be here in Carson City."

She then noted her appreciation for "the other candidates who came."

Despite the celebrity drama yesterday, Mr. Obama's star-studded event was well-received. Actress Jennifer Aniston of television's "Friends" fame told a reporter that she finds Mr. Obama to be "lovely," and Dixie Chicks singer Natalie Maines praised Michelle Obama, the first-term senator's wife. Also in the crowd at the Beverly Hilton were comedian Ben Stiller, director Ron Howard and actors Morgan Freeman and Eddie Murphy.

During the $2,300-per-ticket fundraiser Mr. Obama praised the glitterati for the cultural impact of such films as "Hotel Rwanda" and "Schindler's List," saying "What an enormous power that is, what an enormous responsibility."

The line resembles one from the megamovie "Spider-Man," in which Peter Parker's Uncle Ben tells the superhero: "Remember, with great power comes great responsibility."

Ron Burkle, a supermarket tycoon, will host his own Hollywood fundraiser for Mrs. Clinton next month. Hollywood A-listers Tom Hanks, Jerry Seinfeld and Martin Scorsese are expected to attend.

The other Democrats in the race are also wooing Hollywood stars, whose names often are as important as the checks they write.

Mr. Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee, was a featured guest on HBO's "Real Time With Bill Maher" on Friday. He also raised $100,000 last week with television actors in Hollywood, according to the New York Times.

Singer and actress Barbra Streisand has made $2,300 donations to Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards.

Should former Vice President Al Gore decide to jump into the presidential race, he could trump all the Hollywood cash seekers by becoming an Oscar winner Sunday night. His film on climate change, "An Inconvenient Truth," has been nominated for best documentary.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week stopped by the "Tonight Show" to exchange yuks with Jay Leno and even jokingly offered fellow guest and comedian Jim Carrey a spot on his presidential ticket.

Rivals At Democratic Presidential Forum Push Positions On Iraq War Into Spotlight (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev., Feb. 21 — Two Democratic presidential rivals of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton applied more pressure on her over Iraq on Wednesday, extolling the virtue of admitting mistakes about the war — which she has not done — and comparing politicians who do not with President Bush.

The toughest words, here at the first Democratic candidate forum of the 2008 race, came from former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. He said Americans needed “a different kind of leadership” than that provided by the current president who, Mr. Edwards said, had refused to admit error on Iraq. Mr. Edwards has apologized for his 2002 vote to authorize military action in Iraq; Mrs. Clinton cast the same vote and has stood by it while also criticizing the war strategy.

“We need a leader who will be open and honest with you and with the American people — who will tell the truth, who will tell the truth when they’ve made a mistake, who will take responsibility when they’ve made a mistake,” Mr. Edwards said at a forum sponsored by the American Federation of Federal, State and Municipal Employees.

“If we want to live in a moral and just America and we want America to be able to lead in a moral and just world, we need a leader who is honest, open and decent,” he added.

Asked by the forum’s moderator, George Stephanopoulos of ABC News, about Mrs. Clinton’s explanation that her vote was cast based on a sincere belief in military intelligence provided at the time, Mr. Edwards replied: “Whether it’s good enough I think is between her and her conscience. It’s not for me to judge.”

Another candidate, Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, who has also renounced his 2002 vote, said there was “nothing wrong” with admitting mistakes.

“There are two things that people in public life — two responses people in public life never like to give, and I don’t understand why: ‘I made a mistake’ and ‘I don’t know,’ ” Mr. Dodd said. “I’ve made them in the past. I’ll make them in the future.”

DOJ_NMG_0135341

Because the forum rules prevented direct engagement among the candidates — indeed, they appeared one at a time — Mrs. Clinton could not respond immediately. Once it was her turn, she reiterated her opposition to the war and outlined her new plan to cap troop levels and start withdrawing some units from Iraq within 90 days.

If the president does not move in that direction, she added, "I think we should require that he has to seek additional Congressional authority, because it has run out on what George Bush has tried to do in Iraq."

Of the major Democratic candidates, only Senator Barack Obama of Illinois was absent; he was campaigning in Iowa. Yet he was here in spirit: At times the focus of the forum, and of some reporters, drifted to the e-mail attacks on Wednesday between the campaign war rooms of Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama over an Obama donor's personal criticism of the Clintons this week.

David Geffen, the entertainment executive, in an interview with a columnist for The New York Times, described Mrs. Clinton as "incredibly polarizing" and "ambitious," and said Mr. Clinton may make trouble for his wife by causing a new scandal in their lives. Mrs. Clinton pushed back at the forum, to applause from the audience of public employee union members, by saying candidates and their allies should not "be engaging in the politics of personal destruction."

Not everyone seemed to agree with that. Outside of the event here in the capital of Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second round of presidential caucuses next January, leaflets calling Mrs. Clinton unelectable were tucked under the windshield wipers of cars. The leaflets, of unknown provenance, were titled "Why Can't She Win?" and cast her as unpopular with liberals over the war and with conservatives over just about everything.

Other than Iraq, health care insurance was the subject of greatest discussion, with most of the candidates promising to push for universal coverage. Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico promised that he would not increase taxes to expand health care, but rather focus on preventative care, while Mr. Edwards repeated plans for a huge health care program that would include higher taxes on wealthy Americans.

"I think we have reached a place in American history where small baby steps, incremental steps, are not enough — we need big, transformational change," Mr. Edwards said to some applause.

Mrs. Clinton, who has been portrayed by Edwards advisers and others as an incrementalist, said she wanted to develop a plan to provide universal care without spending billions of dollars more, given that the United States already spends significantly more on health care than any other nation.

Yet she also presented herself as a bold goal setter, recalling President John F. Kennedy's pledge to put a man on the moon in a decade.

"I want to have universal health care coverage by the end of my second term, and with everybody working on that, I think we can do it," she said to applause.

Edwards Needles Clinton About Iraq Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 21, 2007

Former Sen. John Edwards jabbed gently at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday in the first all-candidates forum of the 2008 Democratic presidential campaign, saying her refusal to disavow a 2002 vote on Iraq was "between her and her conscience."

"It's not for me to judge," said Edwards, who — like Clinton — voted in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq, but unlike her, has since apologized for his vote.

The event format did not permit Clinton to respond to Edwards' swipe, which stood out on an afternoon in which Democrats launched serial attacks on President Bush's war policies.

"The worst we can do is tear each other down," said New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who called on his Democratic rivals to sign a pledge to avoid negative campaigning and concentrate their energy on taking the White House away from the Republicans next year.

Among Democratic presidential contenders, only Barack Obama skipped the event, which was hosted by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Union. The Illinois senator campaigned in Iowa instead.

The convergence of so many candidates underscored Nevada's newfound importance in the 2008 nominating campaign. The state will hold caucuses on Jan. 19, five days after the lead-off Iowa caucuses and presumably only a few days before New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

In their time on stage, several of the candidates made an explicit pitch for the votes of union members, stressing their backing for legislation designed to make it easier to join unions, for example.

Edwards, Clinton and others drew cheers when they voiced support for universal health coverage, and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio vowed to pull the United States out of NAFTA soon after taking office in the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0135342

But the Iraq war overshadowed all else at the two-hour event, Democrat after Democrat vying to show their eagerness to end U.S. participation in a conflict that has resulted in the deaths of more than 3,100 U.S. troops.

"Sign me up. No negatives," Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware said just after Richardson made his appeal. Moments later, though, he spoke dismissively of congressional efforts merely to stop Bush's plan to deploy additional troops. "Don't talk about capping and all that. Do something," he said.

Clinton and Obama support separate bills to prevent an increase in troop levels above those in effect in January.

Kucinich was more direct. He said he had voted against authorizing the war in 2002, adding, "People are looking for a president who does the right thing when it matters the most."

Former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska, a quarter-century out of office, was the eighth candidate. "I don't think it's a big deal whether I get elected president or not," he said at one point.

The event occurred on a day in which aides to Obama and Clinton clashed over remarks made by DreamWorks founder David Geffen, a one-time supporter of President Clinton who has lined up behind the Illinois senator in 2008.

The Hollywood mogul was quoted in the New York Times as saying while "everybody in politics lies," the former president and former first lady "do it with such ease, it's troubling." Aides to the New York senator promptly called on Obama to give back a campaign donation from Geffen.

Clinton sidestepped a question of whether Obama should denounce Geffen's remarks. "I sure don't want Democrats or supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction," she told moderator George Stephanopoulos.

Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, the first to speak, brushed aside a suggestion from some administration allies that the withdrawal of troops from Iraq would create chaos.

"How much more chaos could there be in Baghdad than exists today?" he asked to applause from the audience at a union-sponsored event near the Nevada state capitol.

"Time has run out on what President Bush has tried to do in Iraq," said Clinton when she took her turn on stage. She touted her legislation to begin a troop withdrawal within 90 days, and as she has repeatedly, declined to apologize for her vote to authorize the war in 2002.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack struck a similar note. "I want to challenge every single one of you and ask a simple question, what have you done today? What have you done today to end this war in Iraq?

"It needs to be ended now. Not six days from now, not six months from now. Not six years from now. It needs to be ended now, and it is up to you," he said.

Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, said it was time to begin a troop withdrawal. "I voted for this war. I was wrong to vote for this war. I should never have voted for this war. I take responsibility for that. No one else is responsible for it.

He added, "But the truth is, if we want to live in a moral and just America, and we want America to be able to lead in a moral and just world. We need a leader who is honest, open and decent and trying to do the right thing."

Stephanopoulos asked Edwards moments later whether he had been referring to Clinton.

"Well, whether it's good enough I think it's between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge," said the former North Carolina senator.

The program called for each contenders to make brief opening comments, then field three questions from Stephanopoulus, an ABC News broadcaster and former aide in Bill Clinton's White House. That meant, for example, that Clinton was backstage when Edwards spoke.

The Republican National Committee used the forum to try to put its own spin on the candidates, releasing "research documents" containing unflattering critiques of each of the Democrats hours before the event.

In recent years, Democrats have sensed political opportunity in the mountain West, a fast-growing region long dominated by Republicans. Nevada, with its large Hispanic population and influential labor unions, was considered a battleground state in 2004, and President Bush won the state by just 3 percentage points.

Ex-Senate Leader Daschle Endorses Obama (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama won the endorsement Wednesday of former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, who said the White House hopeful "personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country."

Daschle said Obama has a "great capacity to unify our country and inspire a new generation of young Americans, just as I was inspired by the Kennedys and Martin Luther King when I was young."

DOJ_NMG_0135343

Obama began his term in the Senate after Daschle lost his seat in 2004. But the South Dakotan served in the Senate with several of the other Democratic presidential hopefuls, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Joe Biden of Delaware, Chris Dodd of Connecticut and John Edwards, a former lawmaker.

Daschle said the party was "very fortunate to have an extraordinary field of candidates."

No Way To Elect A President (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

When Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid announced plans to hold an unusual Saturday session last week to vote on the House-passed resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops into Iraq, he disrupted the schedules of at least six of his colleagues who are running for president.

Joe Biden and John McCain were both supposed to spend the day in Iowa; Hillary Clinton, in New Hampshire; Chris Dodd, in South Carolina; Barack Obama, in South Carolina and Virginia; and Sam Brownback, in Florida.

It's only February of 2007, but from the schedules these presidential hopefuls -- and their rivals -- are keeping, you would think the primaries were almost upon us. Plenty of campaign consultants were aggravated that Reid was inconsiderate enough to let a little matter such as the Iraq war intrude on their important work of getting their candidates elected -- next year.

What we have, friends, is a remarkably distinguished field of candidates vying in an election system that has become truly insane.

I think the 16 men and one woman actively pursuing the presidency right now constitute a classy assemblage. The front-runners are people of substantial stature; the long shots include many who, in other years, would have been thought of as formidable challengers.

But the process in which they are engaged is bizarre -- and getting more so, every time you look.

Ever since 1976, the first presidential election year after the Democrats "reformed" their nominating rules, the states have been trying to increase their influence by racing to the head of the line of primaries. The result has been that a selection system that used to begin in March now is over in February -- at the latest.

The Democrats are mostly to blame for this mad rush to judgment, but neither party has tried seriously to apply the brakes. Their indulgence of this breakneck competition among the states means that someone is likely to put a death grip on each party's nomination before most Americans have begun to size up his or her capacity to be president. The second consequence is a numbingly long general election campaign: a nine-month marathon that leaves contenders and voters exhausted.

It also drives the cost of the election right through the ceiling -- and makes the candidates spend untold hours courting those with the wealth to finance their campaigns. Serious students of the process proclaim this to be the first billion-dollar election and predict the old system of partial public financing, with its spending controls, will be shattered to bits by the runaway money chase.

How did all this come to pass? Well, it began innocently enough with both parties giving official sanction to the traditional early kickoff contests -- the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. But as other states began inching forward, Iowa and New Hampshire advanced their dates, bit by bit, into January.

This year, the Democrats triggered a new stampede by deciding -- on grounds of diversity -- to cram the Nevada caucuses into the week between Iowa and New Hampshire and add a South Carolina primary just a week later.

Those four January events may be followed by a Feb. 5 blowout that will very possibly end the race. Four mega-states -- Florida, Illinois, Texas and California -- are all advancing legislation that would move their contests up to that date. Alabama may sneak in three days earlier, and other states are considering jumping in.

This is madness. There is no way that candidates can really communicate their qualifications, their aspirations and their policies to millions of people in widely scattered locales in a week's time or less. The campaign will be reduced to 30-second TV spots, sound-bite debates and airport tarmac rallies.

Long ago, the late Mo Udall, the canny congressman from Arizona who finished second to Jimmy Carter in the 1976 primaries, proposed the best solution I've ever heard.

He urged the parties to adopt a simple rule: Any state could hold a nonbinding contest any day it wants, but delegates to the national conventions would be seated only if elected on the first Tuesday of March, April, May or June. That way you would get spacing between the events to allow for serious examination of the choices and, probably, a mixture of results that would keep the race open until the end.

What we have now is so out of kilter that senatorial candidates can barely tend to their duties a year before the first primary.

Ex-lawmakers Find Work With Lobbyists (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 22, 2007

The cozy relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists that embarrassed Congress and cost some lawmakers re-election haven't stopped the revolving door between Capitol Hill and the lobbying industry that seeks to influence legislation.

Five of the 39 ex-lawmakers rejected by voters three months ago landed jobs at firms that seek to influence Congress. The hires include two Republicans — Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Conrad Burns of Montana — who lost in part because of allegations of ethical lapses.

Federal law requires lawmakers to wait a year after leaving office to lobby Congress, but lets former Congress members advise lobbyists and clients. The Senate passed a bill that would extend that "cooling-off" period to two years and also ban ex-lawmakers from advising others during that time. The House of Representatives has not taken up that issue.

Weldon, a former member of the House Armed Services Committee, was named chief strategic officer this month by Defense Solutions, a defense contractor that consults and lobbies for other companies. One of the company's executives, in a previous job, benefited from federal funds secured by Weldon.

A series of FBI raids at the homes and offices of his lobbyist daughter and her business associates and clients became a major issue in Weldon's campaign. He has said he did not help her obtain contracts.

Burns was hired last month as a senior adviser by Gage LLC, a lobbying firm headed by his former chief of staff and whose clients benefited from funding Burns inserted into spending bills.

Burns lost his Senate seat after Democrat Jon Tester criticized his ties to Gage and lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who was sentenced to prison last year for fraud. Burns received about $150,000 in donations from Abramoff and his associates and clients. Burns, who returned the money, has said he didn't help Abramoff.

Weldon and Burns did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Others who have joined lobbying firms:

·Former congressman Jim Davis, D-Fla., who lost to Republican Charlie Crist in the race for Florida governor, joined Holland & Knight, a large law and lobbying firm. Davis said he will work mostly in Florida with occasional visits to Washington to advise clients. Managing partner Howell Melton Jr. said in a statement last month that the Democrat "will be a valuable asset to our clients now that the new majority in Congress has convened."

·Former congresswoman Nancy Johnson, R-Conn., joined law and lobbying firm Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz, which touted her health care credentials — including her role in crafting the Medicare drug benefit. Democrat Christopher Murphy, who defeated Johnson, criticized the drug benefit and her ties to the pharmaceutical industry. Johnson did not return messages seeking comment.

·Former congressman Richard Pombo, R-Calif., on Tuesday joined Pac/West Communications, a lobbying and public relations firm. Pombo chaired the House Natural Resources Committee, and Pac/West's clients include timber and oil companies. Pombo said he will advise grass-roots groups on how to be politically effective.

Democrats made ethics an issue in last year's elections. Former congressman Bob Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty last year to Abramoff-related corruption charges and in 2005, former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from businessmen seeking Pentagon contracts.

Can Free Trade Be A Fair Deal? (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

Within the past year, an important new debate has taken shape, though it's not likely to be the focus of any forthcoming presidential debates as such. It is likely, however, to distinguish liberal from centrist thinking for decades to come.

The debate begins at the familiar flash point of trade -- more particularly, with the realization of business elites and their political champions that the nation's free-trade policies have become threatened by growing public anxiety over our economic future. While corporate profits soar, individual wages stagnate, held at least partly in check by the brave new fact of offshoring -- that millions of Americans' jobs can be performed at a fraction of the cost in developing nations near and far. November's elections, in which voters sent to Congress a freshman class composed almost entirely of free-trade skeptics, rang alarm bells on both Wall Street and K Street.

In reaction not just to November but to reams of economic data showing that the U.S. median income has flat-lined, such longtime champions of free-trade orthodoxy as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin have changed their tune. Maintaining and extending our trade agreements is still their holy writ, but to compensate for whatever leveling effect trade may have on Americans' incomes, they now call for wage insurance to help workers who've been compelled to take lower-paying jobs than the ones they lost. As call centers relocate to India, the Rubinauts call for extending trade adjustment assistance to service as well as manufacturing workers. They call for a universal health-care system delinking insurance from employment, so that U.S. companies can compete globally without having to be the only corporations in an advanced economy that cover their workers' medical costs. They call for improving our education system so that American workers can be more competitive.

These domestic policy proposals all have merit; the question is whether they're remotely sufficient to the challenge of a globalized economy. In fact, there are nations with advanced economies that trade even more than we do and have still managed, chiefly through domestic policies, to retain high levels of economic equality and vitality: the nations of northern Europe. Trade constitutes a higher percentage of Scandinavian nations' gross domestic product than it does ours, with little of the downward-leveling and, accordingly, anti-trade backlash that we experience. Their secret is a series of job-training and placement policies, a bigger and better-paying public sector than ours, and the fact that their leading trade partners are other high-wage European nations.

The cost of creating this economic security while remaining globally competitive isn't cheap. In the March issue of the American Prospect (which I edit), my colleague Robert Kuttner calculates that these nations devote roughly 15 percent more of their GDP to governmental outlays than the United States does. That pencils out to roughly $2 trillion a year that we'd have to shift to the public sector to build an economy in which globalization wouldn't be viewed as so dire a threat. Neither Rubin, a true believer in balanced budgets, nor anybody functioning in the real world of American politics is calling for anything this far-reaching to reshape the U.S. economy.

Free-trade skeptics such as I believe that these domestic reforms, while overdue, are not enough. We argue that there need to be rules for the global economy that protect workers no less than investors, that global minimum wage standards, say, are no less necessary in a global economy than national minimum wage standards are in a national economy. Our challenge is that absent a global government, a global polity, such standards are excruciatingly difficult to create -- though altering the rules of the World Trade Organization would be a good place to start.

And so the debate: Is it possible, in a globalized economy, to have decent capitalism in one country? Or must enforceable laws be enacted to create a more egalitarian global economy, just as the New Deal here and social democratic governments in Europe established the framework for broadly shared prosperity on a national scale in the middle of the last century?

The historically minded may hear in this debate a dim echo of a Soviet controversy of 80 years ago, in which Stalin argued it was possible to build Soviet-style socialism in one country while Trotsky insisted that without global socialism, Russian socialism was bound to fail. Today's debate, fortunately, concerns the fate of a vastly more benign system: decent capitalism. And -- since neither a Scandinavian conversion nor a global government is just around the corner -- it is a debate that will pit the left against the center probably for the next half-century.

EDITORIAL: Mortgage Insecurities (NYT)

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

If the bankers, investors and regulators who populate the global financial markets are not already anxious, they should be. The easy money that has buoyed the global economy for much of this decade is getting harder to come by.

At a similar point a decade ago, Russia defaulted on its foreign debt and Asia came unglued, weakening global growth. This time, the trigger could be the rapid erosion in the quality of American home mortgages — reflected in surging delinquencies and rising defaults.

Two economists, Mark Zandi and Juan Manuel Licari of Moody's Economy.com, detailed the dangers recently. In 2005 and 2006, lenders wrote an estimated $3.2 trillion in new home mortgages, which was a record — and lowered their credit standards considerably to do it. In 2005 alone, 20 percent of the mortgages taken out were "subprime" — made to borrowers with poor credit — and many more had worrisome features like interest-only payments.

Not surprisingly, as interest rates rose last year, mortgage delinquencies soared. Delinquency rates are expected to peak in 2008 at over 3 percent, well above the level of the last recession. Many of these risky mortgages were sold to investment banks, who carved them up into complex i.o.u.'s that they sold to investors worldwide. More than 20 percent of global private debt securities is now tied to housing in the United States. That works out to $7.5 trillion — far larger than the market for United States Treasuries. So if America's mortgage market heads south, the losses could be widespread.

The odds of a global financial crisis are still low, according to Mr. Zandi and Mr. Licari, but they are rising. There is not a lot now that can be done about the risks in the mortgage market. But the growing possibility of hard times ahead is another argument for rolling back many of the recent excessive tax cuts, so the government will have more resources available to respond if a crisis comes.

Rigged Game In Richmond (WP)

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

THE DECK is stacked in Richmond this week as negotiators from Virginia's House of Delegates and Senate try to find the first new money for transportation in a generation. Specifically, it is stacked in favor of a flawed plan that would use unstable, unreliable funding sources to produce an anemic cash flow.

Witness the negotiators on the House-Senate conference committee, whose mission is to fashion a compromise between competing transportation funding formulas. Just two of the 12 negotiators are Northern Virginians, despite the fact that the region accounts for one-third of the state's population, 40 percent of its economy and at least half its traffic headaches. Ten of the 12 negotiators are Republicans. And, thanks to some artful parliamentary maneuvering, 11 of the 12 negotiators named to the conference committee voted for the House-backed funding package, which is less responsible than the Senate's approach.

The chances of this group of lawmakers forging a genuine compromise are not promising. Rather, they appear to be planning a package similar to the House's original one, which they hope to present to the Senate with the clock ticking -- the legislature is scheduled to adjourn Saturday -- and dare the senators to reject it, as they have once already on a preliminary vote. It's an all-or-nothing gambit that plays chicken with the commonwealth's best interests.

The problem with the House funding package is twofold. First, it would produce barely more than half of the $700 million a year in new transportation funding that Northern Virginia desperately needs. Second, it would pay for improvements to the state's roads and rails in part by diverting $250 million annually in state funding for public schools, higher education, health care, human services and public safety. It would, in other words, throw transportation into the same competitive pool as other spending priorities, meaning that whatever amount is promised for road-building now could be chipped away or redirected in its entirety at the first sign of inclement budgetary weather. And then what -- highway projects abandoned halfway through construction? Federally matched Metro funding suspended?

Transportation has long been treated as a special case in Virginia (as in other states) and funded from separate, dedicated, dependable revenue sources in the knowledge that road-building projects are long-term undertakings. That Republicans in the House are allergic to new taxes, and that all 140 seats in the General Assembly are on the ballot this year, does not change that basic reality.

Rather than shove the House plan or something close to it down the Senate's throat and see whether it gags, the conferees would be wiser to offer a real compromise. That would entail limiting transportation's dependency on unreliable general fund revenue while drawing on some new, more sustainable revenue source -- perhaps along the lines of a fee for all newly registered vehicles, such as the one that Sen. John H. Chichester (R-Northumberland) has proposed and that the Senate has endorsed. By incorporating elements of both plans, negotiators may produce a package that neither the House nor the Senate adores but that makes sense for a state too long starved of money for essential infrastructure projects.

Rice Urges Iran To Reconsider Defiance As Nuclear Deadline Passes (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 22, 2007

As Iran ignored a UN deadline Wednesday to suspend its nuclear reprocessing activities, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the Islamic republic to reconsider its defiance and accept an offer of better relations with Washington.

"The Iranians have unfortunately not acceded to the international community's demands," Rice said after talks here with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

Rice, in Berlin for a meeting of the so-called Quartet of Middle East peace mediators, said she would be consulting with her major power counterparts on the next steps to take concerning Iran's nuclear programme.

The United States has said it will seek to expand sanctions imposed on Iran on December 23 because of Tehran's refusal to suspend a uranium enrichment programme it and others fear is a cover for the development of nuclear weapons.

The UN Security Council resolution gave Iran 60 days to comply, but Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Wednesday vowed to press ahead with the nuclear programme.

"Achieving nuclear energy is very important for the progress and development of our country," Ahmadinejad told a public rally.

Tehran insists its program is only to provide fuel for nuclear power plants, but highly enriched uranium can also provide material to make atomic weapons.

Rice re-affirmed a US offer, first made last May, to end a 27-year rupture in American-Iranian relations if they comply with the UN conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0135347

Together with the other four permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany, Washington also pledged to help Iran develop a peaceful nuclear energy programme if it would halt its own enrichment activities.

"We offered to reverse 27 years of policy to engage in the context of the six (parties) and I said I would meet with my Iranian counterpart any place, any where, any time if they suspend," she said.

"I want to emphasize that the best course would be for Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities so we can return to negotiations," Rice said at a press conference.

"That's the purpose of having pressure on the Iranian regime," she said.

Rice was expected to discuss the issue of increasing the sanctions pressure against Iran with Steinmeier, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana on the sideline of the Berlin meeting.

The limited sanctions resolution adopted in December specifically target trade and officials involving Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes and Russia, which has close economic ties with Iran, is expected to resist further punitive measures.

The next step in the UN process is a report to be released by the head of the UN nuclear watchdog by Friday confirming that Iran is pushing ahead with uranium enrichment.

Iran Risks Further Isolation, Says US (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Iran faced further isolation if it failed to meet United Nations demands to curb its nuclear programme, the US's national security adviser warned on Wednesday.

On the day of a UN deadline, Stephen Hadley argued that the Bush administration's concerns were shared by Russia, in spite of the split between Moscow and Washington on issues such as missile defence.

"Regrettably, the Iranian regime has pursued a policy of pursuing a nuclear programme in defiance of the international community and the result is that it is increasingly isolated," he said. However, an expected report on Iran's nuclear programme by Mohamed ElBaradei, the UN's chief nuclear watchdog, was delayed yesterday, for finishing touches.

Mr Hadley added that Moscow's recent decision to delay work on Iran's light water reactor at Bushehr – ostensibly because of Tehran's failure to pay Russian contractors promptly – indicated the Kremlin's worries about Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"They have been increasingly concerned about the proliferation risks associated with Bushehr," he said. "They have entered into understandings with Iranians to mitigate some of those risks," he added, referring to Russia's agreement with Tehran to take back spent nuclear fuel.

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, yesterday rallied public support for the programme in speeches in the northern province of Gilan, claiming that nuclear technology would "push Iran 50 years ahead".

The US and Israel have frequently warned that Iran could reach a "point of no return" and master uranium enrichment.

U.S. Weighs Extra Steps On Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Amid signs of economic unease in Iran, the U.S. and its European partners are weighing another set of financial restrictions on Tehran, including the possibility of targeting companies run by the country's elite Revolutionary Guard Corps.

· The Goal: Officials from the U.S. and Europe say that U.N. sanctions on Iran are working and plan to pursue further financial restrictions in the Security Council to force Tehran to the negotiating table.

· The Alternative: If the Security Council doesn't act, as is likely, the Bush administration will take its own measures, and is keen to find ways to home in on the growing business operations of the Revolutionary Guard, Iran's paramilitary force.

· The Hurdle: Despite rising friction among various factions in Iran over how to proceed on the nuclear front, there are few suggestions so far that the Iranian government plans to bend.

U.S. and European officials say that the move toward a second round of United Nations sanctions, which would likely involve freezing the overseas assets of certain Iranian companies or individuals, reflects their cautious optimism that sustained pressure on Tehran might succeed in bringing the country to the negotiating table over its nuclear program. International financial restrictions, including a U.N. package in December, have stirred significant debate within Iran about the wisdom of confrontation with the outside world, as the economy there begins to show signs of distress.

Bush administration officials say they are also considering ways for the U.S. to ramp up pressure on its own if countries within the U.N. Security Council balk at sterner steps, as is likely. The administration is particularly keen to find ways to home in on the growing business operations of the Revolutionary Guard, the country's secretive paramilitary force also known as the IRGC.

Keeping up the pressure may not be easy. Of the five permanent members of the Security Council, France, Britain and the U.S. are eager to push ahead on a second resolution and have already begun to consider some potential targets. But China and, above all, Russia are wary of pushing too hard. "Russia will control the pace of things going forward," said one U.S. official.

The December resolution gave Iran a 60-day ultimatum to freeze its uranium-enrichment work or face stiffer economic sanctions. The West alleges Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian nuclear program; Iran insists it is developing an independent energy source. The U.N. deadline lapsed yesterday, without any signs of compromise from Iran.

Despite rising friction among various factions in Iran over how to proceed on the nuclear front, there are few suggestions so far that the Iranian government plans to bend. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said earlier this week that Iran might be willing to suspend its uranium-enrichment work if other countries did the same, an offer the U.S. quickly rejected. Yesterday, he said in a speech that the U.S. and others will not "thwart the will of the Iranian nation to achieve the peaceful use of nuclear technology."

Still, the combination of U.N. sanctions and more-focused U.S. financial actions has already scared away some international business from Iran and increased the cost for Iran of conducting international trade. Recent U.S. moves to isolate Iranian banks and companies from international financial circles have led several major European banks to cut off their operations in Iran. So far, European trade with Iran hasn't slumped substantially.

Current and former U.S. officials say they are now focusing on how to combat the IRGC, which is seen as the power base behind Mr. Ahmadinejad's presidency and the central Iranian player supporting militant Islamist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas. The IRGC is also central to Tehran's pursuit of unconventional weaponry, and it has increasingly taken a leading role in Tehran's business activities, particularly gaining concessions in lucrative oil and gas deposits, U.S. officials say.

The December U.N. resolution singled out the financial assets of two of the IRGC's top leaders, Major Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi and IRGC Air Force chief Gen. Hosein Salimi. It alleged that both are aiding Iran's pursuit of nuclear technologies and long-range missiles.

Some U.S. officials now want to expand these sanctions to target the financial assets of the IRGC. These officials argue that the listing of the two IRGC leaders in the December resolution gives the international community legal grounds to try to freeze all IRGC assets internationally. The IRGC's oil and gas investments are seen as particularly vulnerable, because they often would involve foreign partners or foreign financing to succeed. Some U.S. officials believe many Iranians would support sanctions against the IRGC, because the organization is gaining a greater hold over Iran's overall economy.

Singling out the IRGC "buttresses domestic criticism of the regime's cronyism; and it pulls at the purse strings of the specific element of the Iranian bureaucracy responsible for the region's most egregious behavior," said Matthew Levitt, who served as the Treasury's deputy assistant secretary for intelligence and analysis until last month.

Some U.S. and European officials working on Iran said there isn't yet a consensus internationally or in Washington to challenge the IRGC directly. Others disagree over whether the U.N. mandate provides the legal grounds to try to freeze the IRGC's assets, while some U.S. diplomats worry that taking a confrontational stance against the IRGC risks undermining continuing efforts to find a negotiated settlement over Iran's nuclear program.

A second U.N. sanctions resolution would most likely seek to expand the list of targeted Iranian companies and individuals whose assets abroad would be frozen, U.S. and European officials said. The U.S. may try to include more IRGC officials, or even IRGC companies, on an expanded list, although that debate has yet to begin among U.N. Security Council members, which would need to approve any new sanctions on Iran.

The December resolution demanded that countries freeze the assets of 10 companies and organizations and 12 individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. That list was the result of months of debate between the U.S., Britain, France and Germany on one side, and Russia on the other. China was less involved in the negotiations. Moscow, in particular, resisted the imposition of any restrictions that would take aim at Iran's economy generally or that would impede its continuing construction of a nuclear-energy plant in Iran.

Iran's President Vows To Keep Enriching Uranium Despite Expiration Of U.N. Deadline To Stop (NYT)

By Graham Bowley And Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

Unbowed by international pressure, Iran's president vowed yesterday to press ahead with the country's uranium enrichment program, even as a United Nations deadline to shut the program down passed.

DOJ_NMG_0135349

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran had a right to pursue nuclear technology and "will continue our work to reach our right in the shortest possible time," according to the ISNA news agency. Speaking in Siahkal in northern Iran, Mr. Ahmadinejad said, "Obtaining this technology is very important for our country's development and honor."

The United Nations seems unlikely to take swift action, because of a sense that the limited sanctions already imposed on Iran by the Security Council are working. Two Council ambassadors in New York and officials in Washington indicated that Iran's stance had become less truculent and more flexible.

A report by the International Atomic Energy Agency, expected to be released today, will detail the extent of Iran's compliance with the United Nations demands.

The report may intensify the debate among Western governments about whether to impose more punishing sanctions. It may also deepen the debate within the Bush administration over whether and when to take military action.

Though Mr. Ahmadinejad took a hard line yesterday, he has said in recent days that Iran is prepared to negotiate and offered to stop enriching uranium if Western nations did the same — a proposal that the Bush administration dismissed out of hand.

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said yesterday. "It's pretty clear that the international community has said to the Iranians, 'You can have nuclear power, but we don't want you to have the ability to build nuclear weapons.' And that is an offer we continue to make."

Germany, which along with France and Britain has led negotiations with Iran on behalf of the European Union, held out hope that talks could be reconvened, but only if Tehran sent clear signals of its sincerity.

American-led efforts to build pressure on Iran gained a prominent backer yesterday when India announced that it had banned the export of anything that could assist the Iranian nuclear program.

In contrast to past instances, when the United States and other countries have cited Iran's noncompliance as a reason for prompt international action, diplomats said that the only political conversations now in progress about Iran were taking place within national governments, and that United Nations ambassadors in New York had not yet met to discuss their ideas. They said efforts to formulate a United Nations response to the broken deadline would probably take many weeks.

A Dangerous Partnership (WSJ)

By Ilan Berman

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Financial pressure by the U.S. and other Western governments in recent weeks is beginning to have a real impact, chilling investment into Iran's energy sector and ratcheting up the costs of the regime's atomic effort. But these gains are in danger of being erased, thanks to the growing economic partnership between Tehran and Beijing.

In late December, China's third-largest national energy conglomerate, the China National Offshore Oil Corporation (Cnooc), signed a memorandum of understanding to develop Iran's massive North Pars natural gas field. Under the prospective deal, worth a whopping $16 billion, Cnooc would cooperate with the National Iranian Oil Company to develop and liquefy the field's estimated 80 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. At around the same time, another Chinese firm, PetroChina, inked a deal to annually import some three million tons of liquefied natural gas from Iran over a quarter-century. PetroChina's parent company, the China National Petroleum Corporation (CNPC), has followed suit, finalizing a $3.6 billion project to explore and exploit Iran's South Pars gas field.

In the process, Beijing has put the Bush administration on the horns of a major policy dilemma. The first part of the problem is practical. Cnooc is a publicly traded company on the New York Stock Exchange. So is PetroChina. As such, both potentially are subject to the provisions of the 1996 Iran-Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA), which is intended to curb Iran's "ability to support acts of international terrorism and to fund the development and acquisition of weapons of mass destruction and the means to deliver them." It does so by authorizing the White House to impose a number of concrete economic penalties -- from prohibitions on large-scale U.S. bank loans to restrictions on the procurement of goods -- on foreign corporations engaged in commerce in the U.S., which also do more than $20 million annually in business with Tehran. The message of the law, as written by Congress, was clear: You can trade with us, or with Iran, but not with both.

But when it comes to China, the situation is not so simple. Cnooc, PetroChina and CNPC are not just private entities; they are appendages of the Chinese Communist Party, and de facto instruments of its foreign policy. The application of sanctions against them, therefore, would be tantamount to an act of economic warfare -- and the Bush administration has little stomach for a trade war (or worse) with China.

The second issue is strategic. Already, other foreign multinationals have begun to take their cues from Beijing. Royal Dutch Shell has, along with Spain's Repsol, just concluded a preliminary agreement with the Iranian regime worth an estimated $4.3 billion for the construction of a liquefied natural gas plant and port terminal in the Islamic Republic. Malaysia's L1, meanwhile, recently signed a deal worth nearly $3 billion to build a refinery in Iran's Khuzestan province. Needless to say, these deals have struck a body blow to the recent progress made by Washington in isolating the Islamic Republic financially.

Reversing this trend is bound to be an uphill battle. Over the past decade, ILSA has been honored entirely in the breach, with the U.S. consistently failing to apply its provisions to foreign violators.

The one time that it came even remotely close to doing so was in 1998, against Russia's Gazprom, France's TotalFinaElf and Malaysia's Petronas. But the Clinton administration ultimately chose to waive ILSA provisions in the spirit of international cooperation -- and as a sop to the new, "reformist" government in Tehran. That decision became the model for subsequent violations by companies such as Italy's ENI, Canada's Sheer Energy and Norway's StatOil. Each time, Washington's calculus has been the same: bilateral trade over international security.

This is a major miscalculation. Bilateral sanctions are a critical tool in the U.S. economic arsenal. By actively enforcing such measures, policy makers in Washington have the ability to hammer home the point that trade with an increasingly intransigent Iranian regime is not cost-free -- and to force Iran's trading partners to choose between doing business with Tehran and conducting commerce with the U.S.

At the end of the day, China's economic interests are understandable. Runaway economic growth has brought with it a voracious appetite for energy, and Iran has emerged as one of China's largest oil suppliers. As a result, policy makers in Beijing have studiously avoided making a choice on Iran's nuclear program, even as they provide the Iranian regime with the economic tools to accelerate it.

The failure of the Bush administration to take Beijing to task, however, is far less comprehensible. U.S. policy must be geared toward making China and its economic fellow travelers aware of the gravity of the unfolding Iranian nuclear crisis -- and providing them with the political rationale to make the right choices about partnership with Tehran. Raising the costs for China to do business in the Islamic Republic seems like a very good place to start.

Splits Emerge Between U.S. And Europe Over Aid For Palestinians (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 21 — Fractures between the United States and Europe began to appear Wednesday over whether the new Palestinian unity government was likely to receive international economic support even as the Middle East peace negotiators officially continued their wait-and-see approach.

After the meeting here of representatives of the so-called quartet of Middle East peace negotiators — the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union — the group released a statement that “reaffirmed” its support for a Palestinian government that would recognize Israel and renounce violence.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said repeatedly that unless the new unity government meets those conditions, the United States will continue its economic boycott of the Palestinian government. So far, the Saudi-brokered government, which included the moderate president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and the militant Islamic movement Hamas, does not.

But European officials appeared more willing to hold out the possibility of finding members of a new unity government with whom to work. “There are ways that we can be flexible,” one European official said.

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, who has said that the United States and Europe should look for ways to engage Hamas, was pointed during a news conference about not threatening to continue the boycott if the new government did not recognize Israel.

The quartet communiqué said, “Clearly in this statement we support the formation of a new Palestinian government,” Mr. Lavrov said. “It was also underscored that further steps must be taken to support the Palestinians. One certainly shouldn’t speak of a boycott in this regard.”

In the United States Congress, Representative Nita M. Lowey, Democrat of New York, is blocking $86 million that the Bush administration wants to strengthen Mr. Abbas’s security forces. An aide to Ms. Lowey said she would lift the hold when the State Department provided guarantees that the money would be used only for nonlethal security assistance, like uniforms and communications equipment.

The United States and other Western countries cut off close to $1 billion in direct aid to the Palestinian government after Hamas won last year’s parliamentary elections.

DOJ_NMG_0135351

The United States will have a tough balancing act as it tries to keep the quartet united in an economic boycott of the Palestinian government while trying to bolster Mr. Abbas in peace talks with Israel. Those talks, which began Monday with a summit meeting between Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, ended a few hours later with little sign of progress.

Mr. Abbas has maintained that he agreed to the pact to end the violence between Hamas and Fatah, which has left more than 100 Palestinians dead.

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, Mr. Olmert said Wednesday that he was willing to meet "again and again" with Mr. Abbas. But he also made clear that serious peace negotiations were unlikely unless the Palestinian government was willing to recognize Israel.

"The agreement signed between Fatah and Hamas does not promise any change in the basic policy toward Israel," Mr. Olmert said at a news conference.

Hamas says it has no objections to Mr. Abbas's negotiating with Israel, but Mr. Abbas has limited authority, and Mr. Olmert indicated that would limit the scope of their discussions.

United Front On Unity Government (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 21 -- European and U.S. officials on Wednesday sought to play down emerging differences over the new Palestinian unity government during a meeting of a high-level group that monitors efforts to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The meeting of the Quartet -- made up of the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and the United States -- came as Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas started a tour of Europe to promote the unity accord he had reached with the Hamas militant group. He met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and also planned to visit Paris, Berlin and Brussels.

U.S. officials say they were surprised that Abbas struck the deal, which angered Israeli officials and cast a pall over a summit that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice brokered in Jerusalem this week between Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

European officials have been much more receptive to the unity government, saying it might be a way to encourage Hamas to eventually accept a peace deal. European officials note that some possible members of the government are seasoned and respected Palestinians with no links to terrorism.

"I hope very much that the national unity government will be part of the solution and not part of the problem," the E.U. foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said at a news conference after the meeting.

In a statement laden with diplomatic code words, the Quartet welcomed Rice's efforts and reaffirmed that a Palestinian government must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and honor previous agreements with Israel. But the group also said it was exploring an expansion of a European aid pipeline to the Palestinians.

In Israel, Olmert suggested to foreign journalists that Abbas, whose Fatah movement lost parliamentary elections to Hamas in January 2006, would not be able to enforce any agreement that emerged from peace talks with him. "A body which does not represent the majority today amongst the Palestinians will not be able to actually carry out any commitment that will make any such talks valuable or meaningful," Olmert said.

A day earlier, Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin, said that future contacts with Abbas, if he allows Fatah to join the Hamas-led unity government, would be limited to discussion of conflict-management issues such as prisoners and checkpoints and roadblocks in the occupied territories.

U.S. officials, distributing transcripts of Olmert's news conference, sought to emphasize that elsewhere in his remarks, Olmert did not close the door to the peace efforts launched by Rice. They noted that Olmert said he was "absolutely loyal" to eventually creating a Palestinian state.

An Israeli official, asked to explain Olmert's remarks on condition of anonymity, said the Israelis would continue bilateral discussions on fighting terrorism and improving life for the Palestinians, while keeping the door open to contacts with Abbas.

U.S. officials originally hoped that Abbas would be able to use a possible peace deal to defeat Hamas in another election. But those hopes were dashed when Abbas, saying he needed to end intra-Palestinian violence that has left scores dead, reached an accommodation with Hamas.

Quartet Plays Wait-and-see With Palestinian Government (AFP)

AFP, February 22, 2007

A meeting of the Quartet for Middle East peace wrapped up with major powers saying they will await the formation of the new Palestinian unity government before deciding whether to lift aid and diplomatic embargoes.

DOJ_NMG_0135352

The meeting was the second this month bringing together Russia, the European Union, the United States and the United Nations -- the Quartet behind the roadmap for Middle East peace drawn up in 2003.

But the two-hour talks left the diplomatic riddle posed by the power-sharing deal between Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas and the Islamist movement Hamas unsolved.

"We will make a decision when it is time to make a decision but there is not yet a Palestinian unity government," Rice said when asked about the Quartet's position on existing embargoes.

The statement, read by UN chief Ban Ki-moon, reiterated the Quartet's demands to begin normal diplomatic relations with the Palestinian Authority: recognising Israel, renouncing violence and honouring past agreements with the Jewish state, including the roadmap.

It added the Quartet agreed to continue to meet regularly and that the next gathering of the four powers would take place in the Middle East "soon."

Hamas, which the US, the European Union and Israel call a terrorist organisation, has not yet clearly agreed to the West's conditions.

Long an advocate of a softer line on Hamas than Washington has taken, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov chose to emphasise the Quartet's support of an end to the Palestinian power struggle.

"The statement that the UN Secretary General has just read is quite clear -- it supports the formation of a new Palestinian government and in this context it was underscored that further steps must be taken to support the Palestinians," he said, adding that the statement did not mention the boycott.

Rice, who is trying to convince her allies to withhold recognition of the unity government unless Hamas meets international principles for peace, said the Palestinian leadership should not expect any flexibility on the issue.

"When one talks about peace between Israelis and Palestinians, it has to be on the basis of internationally accepted principles," she said.

"How can it be that you have talks about peace if one party does not accept the right of the other party to exist? How can it be that you have discussions about peace when a party will not renounce violence?

"In that sense the complication of not fully having a Palestinian government that clearly accepts the Quartet principles I think should be well understood."

The embargo imposed by the Quartet after January 2006 elections that Hamas won has caused widespread economic hardship in the Palestinian areas and there is growing unease in Europe over the measures.

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana called on the Palestinian leadership to fulfill its international commitments to pave the way forward.

"I hope very much that the national unity government will be part of the solution and not part of the problem," he said.

A senior EU official said earlier that Europe tended to take a more positive view of the Palestinian unity government than the United States but added that all saw the inclusion of Hamas in the government as problematic.

"But nobody wants to give money to Hamas, nobody," the official said.

Rice also emphasized the importance of continuing to support Abbas in his power struggle with Iranian-backed Hamas.

Abbas, long portrayed by Washington as the best "partner for peace" with Israel, has embarked on a diplomatic offensive of his own. He is touring Europe to defend the unity government deal.

He insists the agreement reached between his Fatah faction and Hamas should satisfy the Quartet principles since it obliges the new unity government to respect international resolutions and agreements signed by the Fatah-led Palestine Liberation Organisation -- meaning deals with the Jewish state.

Rice held an inconclusive summit Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Palestinians earlier urged the Quartet powers to give their incoming government a chance.

"We hope the Quartet will take a positive approach towards the government and not resort to pressure and boycott," said Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led government.

Israel has ruled out dealing with any government that includes Hamas.

It reiterated its hope that the Quartet will stick to the conditions imposed on the Palestinian government for the aid boycott to be lifted.

"It is important and critical that the international community continues to respect these conditions, which are not negotiable," Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told army radio.

Russia And US Split Over Palestinian Unity Government (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135353

Russia and the US were at odds yesterday over relations with a planned Palestinian national unity government, revealing divisions that are likely to further hamper efforts to reinvigorate international backing for a Middle East peace initiative.

Ahead of a meeting in Berlin yesterday evening of the Middle East Quartet - comprising Russia, the European Union, the US and the UN - Russia's foreign minister, Sergei Lavrov, said pressure on the Palestinian Authority should be eased by lifting an aid embargo imposed when Hamas won elections last year.

He told a Russian newspaper: "I hope the Quartet will favour a lifting of the financial and economic sanctions . . . that will be the position of Russia, the EU and the UN secretary-general."

In contrast, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, speaking in Berlin ahead of the Quartet meeting, repeated the US's tough stance against Hamas, which it lists as a terrorist organisation. She brushed aside suggestions of easing sanctions, arguing that the principles established by the Quartet after the Hamas victory remained "critically important".

These require any PA government to recognise Israel, commit itself to non-violence and accept previous agreements, including those relating to the Quartet's own "road map".

The US and Israel have argued that a recent accord agreed in Mecca between Hamas and Fatah, led by Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, to establish a national unity government did not go far enough, as Hamas only agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel.

Ms Rice, who on Monday held largely fruitless talks with Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, and Mr Abbas, said she would not judge a unity government until it was formed, a process likely to take at least a month.

European politicians and the UN were more positive towards the Mecca agreement.

Ban Ki-moon, UN secretary-general, told journalists in Berlin it was "crucially important for the international community to encourage this Mecca deal".

Tony Blair, the British prime minister, said in London ahead of a meeting with Mr Abbas: "It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government . . I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas."

Blair Hints UK May Deal With Hamas (FT)

By Hugh Williamson And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

The UK on Wednesday indicated it could be prepared to do business with the Islamic group Hamas, in comments that underlined the growing difference in approach between Europe and the US on how best to pursue peace in the Middle East.

Speaking in London ahead of a meeting with Mahmoud Abbas, Palestinian Authority president, Tony Blair, British prime minister, welcomed the agreement earlier this month to form a Palestinian government of national unity. He even anticipated working with officials from Hamas, which agreed during talks in Mecca to set up the government with Mr Abbas's Fatah party.

"It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government," he said. "I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas."

By contrast, Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said earlier this month that her efforts to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian agreement had "been made more complicated by the unity government".

"We want to see this [unity] government in operation. We're not interested in the rhetoric, we're interested in its actions," said a British government official last night. "We have to find a way forward here, and if we find people we can do business with we have to work with that."

Many British and European officials say that their approach differs from that of the US and Israel, who are more focused on Hamas's anti-Israel programme and charter rather than on the possible behaviour of Hamas politicians while in government office.

After Hamas won parliamentary elections last year the international Quartet – comprising the European Union, the US, Russia and the United Nations – called for the Palestinian government to renounce violence, respect past peace agreements and recognise Israel.

Because of Hamas's failure to sign up to such principles, the US and the EU have refused to fund or establish contacts with the Hamas-led administration.

But some European officials now privately argue that the condition on recognising Israel was too stringent and that the US has an "unrealistic" attitude to negotiating with extremist groups.

Speaking ahead of a meeting of the Quartet in Berlin yesterday evening, Sergei Lavrov, Russia's foreign minister, added that the aid embargo should be lifted.

DOJ_NMG_0135354

But Ms Rice repeated the US's tough stance against Hamas, which it lists as a terrorist organisation. She brushed aside suggestions of easing sanctions, arguing that the principles established by the Quartet after the Hamas victory remained "critically important".

The US and Israel have argued that the accord reached in Mecca to establish a national unity government does not go far enough, as Hamas only agreed to "respect" existing agreements with Israel.

Ms Rice, who on Monday held largely fruitless talks with Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister, and Mr Abbas, said she would not judge a unity government until it was formed, a process likely to take at least a month.

Germany Urges Tamer Mideast Expectations (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 22, 2007

Germany's foreign minister warned Wednesday against building unrealistic expectations for a U.S.-backed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Still, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier cheered the effort led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who came to Europe to report on her meeting Monday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"We have to show a great deal of realism," and not get ahead of what is still a tentative but hopeful process, Steinmeier said following a meeting with Rice.

He acknowledged, as Rice has done, that peace prospects are clouded by uncertainty over the political role of Palestinian Hamas militants.

Asked about Britain's decision to pull some 1,600 troops from Iraq, Rice said the move is consistent with the U.S. plan to turn over more control to Iraqi forces when possible.

"The British have done what is really the plan for the country as a whole, which is to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqis as the situation permits," Rice said at a press conference with Steinmeier.

"The coalition remains intact and, in fact, the British still have thousands of troops deployed in Iraq," she said.

Prime Minister Tony Blair said earlier in the day that Britain would withdraw around 1,600 troops from Iraq over the coming months and aims to cut its 7,100 troop levels to below 5,000 by late summer.

Rice and Abbas were holding separate meetings in Berlin on a new power-sharing deal between Hamas and the moderate, Western-backed Abbas.

The deal, although not final, falls far short of international demands that Hamas drop its signature anti-Israeli policies. Hamas has refused to bend despite a boycott of vital international aid.

Diplomats from the United States, Europe, Russia and the United Nations were conferring Wednesday on the changed circumstances since Abbas announced the agreement two weeks ago. The group, known collectively as the Quartet, are stewards of a mothballed 2003 peace plan that would eventually establish an independent Palestinian state.

The United States pointed to positive momentum from Monday's talks in Jerusalem, despite few obvious signs of progress. Israel balked at pursuing far-reaching peace proposals with Abbas, following his Fatah faction's power-sharing deal with Hamas, which refuses to recognize the Jewish state.

On Tuesday, Israel ruled out holding further Mideast peace talks with Abbas once he forms a coalition with Hamas militants, saying the new unity government must go along with international demands to recognize Israel's right to exist.

Rice and Abbas met separately in Amman on Tuesday with Jordan's King Abdullah II. Abbas said after the meeting that Monday's summit had been "tense and difficult" but "it was not a failure, and it will be followed by other meetings."

Abbas planned to fly to Germany, Britain and France on a campaign to convince European leaders — whom the Palestinians hope are wavering on the economic boycott — that the unity deal was a major victory that should be rewarded.

He said Israel may have "misunderstood" the coalition deal, which "was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," according to Jordan's official Petra news agency.

But Israel remained adamant.

"The agreements between Hamas and Abu Mazen disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Tuesday, referring to Abbas by his nickname.

Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokeswoman, ruled out holding any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he formed a new Cabinet that included Hamas.

Israel would continue to deal with Abbas, but only on such matters as improving Palestinians' living conditions and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel — not on a final peace deal.

Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just For Jews (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 22, 2007

A manifesto argues that the nation's minority is entitled to share power in a binational state.

NAZARETH, ISRAEL — A broadly representative elite of Israel's Arab minority has rejected the idea of Israel as a Jewish state and demanded a partnership in governing the country to ensure that Arab citizens get equal treatment and more control over their communities.

In a manifesto that is stirring anger and soul-searching among Jews, Arab leaders have declared that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens are an indigenous group with collective rights, not just individual rights. The document argues that Arabs are entitled to share power in a binational state and block policies that discriminate against them.

Arab citizens, who make up about one-fifth of Israel's population, have always felt alienated by the Star of David on Israel's flag and a national anthem that expresses the Jewish yearning for a return to Zion. They have long protested the disproportionate Jewish share of budget resources, public services and land.

Until now, though, only small groups of Arab intellectuals had dared to advocate collective equality or the abolition of Jewish national symbols.

"The Future Vision of the Palestinian Arabs in Israel" is the first such sweeping demand by Israel's Arab mainstream. The manifesto was drafted by 40 academics and activists under the sponsorship of the Committee of Arab Mayors in Israel and has been endorsed by an unprecedented range of Arab community leaders.

As such, it has set off alarms.

As Jewish leaders learned of the document, which was issued in December but not widely circulated until last month, they seized on it as evidence of a growing militancy by a minority that, by and large, openly sympathized with Hezbollah guerrillas fighting Israel in last summer's war in Lebanon.

The document does not address the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But critics argue that adoption of its proposal to redefine Israel as a binational state would undermine Jewish support for a separate Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a solution to which Israel's government is formally committed.

Commentators on the right have denounced the manifesto as the work of an internal enemy that threatens Israel's identity as a haven for Jewish self-determination. On the left, Jews who have advocated equal treatment of Arabs within a Jewish state say they feel disheartened.

"Is this the beginning of a new demand for the establishment of a state within a state?" Hagai Meirom, treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel, asked at a public forum last month. "Is it still possible to mend the Arab minority's feelings of belonging?"

The document's sponsors say most of the criticism misses the point.

Shawki Khatib, head of the 64-member Arab mayors group, said the manifesto was not an ultimatum but an effort to catalog Jewish discrimination against Arabs and provoke debate over how Israel's two largest communities should live together.

"The main message is that we do not accept our situation as second-class citizens," Khatib said in an interview at the group's headquarters here. "We want to change that situation, and we prefer to change it through dialogue."

He said he would invite Israeli officials to take part in an assembly next month to discuss the eight-chapter document.

The walls outside Khatib's office display mementos of Arab alienation. One poster reads "We will not forget" alongside portraits of 13 Israeli Arabs killed by riot police in October 2000 while demonstrating in solidarity with a Palestinian uprising.

Driving home from Nazareth, Khatib stopped his car to illustrate another grievance: entrenched discrimination that contributes to sharp inequalities between Israeli Arabs and Jews.

Across the highway from Yaffa a-Nasra, the Arab village he has governed for 16 years, Khatib pointed to a modern industrial park, home to electronic and biotechnology plants. It lies within the Jewish municipality of Migdal Emek.

"Whenever the central government builds a new industrial area, it gets located in a Jewish town instead of an Arab town," he said. "The Israeli towns get the local tax revenue and the jobs. Look, this highway separates our reality from theirs."

Central government allocations for public services further skew the income gap. In public education, for example, the state invests about twice as much per Jewish pupil as per Arab pupil.

Nearly half of Israel's Arabs live below the poverty line, and their rates of unemployment and infant mortality are twice the national average. They face obstacles securing residency permits for Arab spouses who are not Israeli. Exempt from military service, they do not qualify for thousands of higher-paying jobs reserved for veterans. They make up only 10% of Israel's university undergraduates.

In Israel, A Chasm Widens (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Growing mistrust between Israel's Jews and its 1.3 million Arab citizens is testing a political and social fabric already strained by six years of violence and war between Israel and its Arab neighbors, including the Palestinians.

The deepening divide has come into sharper focus here since an Israeli-Arab cleric sent chills across the nation last weekend by calling for a new "intifada," or uprising, in response to construction work near one of the most revered holy sites for both Muslims and Jews. As a result, controversy over Raad Salah, a bespectacled Islamist whose sharp jaw is framed by a white-tipped silver beard he wears sans moustache, is casting both a spotlight and a shadow on Israeli Arabs.

The nation's biggest minority group, long tolerated though neglected, has begun to buck what many feel is its second-class status in a state where public life is suffused with Jewish identity. Unlike Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and West Bank -- territories long controlled by Israel -- the Arabs within Israel itself are legally entitled to full citizenship and all the rights that carries.

Israeli Jews find questions about the fundamental identity of their state jarring, though. They are also increasingly fearful of growing religiosity and radicalism among Arab citizens.

"Most organizations dealing with coexistence are now motivated by a deep sense that things have gotten worse and are on the edge," says Avi Melamed, a former counterterrorism official who was an adviser on Arab affairs to two Jerusalem mayors, including Ehud Olmert, now Israel's prime minister.

More disturbing to others is what they don't see. "There is almost no institutionalized dialogue between the Arab community and the state of Israel," says Mohammad Darawshe, a director at the Abraham Fund Initiatives, an Israeli nonprofit group that works to bring Arabs and Jews together.

To many Jewish leaders, the rise of Mr. Salah, who heads a growing faction of the Islamist movement in Israel, confirms their worst fears about a "fifth column" attacking from within. This notion now seems to be part of the mainstream political dialogue, although it was once thought by some to be too impolitic to utter in polite conversation.

But Israeli-Arab leaders and many Jews working for coexistence recoil from the idea that roughly one-fifth of Israel's population could be broadly brushed as a security threat. They also say Mr. Salah and other Islamists are able to capitalize on decades of discrimination within Israeli society and the resulting inequities, which Islamists fill through their own social programs.

Leaders say tensions now appear to be higher than at any time since October 2000. That is when pressure swirling around the Temple Mount -- almost identical in nature, though not scope, to protests Mr. Salah has been leading for two weeks -- sparked what became known as the al-Aqsa Intifada, or the Second Intifada. The ensuing war between Palestinian militant groups and Israel left thousands dead. In the Galilee region of the north, where Arab cities are concentrated, a dozen unarmed Israeli-Arab citizens were killed by police gunfire during eight days of protests and riots as the intifada began. "It was a major break point, and things have gotten worse," Mr. Melamed says.

A government investigative panel looked behind the troubles, concluding in 2003 that Israel's relationship with its Arab minority was "primarily neglectful and discriminatory." It also said Israel, home to nearly five million Jews, didn't do nearly enough to allocate equal resources to Arab towns, where it said there were substantially defective infrastructures and "serious problems in the education system."

There was also a communal loss of faith, according to Mr. Darawshe and Baker Awawdy, who lives in an Arab village near Nazareth and is executive director of the all-volunteer Center for the Struggle Against Racism. Jews stopped shopping in Arab cities and villages, wounding local Arab economies and straining personal ties between the two communities. On a political level, Israeli Jews also increasingly saw Arabs as disloyal, says Mr. Melamed, because so many Arabs expressed sympathy with Palestinians in the territories during the intifada. Arabs remain outraged that no Israeli police officer ever faced charges for the killings of unarmed citizens in Galilee. Mr. Salah was arrested and imprisoned in 2003 for his own alleged disloyalty after authorities accused him of having contact with a foreign agent and giving money to Hamas, the Palestinian Islamist movement. Mr. Salah was released from prison in 2005 and immediately resumed his fiery condemnations of Israel.

While his venom was extreme, he was hardly alone among Israeli Arabs criticizing state policies. Divisions deepened last summer when Arabs objected to the 34-day war with Hezbollah in Lebanon, even as Arab towns in northern Israel were among those showered by Hezbollah rockets. Some Israeli-Arab politicians were even seen as backing Hezbollah, a Shiite Muslim group with political, militant and social-services wings.

Mr. Olmert, the Israeli prime minister, then seemingly confirmed the worst fears of Arabs. Politically weakened by the war, he formed a ruling coalition with the right-wing Yisrael Beiteinu party. It literally translates into, "Israel is our home," and the party's leaders have publicly advocated the forced removal of Israeli-Arab citizens to the Palestinian territories.

Last year, more than three dozen of the Israeli-Arab community's most prominent leaders fired a new salvo. In a rare show of unity, they issued a document called The Future Vision. It demanded that Israel shed its existence as a "Jewish state" in order to become a truly inclusive and consensual democracy for Arabs and Jews. "It was the first time we, as a community, came together -- not to say what we didn't want, but to declare what we did want," says Mr. Awawdy. The report almost immediately drew ire from Jews. Many condemned Arab leaders for rejecting the fundamental basis of the nation as a Jewish state.

But one prominent Israeli-Arab group publicly declared that the report didn't represent its views: Mr. Salah's Islamic Movement. More and more, his group is tending to social needs -- primarily in education and health care -- that the state of Israel has left unattended. "After years of our crying and wailing, we in the Islamic Movement moved to do something about this," explains Marwan Jabareh, a representative of the group in Tamra, a Galilee Arab city of roughly 30,000 people.

Evidence of that commitment stands at the bottom of a slope within the maze of the city's narrow streets: a 43,000-square-foot hospital built with $4 million of charitable funds, set to open in March.

Meanwhile, Mr. Salah is under investigation for alleged incitement for his fiery words. It seems highly unlikely that Israeli-Arab citizens will respond to his entreaty with violence akin to that experienced here during the height of intifada. Although there have been several instances of providing support for terrorists, the number of Israeli Arabs who have actually engaged in terrorist acts is negligible, according to Mr. Melamed and others.

US Lashes Out At Kremlin Over Missiles (FT)

By Daniel Dombey, Hugh Williamson And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Tensions intensified on Wednesday over US plans for missile defence bases in Poland and the Czech Republic, as Washington called on Europe to take a tougher stance towards the Kremlin.

The Bush administration's two top foreign policy officials lashed out at Moscow's campaign against the bases, which Washington insists are aimed at possible threats from Iran rather than Russia.

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, said the suggestion this week by Russia's head of strategic rocket forces that Russia could target the two central European countries if they agreed to host the bases was "very unfortunate".

She also dismissed comments by Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Germany's foreign minister, who said this week Moscow should have been consulted more about the sites, given their proximity to Russia's borders.

Standing next to Mr Steinmeier at a press conference in Berlin, she said Washington had "10 formal contacts" with Russia on the plan since spring 2006, many at ministerial level.

Mr Steinmeier's spokesman said the minister was aware that "technical talks" had taken place between Moscow and Washington, but said he had been warning against a return to the type of security stand-offs of the cold war era.

Separately in Brussels, Stephen Hadley, US national security adviser, emphasised Washington's dismay at a speech this month in which Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, hit out at the missile defence plans and the US's "unilateral" use of force.

"You heard a set of comments in which quite frankly we were disappointed," Mr Hadley told the Financial Times and other European newspapers, between meetings with Nato ambassadors and Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief.

"I think a lot of Europeans were disappointed and dismayed. And one of the things that Europeans need to do is they need to make that clear to Russia and they need to make that clear to President Putin."

The EU has consistently struggled to forge a common line on Russia. Countries such as Poland, which are suspicious of the Kremlin's intentions, are pitted against big western European states such as Germany and France, which are often keen to deepen ties with Moscow.

General Yuri Baluyevsky, Russia's army chief of staff, yesterday told Rossiiskaya Gazeta, a government newspaper, the missile defence system "cannot be viewed as anything other than a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence" in Europe.

Rice Slams Russian General Over Comments (AP)

By David McHugh

AP, February 22, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Wednesday called a Russian general's warning that Poland and the Czech Republic risk being targeted if they host U.S. missile defense bases "extremely unfortunate."

Rice also repeated assurances the system does not threaten Russia.

Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, head of Russia's strategic missile forces, said Monday that Russia might train its missiles on the two countries if they accept a U.S. proposal to base 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar in the Czech Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0135358

"I think that was an extremely unfortunate comment," Rice said at a news conference in Berlin, adding that the system did not threaten Moscow's forces "and we have had the opportunity to explain that to Russia."

She said the U.S. has made clear to Russia that the system would be to counter any missile threat from Iran. The system is too small to stop Russia's large nuclear arsenal, she said.

"Anyone who knows anything about this knows that there is no way that 10 interceptors ... are a threat to Russia or that they are somehow going to diminish Russia's deterrent of thousands of warheads," Rice said.

"I think everyone understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem," she added.

The missile dispute is chilling relations between Moscow and Washington already damaged by differences over NATO's eastward expansion and U.S. concerns over human rights in Russia.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow sees the establishment of the missile defense sites as a signal that the United States wants to gain nuclear superiority over Russia. He dismissed U.S. claims that it was to counter Iranian threats.

"If they talk about potential threats coming from Iran or North Korea, missile defense elements should be located in a different place," Lavrov said in an interview published Wednesday in the daily Rossiyskaya Gazeta. "We can't help noting that these facilities would be capable of intercepting missiles launched from Russia."

Lavrov said that having the ability to shoot down Russian missiles could allow the United States to consider the possibility of a nuclear strike on Russia without fear of retaliation.

He referred to the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty that Washington quit in order to develop missile defenses, saying that it banned missile defense systems on the assumption that the fear of retaliation would prevent each nation from launching a first strike.

"Since protection from the first strike would be guaranteed, as American strategists apparently expect, another temptation arises — to be the first to launch a strike, aware that a chance has emerged to go unpunished," Lavrov said.

The system consists of interceptor rockets that release a small kill vehicle which maneuvers into the path of oncoming warheads and destroys them in a high-speed collision. Critics say the system has not been convincingly shown to work.

The defensive shield would protect Europe and the eastern United States, complementing bases at Fort Greely, Alaska, and at Vandenberg Air Force Base in California, which are positioned to guard from any North Korean missile launch.

Russian President Vladimir Putin warned earlier this month that the U.S. plan risks provoking a new arms race.

Lavrov followed up on Putin's warning that Russia would take countermeasures in response to the U.S. missile sites deployment in Europe.

"We will respond, of course, but without any hysteria. We can't afford being entangled in an arms race once again," he said.

He said that Russia and the United States must negotiate new arms control agreements to improve mutual trust, particularly as a landmark Soviet-era nuclear arms reduction treaty expires in 2009.

Russian officials have called for negotiations on a replacement for START I, signed in 1991 by the United States and the Soviet Union, which limits the number of various types of vehicles and warheads that can be deployed by either side.

U.S. Tries To Ease Concerns In Russia On Antimissile Plan (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 21 — Bush administration officials tried Wednesday to tamp down Russian concerns, voiced in strikingly harsh terms, over American plans to base missile defenses in Eastern Europe.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the missile defense proposal, which calls for deploying 10 interceptors in Poland and radar in the Czech Republic, was solely intended to counter the possible development of long-range Iranian missiles.

“I think everybody understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem,” she said, adding that the system would not “diminish Russia’s deterrent of thousands of warheads.”

The debate escalated this week when the Russian missile commander, Gen. Nikolai Y. Solovtsov, threatened to aim Russian weapons at states in Eastern Europe that might join the program.

“If the government of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision — and I think mutual consultations that have been held and will be held will allow avoiding this — the strategic missile troops will be able to have those facilities as targets,” he said.

And on Wednesday, the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, who has a prickly relationship at best with Ms. Rice, was quoted in Rossiiskaya Gazeta, the Russian state newspaper, wholly contradicting the American position.

"We must acknowledge that these objects are fully suitable to intercept missiles fired from Russian territory," he said.

His colleague, the departing Russian defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, has said that Russia could easily overwhelm the American defenses with a far cheaper system of countermeasures to blind or confuse an antimissile system.

During a stopover in Brussels on Wednesday on his way to Moscow, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said a missile defense system against Iran "is a reasonable thing to do, it's something Europe ought to be interested in, it's something that Russia ought to be interested in." Iran might even decide not to try to build long-range missiles once the system was in place, he suggested.

Ambassador Victoria Nuland, the United States representative to NATO, said Russia had no cause to express surprise, as representatives from Moscow and the European allies were briefed regularly on the project over the past year.

In November, the NATO-Russia Council received what Ms. Nuland called "a full technical briefing" from Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director of the Missile Defense Agency, and Eric S. Edelman, the under secretary of defense for policy.

But the administration is concerned about growing criticism of the program. Officials scheduled a briefing by General Obering on Thursday for foreign reporters based in Washington. Joining him will be Daniel Fried, the assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs.

The antimissile interceptors, General Obering said last month, "are geared toward and are directed toward rogue nation capabilities, obviously not sophisticated ballistic missile fleets such as the Russians have." He said they "cannot physically catch the Russian ICBMs even if we were trying to target those missiles" because of the short distances and flight times from Russian silos in relation to Poland.

The debate began this month with a caustic speech by President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, who told an audience in Munich that the United States was provoking a new nuclear arms race. He also criticized the expansion of NATO.

Senior Bush administration officials attending the security conference in Munich and those back in Washington conferred on the proper response, and they decided to push back — but only gently.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates rewrote his own speech, delivered a day after Mr. Putin's, to say that the Russian president's comments brought a certain nostalgia for a simpler time, but that "one cold war was quite enough."

Angela E. Stent, director of the Center for Eurasian, Russian and East European Studies at Georgetown University, said the Bush administration had "already been reassessing our policy toward Russia, as we have understood at least since January of 2006 or even before that there is a newly self-confident Russia, a Russia that is awash in petrodollars and a Russia that really feels it can say no and pursue its own interests."

Ms. Stent said the Bush administration was well aware that the Russian agenda on Syria, Hamas, Venezuela and a number of issues parted with Washington's. But she said it was worth seeking cooperation, in particular on counterterrorism.

Before he left for Moscow, Mr. Hadley said there were "a number of areas where Russia and the United States and Europe can cooperate productively, where we have common interests, where we can cooperate and are cooperating." These include terrorism and nuclear proliferation.

But the administration is pressing Moscow on other issues of concern, including its use of its energy resources as a political tool, its crackdown on civil liberties and press freedoms and its pressure on Russia's southern neighbors, in particular Georgia.

Rice: Missile-defense Criticism 'Unfortunate' (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

The war of words between the United States and Russia over U.S. missile-defense plans in Central Europe escalated yesterday, with Western diplomats saying that Moscow's mistrust and suspicion of Washington -- and the West in general -- have changed little since the Cold War.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice rejected a threat by Gen. Nikolay Solovtsov, commander of Russia's strategic forces, against Poland and the Czech Republic as future hosts of a U.S. missile shield as "extremely unfortunate."

"I think it is unfortunate that the Russian head of strategic rocket forces would come out and say that somehow Poland and the Czech Republic would now be on the target list of Russia," Miss Rice said in Berlin yesterday.

Gen. Solovtsov's comments on Monday followed remarks by Russian President Vladimir Putin in Munich earlier this month, as well as by other Russian officials, lambasting U.S. foreign policy as destabilizing and threatening world peace and security.

Several senior U.S. officials said they have no idea where those belligerent outbursts are coming from, given what they described as a businesslike and professional attitude the Russians have been displaying in private meetings.

Although many of those sessions, especially the high-level ones, often begin with a laundry list of complaints about U.S. actions, the Americans usually answer all of the Russians' questions and concerns, and the Russians understand those answers even if they disagree with them, officials said.

A spokesman for the Russian Embassy did not return phone calls seeking a comment on the matter.

After Moscow accused Washington of not being transparent enough about its missile-defense plans, which Russia fears will target its territory, U.S. officials insisted that they have briefed their Russian counterparts repeatedly during the past year.

"These discussions go back to the spring of 2006. We have had no less than 10 formal contacts with the Russians about the missile-defense deployment and the prospective deployment in Poland and in the Czech Republic of interceptors in Poland and radar sites in the Czech Republic," Miss Rice said yesterday.

"These discussions have gone all the way to the level of minister of defense," she said. "I myself have discussed this with Russian officials several times in more informal settings. We've had briefings of the NATO-Russia Council."

U.S. officials also say that the system would defend against rogue states and terrorists -- not Russia.

"Everybody understands that with a growing Iranian missile threat, which is quite pronounced, that there need to be ways to deal with that problem and that we are talking about long lead times to be able to have a defensive counter to offensive-missile threats," Miss Rice said.

Diplomats and analysts said that the Russians' recent comments make sense in a domestic political context, but the question is whether the Kremlin really thinks the West is still trying to squeeze and intimidate Russia.

"The Russians are working hard to create this beautifully constructed, conspiracy-laden narrative that the West is on a mission to encircle them and weaken their global influence," said Julianne Smith, director of the European program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, who attended the Munich forum where Mr. Putin spoke.

"All that plays perfectly with domestic audiences, but the mystery is that Putin's ratings are extremely high, and he doesn't need this," she said. "I worry that [the tension] will escalate even more with no real substance to it."

N Korea To Reveal Extent Of Uranium Activity (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, February 22, 2007

Suspicions over whether Pyongyang has been running a secret uranium enrichment programme are back in the spotlight after last week's apparent breakthrough in the long-running North Korean nuclear crisis.

Just as concerns about possible uranium enrichment triggered the current crisis, they are again threatening to undermine the agreement under which North Korea will receive step-by-step rewards in return for declaring and then disabling its nuclear weapons programme.

The issue could be a "deal breaker", says William Perry, the US defence secretary under President Bill Clinton. "Much more remains to be done. Two months from now, we will know whether we have a reasonable probability of completing the agreement."

In an eleventh-hour deal forged in Beijing last week, North Korea agreed to shut and seal its main Yongbyon nuclear plant, provide a list of its nuclear programmes and disable all facilities as it moves towards total "abandonment".

But the details are to be ironed out by lower-level working groups, due to convene shortly. Among those, according to Chun Yung-woo, Seoul's nuclear negotiator, would be a disclosure by North Korea of "how much progress the country has made on its uranium programme".

The current nuclear crisis erupted in October 2002, when Washington charged Pyongyang with obtaining uranium enrichment technology from A Q Khan, the rogue Pakistani scientist, and operating a secret enrichment programme.

James Kelly, the chief US nuclear negotiator at the time, said the North Koreans admitted the charge but Pyongyang has denied having any such programme.

The stand-off led the US to cancel a Clinton-era oil-for-nuclear-freeze agreement and caused North Korea to expel international inspectors and withdraw from the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. North Korea has since separately reprocessed enough spent plutonium fuel rods to have fissile material to spare for last October's nuclear test.

With the US having staked the entire nuclear issue on the uranium claim and North Korea continuing to deny the existence of any such programme, diplomats are seeking ways to prevent the issue derailing the first signs of progress in years.

A senior Washington official said that North Korea objected to the uranium question being included in last week's agreement.

"Since they insisted they do not have a [highly enriched uranium] programme they did not want that in the agreement, but they have agreed to the working group," he said. "We want to run this [highly enriched uranium] thing into the ground."

DOJ_NMG_0135361

The Bush administration had already “backed down” on the uranium issue, said Joel Wit, a former State Department official who helped negotiate the nuclear-freeze deal with North Korea in 1994. “This is not because the administration has become wimpish and has decided to put it aside, but because they did not have any information and started to wonder whether they had been accurate in the first place,” he said.

There is evidence that North Korea acquired the centrifuges needed to enrich uranium to weapons grade from Pakistan.

“They probably have some centrifuges set up and they have certainly done some research but as far as having a large scale facility up and running, that is probably in the distant future,” said Daniel Pinkston of the Centre for Nonproliferation Studies in Monterey, California.

Jonathan Pollack, a professor at the US Naval War College, dismissed the concern that North Korea might ultimately use uranium as an alternative source of fissile material.

“Pyongyang pursued this option in transactions with A Q Khan; it also sought to procure substantial quantities of industrial materials needed for an enrichment programme through black markets in Europe,” he wrote in the Asia Policy journal. “Yet there is still no definitive evidence of a proven production capability, and it is possible that North Korea long ago shelved major efforts to develop one.”

¦ North Korea can make a nuclear warhead that can be mounted on missiles capable of hitting all of South Korea and most of Japan, according to a report by a Washington-based think-tank.

Two US nuclear experts from the Institute for Science and International Security who visited North Korea's atomic facilities said the country had separated enough plutonium for five to 12 nuclear weapons.

North Korea Accuses U.S. Of Fabricating Lies (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, February 22, 2007

North Korea accused the United States of fabricating lies that it was diverting U.N. aid money to develop nuclear weapons and said it would accept an outside audit of U.N. operations unless the aim was to politicize aid to the country, according to a letter circulated Wednesday.

In the letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon accused the United States of "hostile maneuvers" against his country in seeking an audit of the alleged misuse of aid money from the U.N. Development Program, known as UNDP.

Last month, the United States accused UNDP of funneling millions of dollars in cash aid to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's government to be used for "its own illicit purposes" including possible nuclear weapons development. The U.S. demanded an outside audit, and Ban immediately ordered external audits of all U.N. programs in North Korea.

Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. Mission, said he had no immediate comment because U.S. diplomats had not seen the letter.

Pak said aid projects conducted by UNDP and other U.N. agencies in the North "have been carried out in a fair and transparent way, in conformity with United Nations regulations."

"Therefore, we do not mind whether the external audit is being done or not," he said.

Pak also made clear that North Korea wants to continue cooperation with U.N. agencies, noting that Pyongyang has maintained "good relations and cooperation" with them for several decades.

"But if the above-mentioned external audit is to serve the attempt by the United States to politicize international aid to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, we will not tolerate it and the consequences will be severe," he warned, using the country's official name.

Neither the U.S. nor UNDP would give a figure of how much money was involved in the alleged diversion. UNDP said last month that from 1997 through 2006, the executive board authorized more than $59 million for North Korea but only about $27.7 million was delivered.

Pak noted that UNDP has denied the U.S. allegation that money was illegally diverted.

"Last January, from dirty political motives, the United States fabricated lies that the Democratic People's Republic of Korea might have used the UNDP aid funds for the development of nuclear weapons without foundation and demanded investigation of the UNDP aid activities in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea," he said.

"As UNDP has denied, the allegations of the United States are sheer fiction aimed at politicizing international aid to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea," Pak said.

Why US Is Now Turning To Diplomacy (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

DOJ_NMG_0135362

The Christian Science Monitor, February 22, 2007

A UN report expected to be issued Thursday, finding Iran undeterred in its pursuit of uranium enrichment, represents the kind of collective international action the Bush administration once scoffed at. Now, it's embracing it.

The change stems in part from the administration's disenchantment with the results of its earlier go-it-alone approach. But it also suggests a growing sense within the White House that once-maligned multilateralism is getting results – on issues ranging from Iran to North Korea.

The latest example is Iran. The International Atomic Energy Agency's report on nuclear activity in Iran will find that Tehran has ignored a United Nations Security Council deadline to cease uranium enrichment by Wednesday.

Instead, the IAEA report will show that Iran has installed additional centrifuges in enrichment facilities, sources close to the IAEA work say. It will also note Iran's continuing technical problems in perfecting the process.

The report is likely to set in motion renewed debate on Iran in the Security Council, perhaps next week. Pressure is building for a second, more punitive resolution, since the regime has apparently disregarded a Dec. 24 resolution approved unanimously by the Security Council – including Tehran's political and commercial partners, Russia and China.

Whether a second resolution is ever approved, the debate will highlight a change in the Bush administration, both specifically on Iran and more broadly on the diplomatic field.

"What we're witnessing is the return of the pragmatists to US diplomacy, and it's paying off," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington. "The Bush administration came in touting 'regime change' and a fundamental break with nonproliferation negotiations, but that backfired. In many ways the world ended up more dangerous."

But after a long campaign in Iraq, Iran's rise, and a nuclear test by North Korea, the US is putting new faith in diplomacy, hard bargaining, and multilateral action, he says. "It worked with Libya. It's working with North Korea. And it could work with Iran."

The change in the US approach comes amid mixed signals from the White House, on Iran in particular. Last week President Bush linked an uptick in US casualties in Iraq to more sophisticated weaponry coming from Iran, and said he planned to "do something about it." Such talk keeps alive speculation that the US may opt to move militarily against Iran's nuclear installations.

But the administration's growing reliance on diplomatic efforts is also evident on the international stage, with America's partners in particular taking note of the shift. "We have noted the evolution," says a senior European diplomat in Washington, who by protocol cannot speak on the record.

The US initially was unhappy with the Security Council resolution on Iran, which ended up with weaker sanctions than the US wanted. But after the resolution set off an immediate debate in Iran over the confrontational tactics of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, some US leaders began to have a change of heart.

"The debate it caused in Iran and the pressures inside the country on [President] Ahmadinejad changed things," says the European diplomat. "So now the feeling is, why not a second resolution?"

The Bush administration's apparent conversion to multilateralism can also be seen in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's efforts to revive the Middle East peace process and in last week's deal with North Korea on its nuclear program. Next week, Secretary Rice's new right-hand man, John Negroponte, is travelling to northeast Asia to try to build on the goodwill stemming from the nuclear accord.

The North Korea issue shows that the Bush team has had two tracks of diplomacy all along – the go-it-alone track and a less-noted multilateral track – but has recently switched which track it emphasizes, some experts say.

"The stereotype of the Bush administration was the go-it-alone approach, and it got stuck with that in the first term largely because of the war in Iraq," says Daniel Drezner, a foreign policy expert at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in Medford, Mass. "But there's always been this second track, albeit overshadowed, of trying to work in concert with others for common goals. Now that the US has become bogged down in Iraq, there is less it can do unilaterally."

The arrival of Rice, a trusted Bush aide, at the helm of State is part of the explanation for the shifting emphasis between the two tracks, Mr. Drezner says.

But the administration is also harvesting the fruits of an early diplomatic goal of tying rising world powers such as China and India into the world international system, he says. One result is an intense US effort to court India and cement its ties to the broader international community, he says.

India Wednesday said it will ban exports to Iran of materials that might be used in Tehran's nuclear program. India's statement is the latest sign of growing international alignment with the Security Council resolution.

Bush Administration Won't Change Approach To Cuba, Official Says (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

DOJ_NMG_0135363

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez had some straight talk Wednesday for lawmakers and business groups pressing for a softer approach toward Cuba as the island prepares for a post-Fidel Castro era.

The Bush administration won't waver from its tough stance toward Havana, he said.

"The question is not when will the U.S. change its policy," Gutierrez told a Council of the Americas event on Cuba. "The question is when will the Cuban regime change its policy."

Gutierrez took aim at critics of the U.S. policy who say that, after 48 years of attempting to isolate Cuba politically and economically, the time has come for a different approach.

He dismissed the argument, long espoused by Castro, that the U.S. sanctions against Cuba are to blame for the island's hardships. The United States, Gutierrez noted, supplies one-third of the island's food and medicine, and millions of foreign tourists haven't improved the plight of the Cuban people.

Congress is expected to debate several bills that would relax travel and trade sanctions against Cuba. Democratic control of Congress for the first time since 1994 gives hope to opponents of U.S. policies toward Cuba that some restrictions will be relaxed. Also, the island is thought to be undergoing a transition after Castro fell gravely ill last summer.

In a jab at some Democrats who oppose free-trade agreements because they don't take labor rights into account, Gutierrez said foreign companies paid the Cuban government for their labor in dollars but that the workers received only a fraction of that money in pesos.

"And pity the worker who dares talk openly about the need to organize and operate unions," he said. "The topics of trade, globalization and the working conditions of foreign laborers are being discussed when debated regularly in Washington, D.C. But why do labor conditions lose relevance when it comes to Cuba?"

Gutierrez, the highest-ranking Cuban-American in the Bush administration, rejected the idea that the administration could relax its restrictions on Cuban-American travel to the island. "We believe our policy is correct," he said.

He also said President Bush "has no imperialist intentions. We have no military intentions to occupy the island."

"We will not confiscate property or support any arbitrary claims for property," he added.

Gutierrez Stands By U.S. Ban On Cuba (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez yesterday reiterated the Bush administration's steadfast belief in the U.S. embargo of Cuba, despite congressional moves to relax the policy.

Cuban leader Fidel Castro's hospitalization last year and ceding of power to his brother, Raul, as well as the election of Democratic House and Senate majorities in Congress have helped fuel speculation that U.S. policies could be eased.

Mr. Gutierrez, however, speaking before the Council of the Americas, said the United States must "stand firm" in its rejection of the Castro government and in efforts to deny revenue to the Cuban regime.

The question, he said, is not when U.S. policy will change, but when Cuba will change its policy.

"Years of foreign investment have not improved the lives of average Cubans, only the lives of those who hold power," he said.

He said foreign companies operating in Cuba must pay the government in dollars for Cuban labor, but the government then pays workers in "devalued pesos" and "pockets the difference."

Cubans, he said, "simply do not benefit from foreign investment under Castro."

Mr. Gutierrez also rejected comparing Cuba to China, another communist country but one with which the U.S. maintains trade relations.

China, has pursued economic liberalization, and although that country has not made all the changes the U.S. would like to see, it would be more appropriate to compare Cuba to North Korea, Mr. Gutierrez said.

Legislation has been introduced in Congress to weaken the Cuba embargo, and two House members who are part of that effort criticized the administration's stance after Mr. Gutierrez's speech yesterday.

"What the administration fails to understand is that these policies only inhibit trade that is beneficial to American producers, depriving them of what was once among their 25 largest export markets for agricultural goods," said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, Missouri Republican.

Mrs. Emerson, who is co-sponsoring legislation to ease payment requirements on farm exports to Cuba, said the U.S. traded with the Soviet Union during the Cold War and has given most-favored-nation trade status to China, which she described as "the single largest owner of the U.S. trade deficit."

"After 48 years, sanctions have yet to effect political change in Cuba. It is time to try something new," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0135364

Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who introduced a bill last month to lift the ban on American travel to Cuba, said Cuba is experiencing an "all-too-smooth transition," adding that for all intents and purposes, that transition has been made, but the United States is "on the sidelines watching and having no influence, and that's a shame."

Cuba's Known For Cigars Now, But Oil Could Change That (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, February 22, 2007

One day soon — possibly before the end of this year — an oil rig will maneuver into position in waters less than 100 miles from the coast of Florida. A drill will plunge into the inky sea and begin chewing its way into the ocean floor, hunting for oil.

But the drilling rig won't belong to an American company, and any petroleum it discovers won't do a thing to curb the USA's addiction to foreign oil. Instead, any new sub-sea gusher will belong to Cuba.

That's right: Cuba. The island nation long has been known for its aromatic cigars and sweet rums. But after years of limited oil production on lands around Havana and in neighboring Matanzas province, Cuba is poised for a significant expansion of its oil program into the waters that separate it from the United States. And thanks to U.S. law, Cuba's drilling partners will be working closer to Florida beaches than any American company ever could.

"Our studies … have shown there is a great potential, especially offshore," says Dagoberto Rodriguez, the senior Cuban diplomat in the USA. "Basically, we know that there is oil. The problem is just where it is."

The U.S. Geological Survey (USGS) agrees. Two years ago, after reviewing available data on the subterranean structures in the region, the agency estimated Cuba can lay claim to 4.6 billion barrels of oil and 9.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

With oil prices hovering around $60 a barrel and global supplies persistently tight, any new supply source could benefit the USA, the world's top oil consumer. Likewise, Cuba, which relies on Venezuela for more than half of its daily oil consumption, craves self-sufficiency. "In economic terms, it could be a win-win," says Daniel Erikson, an analyst at the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank.

There's just one problem: politics. Since 1962, the U.S. has maintained an economic embargo of Cuba, aimed at toppling the communist government of Fidel Castro. The ailing dictator, who has outlasted nine U.S. presidents, last summer handed power temporarily to his brother, Raul, while he recovers from abdominal surgery. Companies such as ExxonMobil, Chevron and Halliburton, however, remain barred from the Cuban market, which a 2001 Rice University study said could be worth up to $3 billion annually.

The embargo also will increase the time and cost of the Cuban program by denying Havana access to the closest source of oil industry technology, spare parts and expertise. Likewise, U.S.-owned refineries in Aruba and St. Croix are off-limits for any of the heavy, sulfur-rich Cuban crude.

"The U.S. (embargo) presents them with significant barriers and obstacles," says Jonathan Benjamin-Alvarado, a political scientist at the University of Nebraska who studies Cuban energy issues.

Cuba is modernizing a dilapidated Soviet-era refinery at Cienfuegos with help from Venezuela's state-owned oil company, PDVSA, and refurbishing three other facilities, Rodriguez said. Within 18 months, Cuba will be able to satisfy all of its refining demand, he said. Independent analysts are less optimistic.

The Cuban oil fields were formed more than 50 million years ago in a slow-motion collision between Earth's tectonic plates, which entombed pulverized rocks, animals and plants. Over subsequent millennia, the resulting stew cooked into buried petroleum deposits, says Christopher Shenk, a geologist at the USGS in Denver.

Before Castro's 1959 revolution, U.S. oil companies such as Esso and Amoco carried out preliminary explorations. The following year, Cuba nationalized refineries belonging to Exxon, Texaco and Shell, and U.S. industry hasn't been back since.

In the modern era, Cuba's first significant oil find came in 1971 when Soviet engineers discovered the Varadero field, east of Havana. After the Soviet Union collapsed, Cuba opened its oil program to foreign investment in 1993. Today, companies from Spain, Norway, India, Malaysia and China are involved, either drilling wells onshore or using horizontal drilling to reach reservoirs in shallow coastal waters.

Canada's Sherritt is the most active foreign company with nine fields operating onshore and five exploration or appraisal blocs being drilled, says Michael Minnes, a company spokesman. Daily output from the company's wells averages a modest 30,000 barrels a day, down from about 43,000 in 2004.

"It's like any other foreign jurisdiction or developing nation. There are challenges, and there are opportunities," Minnes said. "We see Cuba as a great environment to do business in."

So far, only one offshore well has been drilled, in July 2004 by Spanish oil company Repsol. The company said it found oil at the site 95 miles southwest of Key West, though not in commercially viable deposits. Since then, the Spanish company has teamed with Norway's Norsk Hydro, one of a select number of global oil companies with expertise in deepwater exploration, according to Jorge Pinon, the former president of Amoco's Latin American operations.

In an interview this week, Rodriguez, the chief of the Cuban interests section in Washington, said widespread offshore drilling could start by the end of this year. Cuban exploration, like drilling ventures elsewhere, has been slowed by a worldwide shortage of drilling rigs that has increased daily lease rates by more than 60% since fall 2005.

Offshore wells aren't cheap: Those envisioned in Cuban waters will cost $40 million to $50 million, says Pinon, the former oil executive now affiliated with the University of Miami's Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies. "This is a very high-risk, high-reward area," R.S. Butola, managing director of India's ONGC, said on the company's website.

Since 1981, the U.S. has observed a moratorium on coastal drilling, except for a portion of the Gulf of Mexico and limited areas off of Alaska. The drilling ban was enacted after a series of high-profile oil industry environmental disasters. Perhaps the most notorious: the 1969 Santa Barbara spill that released 3 million gallons of oil in waters off of California, coating 35 miles of coastline with oil up to 6 inches thick.

Last year, the House voted to relax the prohibition on offshore drilling, but the measure died in the Senate. There may be close to 95 billion barrels of oil affected by the ban, according to the Interior Department.

The House-passed bill still would have allowed individual states to ban drilling up to 100 miles from their shores. But Cuba's wells could eventually be as close to the USA as 60 miles from Key West. The two countries agreed in 1977 to a maritime boundary that evenly divides the waters between them.

The prospect of foreign oil companies drilling Cuban wells so close to American shores has unnerved some on Capitol Hill. Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., last year introduced legislation to deny U.S. visas to executives employed by oil companies involved in the Cuban program. Dan McLaughlin, a spokesman for Nelson, says the senator plans to reintroduce the measure this year. Nelson also wants the United States to renegotiate the 1977 treaty that defines the U.S.-Cuban maritime boundary, a proposal Cuba's Rodriguez called "silly."

Others see the prospect of Cuban offshore oil rigs as a reason to relax the U.S. embargo. Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., co-authored legislation last year that would have permitted U.S. firms to sell their services to companies drilling for Cuba or to drill themselves.

"U.S. companies should be able to bid on these oil leases. … If there are going to be oil rigs within 50 miles of Florida, … I'd rather see U.S. oil rigs than Chinese oil rigs, given technological and safety considerations," Flake said in a telephone interview.

For now, Big Oil is staying out of the political fray. But, at a time when unexplored terrain is rapidly shrinking, the oil industry would eagerly jump into Cuban waters if given the chance.

One year ago, a U.S.-Cuba Energy Summit attracted representatives from Exxon and a handful of smaller oil service companies to three days of meetings in Mexico City. Attendees viewed PowerPoint presentations from Cuban government ministries including state-owned oil company Cupet that invited American companies to help exploit "several giant oil and gas fields."

Events since July, when Castro's illness forced him to step aside, have rekindled industry interest in Cuba's future. "U.S. oil companies would love to do business there as soon as this thing opens up," says Ron Harper, an analyst at IHS Energy in Houston. "They're looking at it quietly. They'd be short-sighted not to."

Earlier this week, Rodriguez reiterated that Cuba remains open to the U.S. industry's involvement and may hold a second summit this year, either in Mexico or Canada. But he said time may be running out for the U.S. to change course. "In my opinion, if the American companies are not able to get something, some changes before no more than one year, after that it will be too late," he said.

For now, any U.S. involvement remains only hypothetical. Houston oilman Antonio Szabo, president of Stone Bond Technologies, says U.S. companies likely would require greater transparency, a commitment to the rule of law and market economics in Cuba before investing significant money there.

Some in the oil industry also have long memories when it comes to Cuba. At the 1997 World Petroleum Congress in Beijing, a Cuban official approached Lee Raymond, then Exxon's chief executive, and asked in a jocular tone when the U.S. oil giant might return to Cuba. "When you give us back our (expletive) refinery," Raymond growled.

Cuban officials note they already have willing partners from Canada, Spain, Norway, Brazil, India, Malaysia, Venezuela and China. Rodriguez made clear that the United States has no veto over Cuba's oil plans.

"Everyone knows how advanced is American technology," the Cuban diplomat said. "But we are going to continue with our programs — with American companies or without American companies."

U.S. Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0135366

AP, February 22, 2007

A U.S. congresswoman called on the Bush administration Wednesday to reconsider its ban on selling parts for U.S.-made F-16 fighter jets to Venezuela, urging improved ties between the two nations.

U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, a Texas Democrat, told reporters that she was making the first U.S. congressional visit to Venezuela since President Hugo Chavez's December re-election with the message: "I want an immediate repairing of the relations between the United States and Venezuela."

Jackson Lee described Venezuela as a friendly nation that the U.S. should cooperate with and said that the F-16 jets, which are built in Texas, was an issue of concern to her constituents in Houston.

Pledging to "personally go back and raise" the issue, she called for the U.S. Congress "to reconsider sanctions on the F-16s."

The U.S. State Department has banned arms sales to Venezuela, including parts necessary to maintain its fleet of F-16s, citing a lack of support by Chavez's government for counterterrorism efforts and its close relations with Iran and Cuba.

Venezuela has since begun receiving the first of 24 Russian-made Sukhoi fighter jets as part of approximately $3 billion in military deals that Chavez has signed with Moscow.

She said her fact-finding mission to Venezuela was part of an effort by a new Democrat-controlled Congress to show that "Venezuela has many friends in this new Congress."

"We're here to re-establish friendship," she said.

Paramilitary Scandal Takes Colombian Elite By Surprise (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia -- Col. HernÃ¡n MejÃ-a was among Colombia's most decorated officers, a young, strapping warrior with five medals for valor on his chest and a reputation for being a relentless adversary of the Marxist guerrillas who operated in the dusty hamlets of northeast Colombia.

But after disclosures that have astonished many Colombians, MejÃ-a has been removed from his post, and the attorney general's office is investigating him for having worked with right-wing paramilitary groups to kill peasant farmers and guerrilla sympathizers. The allegations, announced by Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos in January, mark the first time the military has turned over one of its own to civilian prosecutors on suspicion of collaborating with the death squads.

The MejÃ-a case comes as this country -- a linchpin in an unstable region, and the Bush administration's closest ally in Latin America -- is undergoing an imperfect but remarkable judicial process that has produced nearly daily disclosures of ties between death squad leaders and Colombia's political and military establishment.

Human rights groups have long contended that the military has used paramilitary groups as a proxy force in its war on rebels, but the depth of those connections -- and the degree to which senior political and military officials are being prosecuted -- has shaken the country. The disclosures also have provided a glimmer of hope for a genuine catharsis in a country that has been enmeshed in conflict for decades.

"We think there's a real possibility that this may reach the point where it's irreversible," said Ivan Cepeda, leader of a victims' rights organization and son of Manuel Cepeda, a senator killed by paramilitary gunmen in 1994.

As part of a pact between the government and paramilitary leaders of the United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia, a group notorious for trafficking in cocaine and murdering peasants by the thousands, one of its top leaders, Salvatore Mancuso, has been providing riveting testimony to prosecutors about slayings he had ordered. There are also investigations by the attorney general's office and the Supreme Court. Along the way, Colombians have learned how a group of 11 congressmen and regional lawmakers signed a pact with paramilitary groups to "re-found the fatherland" and "build a new Colombia."

On Monday, the widening scandal cost the foreign minister, MarÃ-a Consuelo AraÃºjo, her job. She resigned under intense public pressure after investigators arrested her brother, Sen. Ãlvaro AraÃºjo, for suspected ties to the paramilitary groups. In all, eight congressmen are now jailed, and investigators have questioned dozens of other national and local lawmakers about suspected ties to death squads.

In recent weeks, largely through Mancuso's testimony, Colombians have learned how top military officers helped paramilitary commanders organize assassinations, even flying paramilitary fighters aboard army helicopters and providing them with weapons. Mancuso has coolly admitted to ordering more than 300 killings, outlined for prosecutors in a colorful PowerPoint presentation.

The attorney general's office is now investigating dozens of colonels, majors, captains and other army officers who are believed to have collaborated with paramilitary groups, said Leonardo Cabana, chief of the attorney general's human rights unit.

DOJ_NMG_0135367

"This is not the only investigation," Cabana said in an interview, referring to MejÃ-a. "There exist more than 100 active cases where there are relations between the public security forces and illegal armed groups."

The government says the disclosures show that President Ãlvaro Uribe is serious about rooting out those with ties to the paramilitary groups.

"This is going to be the policy of the government for officers or officials who are in some way involved," Santos, the defense minister, said in a telephone interview. "The military man who commits these crimes is not a military man, but a criminal."

But Hector Abad, an author and political commentator here, says that this country, where even mass murder has largely gone unpunished, is still far from unraveling the whole truth. The attorney general's office has yet to go after generals long identified by human rights groups and opposition politicians as paramilitary collaborators. Even though Mancuso named generals and colonels in his testimony, all are now dead or in jail.

He has also said nothing of the so-called wise men, the cabal of civilian power brokers whom a former paramilitary leader, Carlos CastaÃ±o, identified as among the dark forces behind the paramilitary movement. CastaÃ±o, after writing a book detailing his role in founding the paramilitary groups, was murdered by his associates.

"The fact that they killed Carlos CastaÃ±o was because CastaÃ±o was going to talk, with Colombian and American justice," said Abad, whose father was killed by paramilitary gunmen in 1982. Abad said much of the onus is on the judiciary to ferret out how deep the paramilitary tentacles go.

"What we don't know is up to what point the paramilitaries will talk about it, and up to what point the judges, who are responsible for investigating, will be able to put together the puzzle," Abad said.

Investigating the paramilitary groups, or testifying about their operations, is still perilous. Shadowy gunmen believed to work for paramilitary commanders recently killed a handful of activists who were publicly pressing for the paramilitary groups to return stolen land and disclose their crimes. One was Yolanda Izquierdo, who had been at Mancuso's deposition.

"We confide in Colombian justice," she told The Washington Post the day Mancuso started testifying. A few weeks later, she was gunned down in front of her house.

What is different now, however, is that the paramilitary groups no longer enjoy the legitimacy they once had in some social sectors, thanks in part to the relentless news reports on abuses and the investigations by prosecutors.

"It's obviously positive that there's a housecleaning going on," said Adam Isacson, who closely tracks Colombia for the Center for International Policy, a Washington group. "It means the system is at least trying to kick into motion a little bit and starting to work."

The disclosures about MejÃ-a and his role as commander of the army's Popa battalion in the city of Valledupar are significant, Defense Ministry officials say, because he was considered a rising star in Colombia's vast, U.S.-funded military. He had fought in some of the army's most tenacious campaigns against Marxist rebels and was assigned in 2002 to Cesar state, an important gateway for cocaine shipped to the United States.

To the surprise of veteran soldiers who could go months without killing a rebel, a 14-man team that MejÃ-a headed always seemed to come back to the Popa base with the bodies of what the colonel claimed were dead guerrillas, according to a key witness who detailed the crimes to Semana magazine.

"As commander of the Popa battalion, what he was really doing was operating with members of this illegal group," said Cabana, referring to paramilitary death squads. "The operations that these paramilitary groups carried out were also carried out by the units he commanded."

No one seemed to suspect that MejÃ-a, instead of going after guerrillas, was killing peasants and suspected rebel sympathizers. In one case celebrated in the press, he was said to have helped kill 19 rebels, making him something of a legend in the army. Instead, the 19 were paramilitary members whom MejÃ-a had helped kill in a purge.

Investigators said they also later determined that MejÃ-a was working closely with Rodrigo Tovar, known as Jorge 40, a powerful paramilitary commander in the region.

"The significant thing about him was he wasn't part of the Paleolithic, hard-core group in the military," said Isacson. "He seemed a modern officer who was a reformer. It didn't occur to people that he was having lunch with Jorge 40."

In China, Stern Treatment For Young Internet 'Addicts' (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha

The Washington Post, February 22, 2007

DAXING, China -- Sun Jiting spends his days locked behind metal bars in this military-run installation, put there by his parents. The 17-year-old high school student is not allowed to communicate with friends back home, and his only companions are psychologists, nurses and other patients. Each morning at 6:30, he is jolted awake by a soldier in fatigues shouting, "This is for your own good!"

Sun's offense: Internet addiction.

Alarmed by a survey that found that nearly 14 percent of teens in China are vulnerable to becoming addicted to the Internet, the Chinese government has launched a nationwide campaign to stamp out what the Communist Youth League calls "a grave social problem" that threatens the nation.

Few countries have been as effective historically in fighting drug and alcohol addiction as China, which has been lauded for its successes, as well as criticized for harsh techniques.

Now the country is turning its attention to fighting another, supposed addiction -- one that has been blamed in the state-run media for a murder over virtual property earned in an online game, for a string of suicides and for the failure of youths in their studies.

The Chinese government in recent months has joined South Korea, Thailand and Vietnam in taking measures to try to limit the time teens spend online. It has passed regulations banning youths from Internet cafes and has implemented control programs that kick teens off networked games after five hours.

There's a global controversy over whether heavy Internet use should be defined as a mental disorder, with some psychologists, including a handful in the United States, arguing that it should be. Backers of the notion say the addiction can be crippling, leading people to neglect work, school and social lives.

But no country has gone quite as far as China in embracing the theory and mounting a public crusade against Internet addiction. To skeptics, the campaign dovetails a bit too nicely with China's broader effort to control what its citizens can see on the Internet. The Communist government runs a massive program that limits Web access, censors sites and seeks to control online political dissent. Internet companies like Google have come under heavy criticism abroad for going along with China's demands.

In the Internet-addiction campaign, the government is helping to fund eight in-patient rehabilitation clinics across the country.

The clinic in Daxing, a suburb of Beijing, the capital, is the oldest and largest, with 60 patients on a normal day and as many as 280 during peak periods. Few of the patients, who range in age from 12 to 24, are here willingly. Most have been forced to come by their parents, who are paying upward of $1,300 a month -- about 10 times the average salary in China -- for the treatment.

Led by Tao Ran, a military researcher who built his career by treating heroin addicts, the clinic uses a tough-love approach that includes counseling, military discipline, drugs, hypnosis and mild electric shocks.

Tao said the clinic is based on the idea that there are many similarities between his current patients and those he had in the past.

In terms of withdrawal: "If you let someone go online and then he can't go online, you may see a physical reaction, just like someone coming off drugs." And in terms of resistance: "Today you go half an hour, and the next day you need 45 minutes. It's like starting with drinking one glass and then needing half a bottle to feel the same way."

Located on an army training base, the Internet-addiction clinic is distinct from the other buildings on campus because of the metal grates and padlocks on every door and the bars on every window.

On the first level are 10 locked treatment rooms geared toward treating teen patients suffering from disturbed sleep, lack of motivation, aggression, depression and other problems. Unlike the rest of the building, which is painted in blues and grays and kept cold to keep the teens alert, these rooms are sunny and warm.

Inside Room No. 8 are toys and other figurines that the teens can play with while psychologists watch. Room 10 contains rows of fake machine guns that the patients use for role-play scenarios that are supposed to bridge the virtual world with the real one.

Room No. 4 is made up to look like home, with rattan furniture and fake flowers, to provide a comfortable place for counselors to talk to the teens. The staff tries to blend into the artificial environment. Before meeting with a patient, one counselor swapped her olive military uniform for a motherly cardigan and plaid skirt.

Among the milder cases are those of Yu Bo, 21, from Inner Mongolia, and Li Yanjiang, 15, from Hebei province. Both said that they used to spend four to five hours a week online and their daily lives weren't affected but that their parents wanted them to cut their computer usage to zero so they could study. Yu said he agreed to come because he wanted to train himself. Li said it was because he just wanted to "get away from my parents."

Perceived as a more serious case is that of He Fang, 22, a college student from the western region of Xinjiang. The business administration major said his grades tanked when he started playing online games several hours a night. The clinic "has mainly helped me change the way I think," he said. "It's not about getting away from pressure but facing it and dealing with it."

DOJ_NMG_0135369

Before Sun, the 17-year-old, who is from the city of Cangzhou, checked into the clinic about a month ago, he said, he was sometimes online playing games for 15 hours nonstop. "My life was not routine -- day and night I was messed up," he said.

In December, he concluded that school just "wasn't interesting" and stopped attending. His parents were furious and complained that he didn't have a goal. Exasperated, they eventually checked him into the clinic.

Since he's been there, Sun said, he's decided to finish high school, attend college and then work at a private company, perhaps becoming an "authority figure" one day. With the help of a counselor, he's mapped out a life plan from now until he's 84.

Sun's father and mother, Sun Fengxiang and Xu Ying, both 41 and accountants, say their son's counselors have told them he's behaving well -- playing basketball, reading books about success -- but they are unsure whether he's really been cured.

"His language shows that he has changed, but we'll see" when Sun gets home, his father said.

No one is comfortable talking about the third floor of the clinic, where serious cases -- usually two or three at a time -- are housed. Most have been addicted to the Internet for five or more years, Tao said, are severely depressed and refuse counseling. One sliced his wrists but survived. These teens are under 24-hour supervision.

Tao said he believes 70 percent of the teens, after one to three months of treatment, will go home and lead normal lives, but he's less optimistic about the third-floor patients. "Their souls are gone to the online world," he said.

Earlier this month, four teens fled their dorm rooms and jumped in a taxi. They made it to a train station before soldiers caught them, according to Li Jiali, a military guard. They were isolated and asked to write reports about why their actions were wrong.

Guo Tiejun, a school headmaster turned psychologist who runs an Internet-addiction research center in Shanghai, said the military-run clinic goes too far in treating Internet addicts like alcohol and drug addicts.

He said that he has treated several former patients of the Daxing clinic and that one mother told him it was simply "suffering for a month" that did not help her son. He advocates a softer approach. Guo said he believes that the root of the problem is loneliness and that the most effective treatment is to treat the teens "like friends."

"Our conclusion is that kids who get addicted in society have some kind of disability or weakness. They can't make friends, can't fulfill their desire of social communication, so they go online," Guo said.

Guo is especially critical of the use of medications -- which include antidepressants, antipsychotics, and a variety of other pills and intravenous drips -- for Internet addiction because, he said, that approach treats symptoms, not causes.

Tao and his team of 15 doctors and nurses defended the treatment methods. He said that while some clinics depend wholly on medications -- in one experiment conducted in Ningbo, a city south of Shanghai, suspected Internet addicts were given the same pills as drug addicts -- only one out of five patients at the Daxing clinic receive prescription drugs. Tao did agree with Guo that Internet addiction is usually an expression of deeper psychological problems.

"We use these medicines to give them happiness," Tao said, "so they no longer need to go on the Internet to be happy."

Still, for all the high-tech treatments available to Sun at the clinic, the one that he says helped him most was talking. He looks forward to returning to school and getting on with his life.

The first task on his agenda when he gets home: get online. He needs to tell his worried Internet friends where he was these past few weeks.

Farm Tariff Cuts Won't Help Africa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 22, 2007

Richard Holbrooke and Stuart Eizenstat ("Africa's Last Best Chance1," editorial page, Feb. 15) are absolutely right that Africa needs a successful conclusion to the Doha Round for a number of reasons, but steep EU farm tariff reductions cut both ways for developing countries depending on their level of competitiveness.

EU farm tariff cuts will do little for most in the developing world for the simple reason that almost all their agricultural produce already enters the EU tariff free -- so tariff cuts won't help them. The EU has already almost fully implemented the 100% duty-free, quota-free market access for all exports from Least Developed Countries that we agreed back in 2001 -- others in the developed world have yet to match this.

The level of farm tariff cuts initially demanded by the United States were unsustainable both for the EU and for developing countries. They would have wiped out the tariff preferences on which, for better or worse, African countries still depend for agricultural export access in the face of the world's competitive farm exporters. The EU has agreed to come as close as possible to the level of tariff cuts demanded by developing countries themselves.

The real competitive gain for African farmers in the Doha Round will come from cutting trade-distorting farm subsidies and the elimination of export subsidies for farm goods -- both of which allow farmers in the rich world artificially to undercut farmers in developing countries. The EU has already offered to slash trade-distorting farm subsidies by 70% and eliminate export subsides altogether if others do the same. Combined with the tariff cuts we are offering, this reform adds up to the biggest liberalization of farm trade in history.

Messrs. Holbrooke and Eizenstat were right to call the Doha Round "Africa's Last Best Chance." But they were wrong when they said the agriculture trade liberalization proposals currently on the table "far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds." They must have forgotten President Reagan's bold proposal to eliminate all agricultural trade barriers in the Uruguay Round. Just think how different Africa might be today had the developed world accepted Reagan's challenge to open its markets to agricultural exports from developing countries 20 years ago.

Africa's Last Best Chance (WSJ)

By Richard Holbrooke And Stuart Eizenstat
The Wall Street Journal, February 15, 2007

The long-stalled Doha round of trade talks recently had, in the words of WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy, a jolt of "new energy" after the recent meeting of key trade ministers in Davos. What is not clearly understood is that if a successful agreement is reached, it will be especially good news for Africa.

Failure, conversely, would have tragic consequences for the continent. It would lead the United States and the European Union to negotiate more bilateral free-trade agreements with key countries, but not with sub-Saharan Africa and other poor countries, which offer few attractive markets for developed countries' manufactured goods and services. Africa, which has seen its share of world trade shrink in recent years, would fall even further behind.

Developing countries felt that previous multilateral trade negotiations like the Kennedy round, the Tokyo round and the Uruguay round primarily benefited the highly developed nations. While they undertook costly obligations to protect developed countries' intellectual property and impose sanitary and phytosanitary standards, the developed countries did not significantly open their markets to the labor-intensive manufactured goods and agricultural products of developing countries.

For the Doha round launched in 2001, however, there is a development agenda. At its heart is agriculture -- a politically sensitive sector in the EU and the U.S. but the largest employer in low-income countries, accounting for about 60% of their labor force and 25% of their GDP. The World Bank estimates that these agricultural products face what former U.S. Trade Representative Robert Portman observed is a practically insurmountable global average tariff rate of 62%, and that 93% of the benefits from a successful Doha round would come from improved market access for developing nations' agricultural products.

Farmers represent less than 5% of the labor force in industrial countries, but they have very substantial political power in the U.S., EU and Japan. These political forces, especially in the EU, led to the eventual derailment of the Doha round last summer. But as the Doha talks take on new life, Congress and the Bush administration need to stay true to the commitments of the Doha Development Agenda, especially in agriculture.

Two weeks ago the administration proposed ending subsidies for 80,000 wealthy farmers, substituting trade-distorting subsidies with cash payments to farmers, and trimming traditional agriculture programs by $4.5 billion over the next decade. These proposals, if approved, would directly benefit some of the poorest people on earth, save lives and ultimately reduce American foreign aid, while helping Susan Schwab, the U.S trade representative, put wind in the sails of the ministers' pledge in Davos to restart serious talks.

The promise for developing countries, and particularly the poorest African nations, is huge. In particular, Africa stands to gain significantly if sensitive product exclusions do not disproportionately target key African exports. Peter Mandelson, the EU trade commissioner, pledged recently that Europe will significantly improve its previous tariff reduction offer; he needs to make good on that promise. But even the current U.S. and EU proposals on the table far surpass those offered in previous multilateral trade rounds and offer real gains for developing countries:

· WTO members have agreed to provide duty-free/quota-free market access to the least developed countries for at least 97% of their products.

· An agreement has been reached to end the direct EU and U.S. export subsidies by 2013 that have squeezed out the products of farmers in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

· Assistance will be given to help poor countries streamline their customs procedures to help with the red tape and corruption that historically impeded engagement in significant international trade.

DOJ_NMG_0135371

Developing nations also must make serious commitments to complete the Doha round. A growing percentage of trade is between developing nations, with more than 70% of the duties paid by developing countries to other developing countries. This makes no sense.

The World Bank has found a significant increase in per capita income of developing countries that lower their own trade barriers, and concluded that totally eliminating global trade barriers could lift 300 to 500 million of the world's poor out of poverty -- growing their economies by $259 billion by 2015. Opening their trade arteries to manufactured goods and services is also important. It will help developing nations trade with each other, which is growing 50% faster than world trade overall, but where levels of protection on goods are four times higher than levels of protection in rich countries. Intraregional trade in Africa was only 5.3% of GDP in 2002, in part due to self-destructive trade barriers between African countries.

As trade ministers make an effort to reach a Doha deal, they should recognize that it is the poorest nations, particularly those in Africa, that would be the biggest losers if Doha collapses. We hope this will be understood by everyone, on a bipartisan basis, as this crucial negotiation heads into its final phase. For Africa, this may be the last best chance.

Canada Cautions U.S. On Pending Passport Rule (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 22, 2007

A planned U.S. rule that would require passports for anyone entering the country by land from Canada must be implemented with "clarity and flexibility" to avoid damaging the world's most dynamic bilateral trading relationship, Canadian Ambassador Michael Wilson said yesterday.

"Yes, we are very concerned about the rule. We have been urging our American counterparts to take the time to get it right," Mr. Wilson said in a luncheon interview with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

Canadian officials and many U.S. lawmakers from states along the border fear the abrupt implementation of the passport requirement could cause major delays at border checkpoints and impede the free flow of goods and tourists. Two-way trade totaled more than $740 billion last year, and Mr. Wilson noted that Canada is the leading foreign trade partner for more than 39 U.S. states.

"If there's major congestion at the crossing points, it quickly becomes an economic issue as well," Mr. Wilson said.

The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) have until June 1, 2009, to implement tougher documentation rules for travelers crossing by land from Mexico and Canada. DHS officials are pressing for a quicker implementation schedule, citing the smooth adoption of similar rules for air travelers last month.

"People have got the message" about the new passport requirement, "and that's good news," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

But Mr. Wilson noted there was a "huge surge" of Canadians applying for passports ahead of the traditional winter school break, when many Canadians head to Florida or other southern U.S. destinations.

Since air travel represents only about 15 percent of the total cross-border traffic, the pending rule for land crossings will have a far greater impact, Mr. Wilson said.

"We will need advance notice, clarity and flexibility in the implementation of this rule," Mr. Wilson said. "We have taken that message regularly to Homeland Security, but they are making it very clear they want to do this as quickly as possible."

Premiers from four Canadian provinces will visit Washington this month to argue against an early date for the passport mandate. Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, New York Democrat, has introduced a bill to force U.S. officials to accept new, high-tech driver's licenses in lieu of passports to ease checkpoint hassles.

While border security remains a major issue, U.S.-Canadian relations overall are very strong, Mr. Wilson said, particularly compared with frosty cross-border ties in recent years.

Tax-cutting Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government has proven a strong U.S. ally in the war in Afghanistan, boosting defense spending and putting Canadian troops on the front lines in the battle against fundamentalist Taliban forces. Almost three dozen Canadians have died in the Afghan war.

"It can't help but bring you closer together when you are comrades-in-arms, when you're sitting at the table and going to the same strategy sessions," he said.

He said ordinary Canadians have trouble understanding the "caveats" some NATO countries have adopted to limit their deployments in Afghanistan, leaving just a few nations to bear the brunt of the fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0135372

Mr. Wilson, a leading Canadian banker and former finance minister, said that many of the legendary nasty trade disputes that marred bilateral relations in the past on goods from beer to wheat have largely subsided.

He called recent U.S. complaints about new Canadian provincial subsidies to struggling lumber producers a "brushfire" that was not likely to upset last year's carefully wrought compromise on overall lumber trade.

Mr. Wilson said he decided to take the Washington posting after Mr. Harper agreed that the envoy would balance bilateral issues with a broader push to work with the United States on joint priorities, from trade to nonproliferation to crises in such trouble spots as Haiti and Darfur.

"In that sense, it's a very easy place to be for me because the prime minister and the Canadian government share a larger view of our relations," he said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Chicago-Area Cousins Arrested In Alleged Toledo Terror Conspiracy. The AP (2/22, Robinson) reports, "Two Chicago-area cousins were arrested Wednesday on federal charges out of Cleveland accusing them of conspiring to wage holy war against Americans overseas, including U.S. military forces in Iraq." Zubair A. Ahmed and Khaleel Ahmed "were accused along with three other men from the Toledo, Ohio, area who already had been under indictment on charges of plotting acts of terrorism against Americans overseas. The fresh indictment returned by a grand jury in Cleveland added the two Chicago-area men to the roster of defendants and brought additional charges against the three men from Ohio."

The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Coen, Maxwell, 617K) notes that Toledo-area suspects "Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi and Wassim Mazloum have pleaded not guilty and are expected to go on trial in Cleveland in the spring. … El-Hindi allegedly took the cousins from Chicago to Cleveland in 2004 to meet a man described in the document as 'the Trainer,' a man with military experience who was associated with the group." US Attorney Bill Edwards "said the men discussed sniper tactics and were willing to travel to carry out terror plots."

The New York Times (2/22, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "Wednesday's indictment included new charges against" Amawi and Hindi "involving further counts of distributing information regarding the manufacture and use of explosives. In addition, a second new indictment charged Mr. Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, another town in the Toledo area, with defrauding the government by claiming to have used $40,000 in federal grant money for charitable purposes when in fact, the government said, it actually went to their personal use. And yet another indictment charged Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania with making false statements to federal agents by denying knowledge that his brother Wassim had participated in firearms training."

Supporters Ask Gonzales To Release Al-Arian. The AP (2/22, Barakat) reports, "Supporters of former professor Sami al-Arian - now in the fifth week of a prison hunger strike as he refuses to testify in front of a federal grand jury - on Wednesday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to deport al-Arian prior to his scheduled release from prison." The AP continues, "Al-Arian, a former computer science professor at the University of South Florida, was accused by prosecutors of being a leader of a terrorist group called Palestinian Islamic Jihad. He is being held at a medical prison in North Carolina. … After a six-month trial ended in an acquittal on some counts and a hung jury on others, al-Arian struck a plea bargain in May 2006 and admitted to conspiring to aid Palestinian Islamic Jihad, specifically by helping a family member with links to the group obtain immigration benefits and by lying to a reporter about another individual's ties to the group." The AP adds, "Al-Arian would be up for release in April, but his prison term is being extended indefinitely after a judge found him in civil contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury in Alexandria, Va., investigating a cluster of Islamic charities in northern Virginia that has ties to al-Arian. … Al-Arian believes his plea deal specifically exempted him from cooperating with authorities. But two federal judges have ruled that al-Arian must testify. … Al-Arian's lawyer, Peter Erlinder, said it is only fair that Gonzales release al-Arian now because prosecutors initially recommended to the judge that al-Arian receive time served when he struck the May 2006 plea deal. A judge rejected that recommendation and sentenced al-Arian to an additional 11 months. … 'Mr. Gonzales, you have the power ... to release Dr. al-Arian for voluntary departure from the U.S. with the stroke of your pen,' Erlinder said in an open letter to Gonzales. … Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the attorney general does not have the power to unilaterally free al-Arian. Deportations are handled by the Department of Homeland Security rather than the Justice Department."

Judge Denies Bail For US Citizen Accused Of Aiding Al Qaeda In Somalia. The AP (2/22, Lozano) reports, "A U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government will remain behind bars until his trial, a federal judge ruled Wednesday. Daniel Joseph Maldonado was ordered held without bond. U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley also found federal authorities were justified in arresting Maldonado on charges related to his alleged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Somalia." The AP notes, "During a two-day probable cause and detention hearing, FBI agents and prosecutors painted a portrait of a violent young man who willingly trained alongside al-Qaeda operatives to learn firearms and bombmaking skills. … Botley said while the evidence showed Maldonado received weapons and bomb making training, it wasn't clear if al-Qaeda was in charge of the camp."

The New York Times (2/22, Blumenthal, 1.16M) adds that "Botley granted a defense request that Mr. Maldonado, 28, gaunt from malaria and malnutrition, be given extra rations in jail." The Times notes, "At a two-day detention hearing that was unusual for the explicitness of the evidence disclosed, Mr. Maldonado was said to have given the F.B.I. false information, then admitted that he 'wrote or told many dishonest statements' and revised his account while still falling short of the truth, an F.B.I. agent testified." Special Agent Lucille Eglen-Anderson "and other agents testified that Mr. Maldonado was at a terrorist training camp run by Al Qaeda, where he was learning to shoot an AK-47 and make bombs."

Spanish Judge's Claims Said To Raise Questions About Wider 9/11 Plotting. In a Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) op-ed, author Edward Jay Epstein writes that Spanish anti-terror Judge Baltazar Garzon claims a Spanish terror cell provided regular and extensive support to the 9/11 plotters, contradicting the accounts obtained by the CIA from Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh. Epstein adds that "if Mr. Garzon is correct about the Spanish connection to 9/11, it is not only the effectiveness of the CIA's interrogation of its al Qaeda prisoners that is called into question. The information from Binalshibh, KSM and other detainees was used to fill in the missing pieces of the jigsaw, and those gaps concerned the contacts the 9/11 conspirators might have had with others wishing to harm America. By saying that no one else was involved -- not in Spain, Iran, Hezbollah, Malaysia, Iraq, the Czech Republic or Pakistan -- these detainees allowed the 9/11 Commission to complete its picture of al Qaeda as a solitary entity."

WSJournal, NYTimes Differ On Court Ruling On Tribunals. Two major newspapers take strikingly different positions on Tuesday's appeals court decision upholding the Military Commissions Act. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A14, 2.04M) says the decision "is a welcome victory for common sense in the war on terror. Now we'll find out if the Supreme Court meant what it said last year about deferring to the two elected branches on the handling of enemy combatants. We never had a problem with the Bush Administration's plan to set up military commissions shortly after 9/11. It is the duty of the executive branch -- which can act with dispatch and be held accountable by voters -- to conduct wars. And military tribunals have been successfully employed by past Presidents, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR. … Critics in Congress of tribunals as Senate Judiciary Chairman Pat Leahy have every right to try to rewrite the Military Commissions Act, if they have the political nerve. But we're also sure that prosecuting a war on terror would be significantly more difficult as a result."

But the New York Times (2/22, A22, 1.16M) calls it "another low moment for American justice" that "relied on a shameful law that President Bush stampeded through Congress last fall that gives dangerously short shrift to the Constitution. The right of prisoners to challenge their confinement -- habeas corpus -- is enshrined in the Constitution and is central to American liberty. Congress and the Supreme Court should act quickly and forcefully to undo the grievous damage that last fall's law -- and this week's ruling -- have done to this basic freedom." The "frightening" Military Commissions Act "raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. And it gives the government the power to take away habeas rights from any noncitizen living in the United States who is unfortunate enough to be labeled an enemy combatant."

Ex-CIA General Counsel Calls For Reforms. In a Washington Post (2/22, A19, 690K) op-ed, Jeffrey Smith, former CIA general counsel and now a partner at a law firm that "provides Kuwaiti counsel for the families of the Kuwaiti detainees at Guantanamo," writes that last November, "voters rejected the president's swaggering, go-it-alone approach and the administration's contemptuous attitude toward the Geneva Conventions, which led to the abuses at Abu Ghraib, actions that so damaged our credibility that other nations are much less willing to cooperate in the war on terrorism. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and her able legal adviser, John Bellinger, have pushed for reforms that have begun to reverse this trend -- but much more must be done." Last week, Sens. Christopher Dodd and Patrick Leahy introduced legislation "that will move us further in the right direction. But there are three things Congress should do. First, Congress should reconsider the detainee legislation passed last fall. Last-minute changes rammed through by the White House watered down many of the bill's key provisions. … Second, Congress should repeal the provisions that stripped detainees at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere of the right of habeas corpus and that instead gave them an extremely limited right to challenge their detentions. … Third, Congress should also examine the practice of 'rendition,' or sending detainees to countries for trial or detention where, it is alleged, they can be mistreated or tortured."

WPost Calls For US To Drop "Los Angeles Eight" Case. The Washington Post (2/22, 690K) editorializes that the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine "is a loathsome group that has carried out terrorist activities. It was an important and legitimate policy change, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to tighten the law to make raising money here for terrorist groups a crime. But that law was not in place when" so-called "Los Angeles Eight" members Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh "were allegedly involved with the PFLP; they say they were never members but only distributed its magazine. At this point, if not from the outset, the pursuit of two law-abiding, middle-aged men with roots and families in this country is misplaced and even self-defeating on the part of the government." US District Judge Bruce Einhorn has ruled against the deportation proceedings against the men, and the "government has until the end of the month to appeal the judge's ruling. It should, instead, drop this case, as it should have done years ago."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Is Safe, With Room For Improvement. The AP (2/22, Squires) reports from Florence, CO, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured a federal prison holding some of the nation's most violent and disruptive inmates on Wednesday and said the facility is secure, but he conceded that it could be improved. … 'Are there challenges? Yes,' said Gonzales, the nation's top law enforcement official. 'Can we do better? Yes.'" The AP continues, "Gonzales agreed to visit the prison, known as Supermax, after Colorado's two senators raised concerns about staffing and security. … He stopped short of promising to increase the number of guards or build an additional fence around the compound, as some state and local officials have advocated. Instead, he said he was willing to listen. … 'The question is reaching a general consensus on what is needed,' Gonzales said. 'There may be additional staffing that we can provide to the facilities here.'" The AP adds, "Supermax, 90 miles southwest of Denver, houses 474 of the nation's most notorious convicts, including Olympic bomber Eric Rudolph and Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. … Security at the 490-bed prison, built in 1994 for $60 million, has been under scrutiny for months. Last year, an arbitrator found that staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail. … The Justice Department says that all mail and phone calls to and from inmates labeled as terrorists have been monitored since October, and that perimeter security has been beefed up."

The Denver Post (2/22, Finley) reports, "A battle over how to run the nation's booming federal prison system intensified Wednesday as U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, guard-union leaders and lawmakers toured the ultra- high-security Supermax facility and held an unofficial summit." The Post continues, "Gonzales emerged two hours later and pronounced Supermax up to par, lauding recent efforts to make sure mail and phone calls from terrorist prisoners are monitored. … 'I'm comfortable with where we are at today on this issue,' he said after a Supermax tour that was off-limits to reporters. … But guard-union leaders bristled, warning that thin staffing has put prisons on the brink of disastrous riots as the nation's federal inmate population approaches 200,000." The Post adds, "Supermax union president Barbara Batulis, who accompanied Gonzales, said terrorists housed there still are able to communicate with followers in Spain and Iraq. … Union leaders have begun mobilizing a lobbying blitz to demand $500 million from Congress to hire more guards nationwide, said John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees. … New surveillance technology at Supermax and other prisons ignores the core issue of inadequate staffing, Gage said. 'Those cameras will not replace correctional officers. And electric fences? We're not talking about escapes here. We're talking about safety within the walls,' he said." The Post notes, "U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, who accompanied Gonzales along with U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, also raised questions. … Federal prison chiefs 'have to do more. They have to recognize ... we need to have much more linguistic capability in Arabic' in order to understand and assess terrorist-prisoner communications, said Salazar, D-Colo. … Allard, R-Colo., praised Gonzales for being 'willing to sit down and listen' in what he and Salazar cast as a continuing dialogue about prison conditions."

The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/22, Harmon) reports, "Gonzales toured the prison with U.S. Sens. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., and Wayne Allard, R-Colo., as well as Federal Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin and U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colo. Gonzales is the second of the nation's chief law enforcement officers to visit the prison - former U.S. Attorney Janet Reno helped dedicate Supermax in January 1995. … 'I heard from Senators Salazar and Allard their concerns about the facility here in Florence and what we could do,' Gonzales said. 'We had good discussions with staff today and are committed to a safe facility here and at facilities throughout the nation.' … 'I want to ensure we are doing everything we can for the wonderful people who work here and the safety of the community,' Gonzales said." The Chieftain adds, "Salazar said since he and Allard took separate tours of Supermax late last year that additional staff have been added, technology has been improved and in lieu of perimeter fencing being added, a control tower has been enhanced to provide a 360 degree view of the complex and an armored vehicle has been added to patrols. … Since the Inspector General's office issued a report last year detailing relaxed inmate phone and mail monitoring, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the general mail being sent to or from inmates designated as terrorist inmates since October of last year. Mail is not delivered to or sent from terrorist inmates until after it is read and translated if necessary. … Lappin said the bureau has added additional translator analysts. As a result, 100 percent of phone calls for terrorist inmates are monitored; however, because language translators may not always be available, the prison records the conversations for later translation."

The Rocky Mountain (CO) News (2/22, Foster) reports, "All the mail and telephone calls of terrorists housed at Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison, are being monitored under new tighter security procedures, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday after touring the prison. … Less certain are other security improvements sought by the prison's staff and the townspeople of Florence, including more corrections officers and a perimeter fence around the four-prison federal complex that includes Supermax." The News continues, "Supermax's 475 inmates are considered the most dangerous in the country's federal prison system and include a roster of international and domestic terrorists: Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef, shoe bomber Richard Reid, Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, and Olympic and abortion clinic bomber Eric Rudolph. … Security troubles cast the prison into the national spotlight last fall after a Justice Department inspector general's report found that a shortage of Arabic translators prevented the screening of dozens of letters from convicted terrorists to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004." The News adds, "That problem has been solved, said Gonzales, who toured the prison with Colorado's two U.S. senators, Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, and Rep. Doug Lamborn, whose congressional district includes the prison. … 'I am confident that we're doing what we should be doing monitoring communications in and out of the facility,' Gonzales said."

The Colorado Springs (CO) Gazette (2/22, Rappold) reports, "Gonzales didn't pledge to hire more staff or build a perimeter fence — two of the concerns that have been voiced by local officials and the union representing Supermax employees — but said such measures are still options. … 'There has been additional staffing. We've got additional technology in place,' Gonzales said during a news conference after touring the prison. 'We've provided additional tools to deal with the concern about perimeter fencing.'" The Gazette adds, "Gonzales said a perimeter fence, estimated to cost $20 million, is still on the table, though it doesn't appear necessary. … 'The question is, is that a wise use of taxpayer dollars going forward?' Gonzales said. 'That's something the senators and I will be engaging in a dialogue about. … I am committed to ensuring that we have safe and secure facilities, not just here but throughout all of our federal facilities,' he said."

KXTU-TV, Fox 21, Colorado Springs/Pueblo (2/22, Salvo) reports, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the Supermax Prison in Florence Wednesday along with Senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard to see what steps have been taken to improve the safety and security of the facility." KXTU-TV continues, "The prison has been criticized by state and federal officials because of staffing levels inadequate monitoring and security measures. Supermax houses some of the most harden criminals including both foreign and domestic terrorists, which is what raised so many eyebrows when a report came out last year faulting the facility for among other things not reading all incoming and outgoing mail from the highest-risk prisoners and not monitoring telephone calls. … 'I am confident were doing what should be doing to monitor communication both in and out of these faculties,' said Attorney General Gonzales." KXTU-TV adds,

"Big words following big steps that have been taken in the last few months to address security and safety issues in what should be the nation's most secure penitentiary. … 'The issue of additional staffing: there are now some additional correctional officers that have been added to this facility,' said Sen. Salazar. … Presently the Department of Justice reports 92% of authorized positions are filled putting the inmate-to-staff ratio at 1.5:1, the lowest of its kind in comparison. … But is that enough for a prison housing some of the world's most dangerous criminals? … 'I think we have additional funding and one of the things we will look at is should there be additional staffing,' said the Attorney General."

KRDO-TV, ABC 13, Colorado Springs (2/22, Wurtz) reports, "It houses some of the most dangerous criminals in the world, but is Colorado's Supermax Prison secure? The nation's top law enforcement official toured the complex Wednesday. After his tour, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he's confident in the security of the prison complex and is satisfied that steps have already been taken to address safety concerns. But he and Colorado's lawmakers agree: work at Supermax is not done. 'We all care, in a very united way, that we have safe and secure facilities,' says Sen. Ken Salazar, (D) Colorado, 'there are issues that have been raised and we have addressed some of those.'" KRDO-TV adds, "Addressing concerns by adding some staff and security cameras. … The complex has also employed translators and increased the monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls. 'Whether or not they have any terrorist connections, whether or not they've been ordered to subject to any administrative restrictions, will dictate the level of monitoring that does occur,' says Gonzales, 'but we've had some good discussions about that and I'm confident we're doing what we should be doing.' One item still unresolved--the question of whether the complex needs more perimeter fencing. 'We now have armed mobile patrols, we now have a tower that provides additional surveillance,' Gonzales says of increased perimeter security, 'so the question is whether or not [perimeter fencing] is a wise use of taxpayers' money going forward.'" KRDO-TV notes, "Lawmakers and law enforcement will continue to discuss that issue and any future changes may be needed at Supermax. … Gonzales says the tour was a step forward in what he calls an ongoing process. 'We're always evaluating what we do; not just in this area, but everything we do in fighting crime and fighting terrorism,' says Gonzales."

Unions Say BOP Playing Shell Game With Supermax Staffers. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/22, Harmon) reports, "Union officials on Wednesday accused the Federal Bureau of Prisons of taking correctional staff intended for other prisons to help staff the Supermax penitentiary." The Chieftain continues, "The Supermax, which is referred to by prison officials as the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary, houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including convicted terrorists. … 'We got our 18 (additional officers), but they are taking staff from other institutions and funneling them to ours,' said Barb Batulis, American Federation of Government Employees Local 1302 president for the Supermax. 'It is like robbing Peter to pay Paul and they are trying to put it back on me because I told them they had to do something about the staffing.'" The Chieftain continues, "Union officials suspect that the 18 new officers put on staff at Supermax actually were supposed to go to work at the lower security Federal Correctional Complex prisons in Florence. The complex houses four prisons - Supermax, the high-security United States Penitentiary, the medium-security Federal Correctional Institution and a low-security camp. … 'Even with the additional staff, we are still below "mission critical" levels of at least 20 correctional officers,' Batulis said. 'And we haven't gotten any additional (Arabic) translators. We still have just three and that is not a lot to monitor all the calls and mail for the (terrorist) inmates.'" The Chieftain adds, "Holly Pruyne, who is the Local 1300 president representing the medium security and camp prisons, said five correctional officers intended for the Federal Correctional Institution were reassigned to Supermax. … 'The FCI has a maximum rated capacity of 794 inmates. We are at 1,174 inmates now and are going up to 1,300. We have 79 percent of the staff we need for the basic mission critical status,' Pruyne said. … Union officials said on Jan. 3 and Jan. 9, when disturbances were occurring at the high-security penitentiary, staff from both Supermax and the FCI responded to help. With a total of 42 staffers responding, the incidents left the FCI with few officers and inmates who were not on lock-down status. … John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees national union of Washington, D.C., was among high-ranking union officials in town Wednesday to bring a voice to the short staffing problem, which he said exists across the nation."

Habitat For Humanity Facing Criticism Over Pace Of Gulf Coast Homebuilding Effort. The New York Times (2/22, Eaton, Strom, 1.16M) reports from Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, that despite having secured 50,000 volunteers, $127 million and backing from the likes of "President Bush and the New Orleans jazz luminaries Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis," Habitat for Humanity says that since Katrina "it has built just 10 houses for poor hurricane victims here, 36 in New Orleans, and a total of 416 along the entire coast, from Alabama to Texas. More are under construction, for a total of 702." The "slower pace" – Habitat "built or repaired 8,500 houses in Indonesia, Thailand, India and Sri Lanka" following the 2004 tsunami – "reflects, in part, the more complex houses that Habitat builds in the United States, as well as the mind-numbing issues — involving insurance costs and government regulations — that seem to have bogged down efforts to rebuild after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. But Habitat International is starting to face criticism that its procedures are slow, rigid and perhaps unsuited to helping disaster victims, however rewarding its efforts are for its volunteers."

Baton Rouge Adjusting To Post-Katrina Surge In Population. In a front page article, USA Today (2/22, 1A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports from Baton Rouge, a city of 250,000 that became "an overwhelmed mass of about 500,000" in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Many evacuees were just passing through, but city officials say that today, Baton Rouge's population remains 275,000-325,000. From the Los Angeles-style gridlock on Interstate 10 to the overcrowded schools and the escalating real estate prices that have fueled a housing crunch, Baton Rouge has the look and feel of a place grappling for control of its direction. And although the influx of new residents hasn't dramatically increased crime rates, many residents sense that Baton Rouge has lost some of the small-city civility it enjoyed during what they call 'Pre-K' — before Katrina."

WAR NEWS:

British Withdrawal From Iraq Seen As Blow To Bush Policies. Tony Blair's announcement that some of the British troops in Iraq will go back to the UK at the end of the summer is being portrayed as a setback for the Bush Administration. The Los Angeles Times, in a report typical of the tenor of much of the coverage, reports the British move "was widely seen Wednesday as a telling admission that the British military can no longer sustain simultaneous wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. The British military is approaching 'operational failure,' former Defense Staff chief Lord Charles Guthrie warned this week." The decision "to draw down forces by more than 20 percent in the southern city of Basra means that Britain will significantly shrink its military footprint at a time when the Pentagon is increasing U.S. forces to battle militants to the north, in Baghdad and Anbar province." The Bush Administration "hastened to present the British decision as an indication that the U.S.-led military operation was succeeding. … But the Pentagon, in its most recent quarterly report to Congress, listed Basra as one of five cities outside Baghdad where violence remained 'significant,' and said the region is one of only two that are 'not ready for transition' to Iraqi authorities."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 2, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) also reported Administration "officials scrambled today to put the best face on the British withdrawal. In Berlin, Secretary of State Rice denied that the so-called 'coalition of the willing' in Iraq is falling apart. The Vice President, in Japan, insisted it is good news." Cheney was shown saying, "I look at it and what I see is an affirmation of the fact that parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well." But "the good spin," added NBC, "masks a darker reality. Just as the US is putting more troops into Iraq to secure Baghdad, America's staunchest ally in the war is beginning to pull up stakes."

The Washington Post (2/22, A12, Weisman, Baker, 690K) says today that "for an already besieged White House, the decision was doing a good job masquerading as a bad-news story. … To many back in Washington, though, what resonated was that Bush's main partner in Iraq is starting to get out just as the president is sending in more U.S. troops."

On the CBS Evening News (2/21, story 3, 1:20, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "I think what we're seeing her…is what happened back during the Vietnam era: When things were going badly and the crusty old Senator from Vermont George Akins said, 'There's only one way out here, that's to declare victory and just leave.' That's what we're seeing." Blair's move "is going to make the President even more isolated than perhaps he is now. The Democrats have already pounced on this. They say it shows that the President's idea of putting more troops in is not the solution and that there is not a military solution, there has to be a diplomatic solution. Whether you're for the war or against the war, Katie, what this underlines tonight is that the coalition that the President put together to fight this war is now coming apart."

USA Today (2/22, Stinson, 2.27M) reports "presidential spokesman Tony Snow, on a trip with Bush to Tennessee, said Britain's decision was not made on a timeline of the sort the president has rejected for American troops. 'What you had is progress first, and then the removal,' Snow said. 'The president's made clear all along, we want to move as rapidly as we can to build capability on the part of the Iraqis so they can in fact assume, first, primary responsibility and then eventually sole responsibility,' he said." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said there was no thought that the British were abandoning the United States."

Democrats pounced on the British move as a sign that Bush's plan to increase the US troop level in Iraq by 21,500 was the wrong strategy. The Financial Times (2/22, Blitz, Dombey, Sevastopulo) notes "prominent Democrats in Congress said the move was a sign that Britain was now giving up on the US in Iraq and contrasted it with the surge in US troop numbers deployed to contain the violence in Baghdad. … Edward Kennedy, a senior Democratic senator, said the British redeployment was a 'stunning rejection' of the president's decision to increase US troop numbers around Baghdad by 21,500. 'No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq,' Mr Kennedy said." Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, "said the UK move 'weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US.'" The Washington Times (2/22, Behn, 88K) also quotes Cordesman saying "the British had long ago lost the political fight and ceded Basra and Maysan to Shi'ite Islamist factions. 'The British were not defeated in a military sense, but lost in the political sense if "victory" means securing the southeast for the central government and some form of national unity.'"

The Hill (2/22, Marre) notes "congressional Democrats…said Wednesday that the White House should take a cue from its closest ally and get U.S. soldiers out of Iraq instead of sending in more. 'Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?' asked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi." The Washington Times (2/22, Dinan, Ward, 88K) runs a similar story under the headline "Democrats Hail British Pullout," in which it says Democrats "cheered the news." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "The British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept."

And in an editorial headlined "Britain Cuts Its Losses," the New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) writes, "Spin it any way you like, Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement that Britain will be withdrawing up to 1,600 of its 7,100 remaining troops in Iraq can't be welcome military or political news for…Bush."

Blair's announcement led all three network newscasts, with ABC World News (2/21, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reporting, "For years, the Bush Administration has called it the 'coalition of the willing.' Well, tonight, it appears as if some of the nations in that coalition are no longer as willing. That includes America's chief ally, Great Britain." ABC (Scuitto) added, "Politically, Mr. Blair had little choice. Public opposition to the war is strong. Six in ten here favor a quick withdrawal. And 72% say the war is unwinnable. Blair also faced enormous pressure from his own party to begin the pullout before he steps down as Prime Minister this year to avoid leaving his successor with a damaging political burden." The CBS Evening News (2/21, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) noted "the shrinking US-led coalition in Iraq," and added "Denmark, a much smaller ally, announced today it will withdraw its entire contingent of just over 400. So the coalition, which at its peak included the United States and 38 other nations, is down to the US and 21 other nations." In addition, says the AP (2/22), "Lithuania is 'seriously considering' withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said Wednesday." Defense Ministry spokeswoman Ruta Apeitkyte told the AP that "the Baltic country was considering not replacing the contingent when its mission ends in August."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are 7,100 British troops in Iraq. The first 1,600 will leave over the next few months." Blair was shown saying, "There is no Sunni insurgency. There is no Al Qaeda base." Blair was "in Parliament today making a case for a British troop draw down in southern Iraq. A few months ago, the British handed over partial control of Basra, the biggest city in the south and since then it has remained relatively calm. … Bottom-line, the British have done what they can, Blair's plan now, withdraw a quarter of British troops by summer, all could be out by the end of next year."

The Washington Post (2/22, A1, Jordan, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Blair's plans allow him in the final months of his administration to show a measure of independence from Washington on Iraq policy. Battered in public opinion polls because of his support of the war, Blair has said he will step down by September."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief spokesman of the multinational forces in Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer), "The British forces, just like us, have been thoroughly committed from the beginning. They're steadfast partners, been working hard, and as they have looked at their mission down there in Basra, and they see they can draw the force levels down by about 1,500 over this year, it makes logical sense to do that. … It makes sense for the British forces, at this point in time, to draw down their force levels here as they continue to commit themselves both here and in Afghanistan, supporting the efforts of both places."

British Pullout Could Empower Iran. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 2, 1:55, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "The withdrawal comes as no surprise to US commanders here, one of whom told me the British haven't been in control of the south for some time. However, there is concern that this will give neighboring Iran free reign to continue its support of these powerful militias." USA Today (2/22, 4A, Jervis, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran, Militias Could Gain From British Pullout."

The New York Times (2/22, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that a "senior Defense Department official said that, if security conditions deteriorated in the south, American commanders might need to send in their own forces to help remaining British units and Iraqi troops. He noted that the United States also usually keeps reserve forces nearby in Kuwait that could be sent into Iraq as well. 'If something flares, we will react to it with the forces on the ground,' the official said."

In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Rice-Oxley, Murphy, 59K) reports, "Blair's move isn't likely to help the Bush administration."

More Commentary. Bartle Brese Bull, the international editor of Prospect magazine, writes in an New York Times op-ed (2/22) titled "The End Of The Alliance," that "Blair's decision may have as much to do with strategic good sense as it does with domestic politics. The truth is that the British gave up trying to win their war in southern Iraq a long time ago, and they probably accomplished as much as they could. … The priority now is to give Iraqis the best possible conditions to achieve the best feasible Iraq: one that stays whole; suffers less internal violence than it has historically; is not a threat to its neighbors or the rest of us; and that through a few good internal examples and a modicum of representative government has hope and mechanisms for improving itself. This is an approach that will have to be adapted to suit each region. And in southern Iraq, it seems clear, it is time for the Iraqis to succeed or fail on their own."

Cheney Criticizes Democratic Efforts To Stop Iraq Troop Surge. The AP (2/21, Hunt) reports Vice President Cheney "harshly criticized Democrats' attempts to thwart President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying their approach would 'validate the al-Qaida strategy.' House Speaker Nancy Pelosi fired back that Cheney was questioning critics' patriotism." Pelosi said, "I hope the President will repudiate and distance himself from the Vice President's remarks." Pelosi said she "tried to complain about Cheney to President Bush but could not reach him." The AP says Cheney, in Tokyo, "used an interview to criticize Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., over their plan to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the Iraq war to make it difficult or impossible to send 21,500 extra troops to Iraq."

During that ABC World News (2/21, story 2, 2:30, 8.78M) interview, Jonathan Karl asked Cheney, "You just made a very clear statement in your speech, saying the American people do not support a policy of retreat. … Is that policy that we hear from the Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, from other Democrats, u that a policy of defeat?" Cheney: "Yes. … I think the American people want to see, first and foremost, success in Iraq. I think to do what Nancy Pelosi is suggesting -- and she made it very clear on many occasions, that she, in fact, wants to get out -- that that's exactly the wrong medicine. It's the wrong course of action. It will do nothing but encourage the terrorists, and it will have a devastating long-term consequences in the global war on terror." The Hill (2/22, Good) reports Cheney also said he "does not think Democratic congressional leaders will be able to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq. … Cheney said: 'I don't think so. The question is whether or not they have the votes.'"

GOP Lawmakers Defend Bush Strategy. Sen. Jon Kyl, just back from a one-day trip to Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer), "I can tell you that both among all of our military commanders [and] officials from the Iraqi leadership, all had what I would characterize as cautious optimism about the new strategy that's beginning to unfold. We already have one of the five new brigades in Iraq, the second is just about ready to go in, just in a matter of days, the third is being prepared. And the Iraqis are doing things a lot differently than they had done before, with the result that the Iraqis have said that there is a totally different view on the part of the people on the street about the potential for success here."

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News' Your World (2/21, Cavuto), "I think what's confused here with some of my friends in the Congress is that they have misinterpreted dissatisfaction with what's been going on in Iraq to a belief that people are willing to lose that war. … Iraq is one very complicated piece of an even more complicated world where we have lots of enemies. Those enemies are ready for us to show weakness. Anytime we do this, it just helps them recruit, fund, find suicide bombers, whatever they're looking for at that moment, any weakness in the United States."

George Will writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 690K), "Indiscriminate criticism of…Bush is an infectious disease. Some conservatives seem to have caught it, but congressional Democrats might be crippled by it." Democrats "lack the will to exercise their clearly constitutional power to defund the war. And they lack the power to achieve that end by usurping the commander in chief's powers to conduct a war. They can spend this year fecklessly and cynically enacting restrictions that do not restrict. Or they can legislate decisive failure of the Iraq operation -- withdrawal -- thereby acquiring conspicuous complicity in a defeat that might be inevitable anyway. A Hobson's choice? No, Nancy Pelosi's and Harry Reid's."

Cheney To Face "Public Anger" In Australia. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Squires, 59K) says Cheney, "perhaps the most powerful vice president in United States history, arrives in Sydney Thursday for a four-day visit" to Australia, making him "the most senior American visitor to Australia since President Bush addressed the joint houses of Parliament in Canberra in 2003. But despite Australia's status as a steadfast US ally and broad public support for the country's troop deployment in Afghanistan, Cheney will encounter public anger over Australia's participation in the Iraq war and growing disquiet over the fate of the country's lone Guantánamo Bay detainee, David Hicks." Cheney's visit "comes at an awkward time for Prime Minister John Howard, who has been in power for more than a decade but this week slumped to his lowest opinion-poll rating in six years."

Iraqi Insurgents Detonate Second Chemical Dirty Bomb. ABC World News (2/21, story 3, :40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Insurgents in Iraq are stepping up their use of a new and deadly weapon, chemical dirty bombs. A truck bomb, today, in Baghdad, combined explosives with chlorine gas. The chlorine burns and can kill when it explodes. It was the second such blast in as many days." NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 3, :40, Williams, 9.87M) noted two people were killed in yesterday's bombing.

The New York Times (2/22, Cave, Fadam, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi and American officials said the use of chlorine seemed aimed at bringing a new level of fear and havoc to Iraq as a new security plan for Baghdad takes shape." Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, an American military spokesman, "said the attacks highlighted the fluidity of insurgent tactics in Iraq, dominated by militant groups that often notice and repeat attacks that attract the most attention and cause the most suffering."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "The use of chlorine gas weapons in warfare dates to at least World War I, when Germans used them in April 1915 to dislodge French soldiers from trenches. The weapons caused far more injuries than deaths, though small airborne concentrations of the gas can kill within minutes." Also yesterday, "several roadside bomb attacks in southern Baghdad killed at least three Iraqis and injured two." Violence also "erupted in the country's predominantly Shiite south, where US and British-led forces have begun handing control to Iraqi authorities." The Washington Post (2/22, A12, Londono, 690K) also reports the story.

Another US Helicopter Shot Down. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A US military Blackhawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad today. None of the nine people on board was seriously injured. At least eight American helicopters have crashed or been forced down by hostile fire in the past month." The Washington Times/AP (2/22, Salaheddin) reports "all aboard were safely evacuated by a second helicopter."

The AP (2/22, Murphy) reports, "Military officials worry extremists may have recently gained more access to firepower such as shoulder-fired anti-aircraft rockets and heavy machine guns -- and more expertise to use them. The Black Hawk would be at least the eighth U.S. helicopter to crash or be taken down by hostile fire in the past month."

General Says Sadr "Clearly Not In Iraq." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief spokesman of the multinational forces in Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer) that Muqtada al-Sadr is "clearly not in Iraq and has not been for some time. And all indications are is that he is currently located in Iran."

Pentagon To Send National Guard Troops Back To Iraq Early. The New York Times (2/22, Cloud, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the Defense Department "is planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, shortening their time between deployments to meet the demands of President Bush's buildup." National Guard officials "told state commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio last month that while a final decision had not been made, units from their states that had done previous tours in Iraq and Afghanistan could be designated to return to Iraq next year between January and June," according to Pentagon officials.

Commanders Seek Equipment, Reconstruction Funding. The Politico (2/21, Lowe) reports military commanders, "in a move sure to provide ammunition to congressional critics of the Iraq war," have given Congress "a long list of equipment and reconstruction needs totaling nearly $36 billion, denied earlier by the administration in its $481 billion defense appropriations request for the new fiscal year. The lists come as Democratic leaders, who control both the House and the Senate, consider a new legislative strategy to restrict President Bush's ability to prosecute the war and, eventually, force a U.S. withdrawal."

ROTC's Shift Away From Cities Hurts Efforts To Build Multiethnic Military. In a 2,200-word front-page feature, the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Jaffe, 2.04M) writes about the move of Reserve Officer Training Corps programs away from big cities, which is having a negative impact as the Army struggles "to build an officer corps that takes full advantage of America's multiethnic society." The Journal says that an officer's background "didn't matter so much when the U.S. was focused on fighting big armies in large conventional battles. These days, though, U.S. success in places like Iraq and Afghanistan hinges on the ability of Army officers to win the trust of a suspicious and often culturally alien population. … There are only about 1,500 Muslims in a force of about 500,000 soldiers," and "Arabic speakers are in critically short supply throughout the force."

US Military To Investigate Controversial Iraq Rape Claim. USA Today (2/22, 4A, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "The U.S. military said Wednesday that it will launch its own investigation into an alleged rape that has created a furor among Iraq's Sunnis and bitterly split the country's government." Gen. David Petraeus "ordered an investigation into allegations by a 20-year-old Sunni woman who said she was raped last week by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force." Earlier this week, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "cleared the three police officers…following an investigation that lasted less than a day. He announced an unspecified reward for the officers and said the rape charge was fabricated to discredit the U.S. and Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad." Yesterday, Maliki "fired a leading Sunni official who had called for an international investigation."

The New York Times (2/22, A10, Santora, 1.16M) says it is "unclear if Mr. Maliki had the authority to fire the Sunni official, Sheik Ahmad Abdul Ghafur al-Samaraei, who runs the Sunni Endowment, an organization that cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq." Samaraei "said he was not surprised" to be dismissed. Samaraei said, "Maliki is fed up with me talking about all the terrible things that are happening to Iraqis, whether it is killing, kidnappings or illegal arrests."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Peterson, 59K) says that "even before the details of the case could be determined, Iraqis heard competing claims by the alleged Sunni victim broadcast on TV and a Shiite premier who says the charges have been fabricated to undermine the US-Iraqi security plan in Baghdad." Maliki "states that medical tests show the woman 'had not been subjected to any sexual attack,' and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her." But the woman's claims "and Maliki's handling of the case are sparking outrage among Sunnis."

Italian Prime Minister Resigns After Losing Afghanistan Vote. The Financial Times (2/22, Barber) reports, "Romano Prodi resigned as prime minister of Italy on Wednesday night after a parliamentary defeat on foreign policy. His decision raised fears that Italy was returning to the days of short-lived governments and paralysis in policymaking. Mr Prodi, 67, handed in his resignation to Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, who planned to start talks on Thursday to see who, if anyone, has enough support to form a new government." Prodi's "nine-party, centre-left coalition took office in May, a month after he defeated Silvio Berlusconi, the former centre-right premier, in the closest election in modern Italian history." The Times adds, "The sudden crisis that overwhelmed Mr Prodi centred on his inability to persuade communists and other radical leftists in his coalition to support two cornerstones of Italian foreign and security policy. These were Mr Prodi's determination to keep Italian troops side by side with Nato forces in Afghanistan and his decision to permit the expansion of a US military base in the north-eastern city of Vicenza."

USA Today (2/22, 4A, For, 2.27M) reports, "Italy's 1,800 troops in Afghanistan are part of the NATO peacekeeping force there. Many members of the broad center-left Prodi coalition are pacifists who oppose sending Italian troops abroad." The constitution "did not require Prodi to step down, but Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema -- a two-time prime minister and a potential candidate to succeed Prodi -- said before the vote that the government should step down if it failed to win enough support in the Senate."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Wilkinson, 850K) says "Prodi will continue as a caretaker prime minister until a new government takes power." The New York Times (2/22, Fisher, 1.16M), Wall Street Journal (2/22, A6, Kahn, Leo, 2.04M), Washington Times (2/22, Phillips, 88K) and Washington Post (2/22, A16, Delaney, 690K) also report the story.

LATimes Says Afghanistan Should Reject War Crimes Amnesty. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) editorializes, "How does a government prosecute people for crimes against humanity when the suspects happen to be running the government? That's the question facing Afghanistan, where men suspected of horrifying acts of rape and murder sit in parliament and hold other high offices. … The ideal solution for Afghanistan would be to create a body similar to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. … Yet South Africa, unlike Afghanistan, didn't have to contend with entrenched politicians who control large swaths of territory with armed militias. It also had the capacity to prosecute those who refused to step forward, while Afghan courts are a work in progress." President Hamid Karzai's "best course would be to reject" a pending war crimes amnesty law "until the country is ready to face the horrors of its recent past. The international community, especially NATO, should be doing more to help Afghanistan build the institutions and civil society necessary for it to do so."

DOJ:

DOJ Probing Home Purchase By Former Attorney, Lobbyist. The AP (2/22, Heilprin) reports, "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi called for tighter ethics rules in federal agencies Wednesday after government officials approved the purchase of a $980,000 vacation home by a top Justice Department lawyer with an oil company lobbyist." The AP continues, "Pelosi's criticism followed an Associated Press report last week that department ethics officials did not object when Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then head of the environment division, was buying a South Carolina beach house with Donald R. Duncan, the top Washington lobbyist for ConocoPhillips. … 'If in fact Ms. Wooldridge got such a pass from the ethics committee of the executive branch, then certainly the executive branch ethics process needs a look as well,' Pelosi, D-Calif., said when asked about the house purchase at a San Francisco news conference." The AP adds, "Nine months after the purchase, Wooldridge approved an agreement that allowed ConocoPhillips an extension of pollution cleanup requirements at some of the company's refineries. The company says Duncan was not part of those negotiations. … Department officials and a lawyer for Wooldridge, who resigned from the job in January, said the department's ethics office approved the arrangement and told her she did not need to withdraw from dealings with ConocoPhillips. … The third buyer of the Kiawah Island, S.C., home was Wooldridge's companion, former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles. He is the highest-ranking Bush administration official facing possible criminal charges in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe." The AP notes, "The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is looking into the home purchase and consent decrees, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said in a letter Friday to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee."

Columnist Criticizes DOJ Official Over Alleged Conflict. In a column for the Chicago Tribune (2/21), John Kass writes, "Seeking to overturn former Gov. George Ryan's corruption convictions, lawyer Gene Schaerr on Tuesday told a federal appellate court panel that 'a pink rhinoceros' hung over the trial, making a fair jury verdict impossible, perhaps because the lone pro-Ryan holdout juror was bounced for failing to disclose her criminal record. … I thought that was why there were alternate jurors--if one or two are excused for cause, you've got a few on the B Team. … But the pink rhinoceros bit is so nice, I'll steal it and remind you of another pink rhinoceros." Kass continues, "Ed McNally is the pink rhinoceros of the U.S. Department of Justice. … He continues to work in the criminal division--though he had a whopping conflict of interest in the Ryan case--even as the Bush Department of Justice fires other prosecutors who actually hunt down political corruption. … 'I'm aware of the allegations [against McNally],' Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales told me when he appeared before the Tribune's editorial board a while ago. … 'They're very serious allegations,' Gonzales said. 'And the matter is being reviewed internally. I can say that.' … That was six months ago, on Aug. 14, 2006." Kass adds, "Recently, seven U.S. attorneys of other districts were forced to resign, even though most received positive Justice Department job evaluations prior to their dismissals. Included among those let go are Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted the phenomenally corrupt and vulgar Republican U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. … So they're gone. And Republican McNally is still very much employed." Kass concludes, "In the seven months since Gonzales said the allegations against McNally were serious, consider: … Chicago U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald--no friend of the bi-partisan political combine of insiders who run things in this state--got stuck spending his time on the Scooter Libby-CIA leak case in Washington, rather than spending it hunting Republican and Democratic public corruption in Illinois. … Sun-Times columnist Mark Brown revealed in a fine column that Rodger Heaton, the new U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, had dinner in Springfield with two of the combine's cleanup hitters: Republicans Big Bill Cellini and Big Bob Kjellander, who haven't been indicted but are listed as Individual A and Individual K in the state pension fund scandal case. … That's just what a pink rhinoceros would do--publicly feed with Cellini and Kjellander, tell a few jokes and everybody in town gets the message. … And for all the bleating and wailing you'll hear and read by Ryan mouthpieces about justice and fairness, remember the one they won't mention, the pink rhinoceros named Ed McNally."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Reverses Conviction Of Former NYSE Trading Specialist. The New York Law Journal (2/22, Bar) reports, "In a blow to the office of Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia, a federal judge has taken the rare step of reversing a jury verdict convicting a former New York Stock Exchange trading specialist of securities fraud in a scheme known as 'interpositioning.'" The Journal continues, "Southern District Judge Denny Chin, in United States v. Finnerty, 05 cr. 393, agreed Wednesday to enter a judgment of acquittal, setting aside the Oct. 26, 2006, verdict. … Chin held that while federal prosecutors proved that defendant David Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, they failed to prove fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of the securities laws. … 'I hold that the government did not ... establish that Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived,' he said in a 37-page opinion." The Journal adds, "In describing interpositioning, the judge said that instead of matching pending buy and sell orders, the specialists repeatedly trade for their company's proprietary account, making a profit from the slight differences in pricing. … Southern District prosecutors have had a difficult time proving criminal charges against Finnerty and 14 other floor specialist traders whom they accused of using their inside positions to earn an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their companies." The Journal notes, "Before Wednesday's ruling, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District had already dropped charges against seven of the defendants. Besides Finnerty, two former traders (Michael Stern and Michael Hayward of Van der Moolen Specialists USA) were convicted, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large. (NYLJ, Aug. 10, 2006) … 'he government [in these cases] provided no real evidence that customers were deceived,'said Jacob Zamansky, a plaintiffs attorney at Zamansky & Associates who specializes in securities litigation but did not represent any of the defendants in the interpositioning cases. 'his almost looks like a victimless crime.' … Assistant U.S. Attorneys Lauren Goldberg and Anirudh Bansal prosecuted the case. A spokesperson for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment."

The New York Post (2/22, Boyd) reports, "A federal judge yesterday took the very rare step of throwing out a jury's conviction of former New York Stock Exchange specialist David Finnerty, citing a lack of evidence to support a guilty finding." The Post continues, "The ruling is a stinging rebuke for prosecutors, who have had little success in winning convictions in their high-profile and wide-ranging campaign against corrupt trading practices at the Big Board." The Post adds, "The April 2005 indictments filed against 15 specialists shook up Wall Street. … However, the pursuant collapse of many of the cases that prosecutors filed has stunned the legal world. … The Southern District's prosecutors, who generally achieve conviction rates of between 80 and 90 percent, managed to win just two partial convictions and two plea deals. … The partial convictions - of two partners at Van Der Moolen Specialists USA - are currently on appeal." The Post notes, "A spokeswoman for the Southern District of New York said, 'We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options.'" The AP (2/22) also reported on the ruling.

US Will Not Try To Reinstate Former Westar Officials' Fraud Convictions. Bloomberg (2/22) reports, "The government will not try to reinstate the fraud convictions of two former Westar Energy executives, prosecutors said yesterday." Bloomberg continues, "The United States attorney's office in Topeka, Kan., said it would not ask an appeals court in Denver to reconsider its decision in January to reverse the convictions of the executives, David C. Wittig and Douglas T. Lake. The appeals court said that evidence at the trial did not justify the guilty verdicts." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Wittig, the former chief executive, and Mr. Lake, a former vice president, were accused of looting Westar, a public utility based in Topeka. They were convicted in 2005 of money laundering and wire fraud. … 'We had until Feb. 20 to notify the 10th Circuit whether we wanted to ask for a rehearing,' a government spokesman, Jim Cross, said, referring to the federal appeals court in Denver. 'We have allowed that deadline to pass.'" Bloomberg notes, "The court said prosecutors could not retry the wire fraud and money laundering counts, but could retry some lesser claims. Mr. Cross said that prosecutors had not decided on a retrial. … The remaining charges 'have to do with personal use of a corporate plane,' said Mr. Wittig's lawyer, Steven Alan Reiss, of Weil, Gotshal & Manges in New York."

Veritas Software To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case. The Washington Post (2/22, D4, Johnson) reports, "Veritas Software agreed to pay $30 million to resolve civil fraud charges connected to an improper advertising deal it signed with AOL during the Internet boom's waning days." The Post continues, "A Securities and Exchange Commission complaint accused Veritas and AOL of Dulles of simultaneously wiring payments to each other as part of an improper, unwritten "round-trip" agreement. Both companies used the deal to inflate revenue, the complaint said. For Veritas, the transaction added 2 cents per share to its fourth-quarter and annual earnings in 2000, allowing it to beat Wall Street expectations." The Post adds, "Court papers filed in the District late Tuesday also accused Veritas of engaging in a series of accounting maneuvers to smooth its financial results into 'museum quality' reports from 2000 through 2002. Among other things, the company used 'wish lists' prepared by employees in its finance and operations unit to build cushions of expenses to make its earnings appear steadier. … Veritas, which was acquired nearly two years ago by Symantec and is a wholly owned subsidiary, neither admitted nor denied the allegations. It has restated its financials twice: once to reverse $20 million it had booked as part of the AOL deal and again to correct problems with its profit-smoothing practices. … In a statement, a spokeswoman for Symantec said the company had set aside the settlement funds in reserve. The spokeswoman also pointed out that Symantec, one of the nation's largest providers of data security software, is not named in the complaint. … The case is a leftover from an era when technology companies struggled to meet the expectations of analysts and investors. AOL, which was then known as America Online and has since been absorbed by Time Warner, paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges about its financial dealings."

WSJournal Praises Fannie Mae For Withholding Bonuses. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "At a truly private company, withholding more than $40 million in bonuses tied to fraudulent earnings would be a no-brainer. But Fannie Mae is neither a normal business nor exactly private, even if its shares are in private hands. So this week's announcement that current and former top executives at the mortgage giant wouldn't be receiving $44.4 million in Fannie Mae shares has to count as progress." The "optimistic view of yesterday's news is that Fannie, chastened by the accounting fraud and a newly invigorated regulator under Ofheo Director James Lockhart is beginning to act more like an ordinary company and less like the local bully in Washington."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Jury Begins Deliberations. ABC World News (2/21, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The trial of a former top White House adviser went to the jury today.

DOJ_NMG_0135390

Lewis 'Scooter' Libby is accused of obstructing the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA agent during the run-up to the war in Iraq. Libby was Vice President Cheney's chief of staff at the time." The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 9, :15, Couric, 7.66M) also noted, "Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in the CIA leak case."

The AP (2/22, Sniffen) reports, "After 4 1/2 hours of deliberation, the jurors went home until Thursday. The jurors include a former Washington Post reporter, an MIT-trained economist, a retired math teacher, a former museum curator, a law firm accountant, a Web architect and several retired or current federal workers. There are 10 whites and two blacks -- unexpected in a city where blacks outnumber whites more than 2-to-1." The Washington Post (2/22, A4, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes that "the presiding judge urged jurors to rely on their 'life experiences' in deciding whether the vice president's former chief of staff lied to investigators -- or made an honest mistake -- about his role in a CIA leak. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton's instructions to the jury of eight women and four men reinforced the issue of the fallibility of human memory that has been central to one of Washington's most celebrated trials in years."

The AP (2/22, Sniffen) reports that the jury received "more than an hour of instructions Wednesday from U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton before beginning their discussions. … Walton explained to the jurors that they must weigh the truth of several statements by Libby in the various counts." The AP continues, "On the obstruction count, Walton said they could find Libby guilty should they unanimously decide any one, or more, of three Libby statements were lies: that Russert asked Libby if Plame worked at CIA and said all the reporters knew it; that Libby was surprised to learn the Plame information from Russert; or that Libby told Cooper he had heard it from reporters but did not know it was true. … On one count of lying to the FBI, jurors could find Libby guilty if they found either or both of his statements about the Russert call were lies, Walton explained. The other count of lying to the FBI hinges on Libby's statement about the Cooper call. … On two counts of perjury, jurors would have to weigh various Libby statements to the grand jury about how he learned about Plame's job and whom he told, including four separate statements in one count, Walton said."

In addition to reporting on the start of jury deliberations, the AP and newspaper stories recount the arguments made by both sides at trial – and note, as the WPost reports, "Evidence and 14 days of testimony have shown that Cheney, Libby and other top administration officials sought to discredit Wilson." Under the headline "Libby Perjury Hearing Casts Cloud Over Cheney," the Financial Times (2/22, Daniels) reports, "Even if Mr Libby is convicted, questions will remain about Mr Cheney's role in directing his aide to rebut Mr Wilson, and his intervention to force" former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer "to make a public statement exonerating Mr Libby. But an acquittal would also carry risks for Mr Fitz-gerald. It could lead to criticism that he prosecuted what turned out to be a trivial case. It could also underline that he failed to prosecute anyone for the initial crime he was appointed to investigate: who it was who leaked the name of Ms Plame." The New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) and USA Today (2/22, Willing, 2.27M) also report on yesterday's proceedings.

Trial Fuels Debate Over Alleged Political Use Of Intelligence. Under the headline "Politics Meets Intelligence At Trial," the Wall Street Journal (2/22, A8, Perez, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that the Libby "case has added fuel to calls for a broader examination of how intelligence was used in political arguments in the past six years. Moreover, some current and former administration officials say, the trial's airing of the use of intelligence -- especially over the Iraq war -- threatens to further undermine confidence in American claims on other sensitive matters. That could be a particular problem in the U.S. campaign to convince the world to curb Iran's nuclear program." The Journal adds that "the trial has provided congressional intelligence officials with extensive information on how the vice president's office functioned semi-autonomously in pushing foreign-policy initiatives. These officials said the information could prove helpful in continuing investigations into how public statements made by the president and vice president differed from the underlying intelligence provided by the CIA and other intelligence agencies."

Henninger Blames DOJ For "Travesty" Of Libby Prosecution. In a Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) column, deputy editor Daniel Henninger writes that the Libby trial "is the closest version of a Red Queen trial this country has had in a long time. … Lewis G. Carroll's account of the Knave' s trial before the Red Queen and White Rabbit is famous for the Queen's dictum, 'Sentence first, verdict afterward.' But read the full transcript of the mock trial and one will see that the real subject is not justice, but the humiliation of the defendant." Henninger adds, "If found guilty, Mr. Libby goes to prison. … If acquitted, he loses only…his reputation. This, too, is ruin. … It is a travesty that the Valerie Plame bump-and-run case brought Lewis Libby to the edge of this cliff. Primary blame belongs to the Bush Justice Department's abdication of responsibility."

Former Florida Federal Prison Guard Sentenced In Sex Scandal. The AP (2/22) reports, "A former federal prison guard was sentenced Wednesday to a year of home detention and three years probation for his role in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a deadly gun battle last summer." The AP continues, "E. Lavon Spence, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud in October, was sentenced by Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle in federal court. … Prison time 'would affect the recovery' of Spence from his November stroke at the age of 40, Hinkle said." The AP adds, "A Justice Department special agent was killed and a prison officer was wounded in June when they came to arrest the six guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. One of the guards, Ralph Hill, was also killed in the gunfight Hill started. … Three of the guards have already been sentenced to a year in prison, with two also receiving three years of probation after their release. A fourth guard was sentenced to a year of probation."

Former Civilian DOD Employee Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Stars and Stripes (2/22, Coon) reports, "A former employee of U.S. Special Operations Command Europe in Stuttgart, Germany, pleaded guilty on Friday to accepting bribes in return for steering work to a Romania- and Iraq-based contractor." S&S continues, "Steven Merkes, who worked as a logistical planner, faces up to two years in prison and $250,000 in fines for performing acts for Philip Bloom in return for $24,000 in cash and future employment, according to a Justice Department news release. … Sentencing for Merkes is scheduled for June 1." S&S adds, "Bloom, one of the ringleaders in a wide-ranging scheme to defraud the former Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq, was sentenced Friday to 46 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for committing bribery and money-laundering and conspiring to defraud. … Both cases were tried in U.S. District Court in Washington." S&S notes, "According to the Justice Department, Merkes worked at the special operations command, or SOCEUR, as an airman until January 2005, and afterward as a Defense Department civilian employee. … In both positions, Merkes' official duties consisted of planning military exercises for special operations forces in the European theater, according to the Justice Department. … Bloom, 67, of Bucharest, Romania, was at the center of a scandal that resulted in the arrests of at least four servicemembers and three civilians. One of the civilians, Robert Stein, was sentenced Jan. 29 to nine years in prison for charges including weapons possession. … Stein, a former comptroller with the Coalition Provisional Authority, was convicted of, among other crimes, stealing money from the Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq that was funneled to Bloom for the purchase of assault rifles, silencers and grenade launchers, for personal use in the United States, according to the Justice Department."

1980 Corruption Case Said To Offer Insights On Fumo Defense. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/22, Lounsberry, 385K) reports, "The case was federal, and one of the defendants was State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo. But the year was 1980, and that was another era in Philadelphia politics and in FBI corruption probes. … Though a jury found Fumo guilty, along with former city Democratic Party chief Peter J. Camiel and former State Sen. Thomas M. Nolan, a judge overturned the verdict and acquitted all three -- a giant victory for political figures who faced possible prison sentences." The Inquirer notes, "The old case offers insight about how Fumo, as a defendant, conducted himself on the witness stand. It lays out how some of the city's top defense lawyers fought at trial, and on appeal." Then-US Attorney Peter F. Vaira "said that if the 1980 federal case is any guide, Fumo and his current legal team will fight like tigers."

Suspected Software Pirate Arraigned On Federal Charges. InformationWeek (2/22, Gaudin) reports, "A man, U.S. authorities describe as the leader of one of the oldest and most renowned Internet software piracy groups, was arraigned in U.S. District Court on Tuesday." IW continues, "Hew Raymond Griffiths, 44, a British national living in Bateau Bay, Australia, is being charged with one count of conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement. If convicted on both counts, Griffiths faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. … Griffiths, known by the screen nickname 'Bandido,' was extradited from Australia in what the Department of Justice says is one of the first ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense. He had been held in Australia for three years while he fought the extradition. … 'Griffiths claimed to be beyond the reach of U.S. law, and today, we have proven otherwise,' said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a written statement. 'This extradition represents the Department of Justice's commitment to protect intellectual property rights from those who violate our laws from the other side of the globe.'" IW adds, "The indictment, which was returned in March 2003, charges Griffiths with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws as the leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie. The group was known as one of the oldest security-conscious piracy groups on the Internet. DrinkOrDie was founded in Russia in 1993, according to the DOJ, and expanded internationally throughout the '90s. … The group was dismantled by the team effort of the DOJ and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement as part of Operation Buccaneer in December 2001. More than 70 raids reportedly were conducted in the U.S., as well as in the United Kingdom, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Australia. Operation Buccaneer so far has resulted in 30 felony convictions and 10 convictions of foreign nationals overseas, according to the DOJ."

Railroad Police Hunt Scoff-Law Snowmobilers. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A1, Machalaba) reports from Holland, NY, "Railroad policeman Matthew Galas eased his cruiser behind a snowbank near a Norfolk Southern Corp. train line. He'd seen what he was looking for: fresh snowmobile tracks on the right of way. Lawbreakers had been there that morning. … He settled in to await his prey. An hour later, a snowmobile slid to a stop at the edge of the woods. Its driver nosed toward the train track, as if about to follow alongside it through railroad property. Then he spotted Mr. Galas, and disappeared back into the snowy forest. … Mr. Galas is one of more than a thousand police officers employed by U.S. railroads. A couple hundred of them spend at least part of their winters on a unique mission: chasing snowmobilers illegally on the train tracks." The Journal continues, "Mr. Galas once ticketed a man whose snowmobile was demolished after it had gotten caught in a snow-covered track. The driver dismounted shortly before a freight train smashed into his snowmobile -- as well as a second snowmobile that was trying to tow his off the track. Another time, Mr. Galas says he was dragged perhaps 100 feet across the snow at 2 a.m. by a snowmobiler he stopped for trespassing and suspected of being under the influence. When the snowmobiler decided to run for it, his vehicle's handlebars caught on Mr. Galas's jacket and gun belt. … After a slow start this year, winter has hit the Northeast with a vengeance. Where Mr. Galas works, in the Buffalo suburbs, that has meant frigid temperatures, heavy snowfall and an escalation of the annual fight between railroad police and the area's legions of snowmobile fanatics. So far this month, Mr. Galas has issued warnings to eight snowmobilers on the right of way in Holland, just one of many freight lines crisscrossing the area. Police have given out tickets that can carry fines of $100." The Journal adds, "Snowmobiling is important to the region's economy and culture. The state government provides funds to local snowmobile clubs to groom and mark their trails. Local shops, gas stations, restaurants and bars rely on snowmobile business, both from tourists and locals. … Some aficionados resent the railroad getting aggressive about patrolling the right of way along its tracks, which can be as wide as 100 feet and tends to have some of the flattest, smoothest paths among the hilly and treacherous woods."

Prosecutors Pursuing Indictments In Nevada Health Care Fraud Probe. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (2/21) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Federal authorities are moving forward with a conspiracy investigation targeting several of the valley's best-known doctors and lawyer. FBI agents began the probe back in 2003. Federal prosecutors turned up the heat in front of a grand jury putting some of the most successful doctors and lawyers in Las Vegas in the crosshairs of this investigation. They reportedly called themselves the 'Medical Mafia.' The FBI suspects them of conspiring to rip off patients, clients, and insurance companies for tens of millions of dollars." KLAS noted, "FBI agents have reportedly gathered so much information about more than a dozen attorneys and physicians that they weren't sure which cases and charges to pursue. Knowledgeable sources say prosecutors have narrowed their focus to concentrate on cases involving conspiracy."

Massachusetts Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Seniors. The AP (2/22) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted an Andover financial adviser yesterday on charges he bilked senior citizens in Connecticut and Massachusetts out of nearly $2 million and spent the money on lavish trips to Las Vegas and $5,000-a-day visits to strip clubs." John A. Baldo "was arrested Jan. 25 as he got off a flight from Boston to Las Vegas." The AP notes, "An 88-year-old man in Storrs, Conn., gave Baldo $1.6 million, and his 85-year-old brother, who also lives in Connecticut, gave him $200,000, according to the indictment. Prosecutors say he also stole $200,000 from a 63-year-old Rockport woman. FBI agent Melissa Valera said in a court filing that Baldo spent about $300,000 for three luxury cars and almost that amount gambling."

Michigan Man Sentenced To Nine Years In Prison For Child Porn. The AP (2/22) reports, "A suburban Detroit man was sentenced to 9 years in prison Wednesday for receiving more than 23,000 images and 94 movies depicting child pornography. Michael Timothy Long's conviction resulted from an investigation conducted by agents from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, according a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Detroit office." The AP notes, "The case is part of Project Safe Childhood, a nationwide effort launched in 2006 designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse"

TJX Says Customer Data Breach Began In 2005. The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Nakashima) reports, "Retail giant TJX, whose stores include discount clothing chains T.J. Maxx and Marshalls, said yesterday that a computer-security breach stretched back 10 months earlier than the company originally thought, compromising credit and debit card data, drivers' license numbers, and names and addresses." The Post continues, "The announcement underscores a trend of security breaches involving sensitive credit card data and reflects failures to properly secure computer systems, to notify customers when breaches occur and to update laws for the cyber-crime age, lawmakers and analysts said. … TJX said that while it first thought the intrusion took place from May 2006 to January 2007, it now thinks its computer system was also hacked in July 2005 and on 'various subsequent dates' that year. The company, which reported the intrusion in January -- a month after it said it discovered the breach -- has not said how many customers may have been affected or how many customers it has notified." The Post adds, "Banks that issued the credit cards have not said how much they have had to cover in fraud-related losses. … More than 30 states have laws that require companies to notify customers as soon as possible when a breach has occurred, though most of the statutes let companies delay notification while law enforcement agencies investigate. A bipartisan group of senators has reintroduced legislation that would mandate customer notification and require companies that maintain personal information to establish internal policies to protect it."

California Sex Harassment Trial Goes To Jury. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Garrison) reports, "For those who suspect that psychiatrists are at least as crazy as the rest of us, the sexual harassment trial that went to a jury Wednesday in Superior Court here has provided no end of material." The Times continues, "Jurors who listened to two weeks of testimony -- including psychiatrists testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their reputations and descriptions of psychiatrists allegedly attending porn parties and having oral sex in cars. Now they must decide who is telling the truth." The Times adds, "Dr. David Martorano, a Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, claims he had an affair with his supervisor and that after he broke it off and rumors of it began to circulate, he lost a coveted post as chief resident, and his reputation was ruined. He sued the supervisor, Heather Krell, and UCLA. … Krell says there was no affair. Her lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for libel and slander. The jury considers both claims at the same time." The Times notes, "UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it doesn't matter whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country. … Testimony was so explicit that Judge Judith Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names -- a decision she acknowledged was unusual but said was necessary."

Maryand Governor Urges Lawmakers To Repeal Death Penalty. The Washington Post (2/22, B6, Wagner, Wiggins, 690K) reports, "Gov. Martin O'Malley urged Maryland lawmakers yesterday to repeal the state's death penalty, saying the punishment is 'inherently unjust,' does not serve as a deterrent to murder and saps resources that could be better spent on law enforcement. Stepping forcefully into a debate taking place in Annapolis and across the nation, O'Malley (D) suggested that Maryland and other states will inevitably execute innocent people. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978." The Post adds, "The issue, one of the most divisive facing the General Assembly this year, drew pleas from people on both sides of the issue during separate hearings conducted by House and Senate panels. But far more people turned out to support repeal, with nearly 30 people signing up to testify in favor of the bill in the Senate."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS Rules Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Bankruptcy Right. The AP (2/22, Yost) reports, "The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that a financially troubled small-business man gave up an important right under the federal bankruptcy code because he failed to disclose all of his assets as the law requires." The AP continues, "In a 5-4 decision, the Court said Robert Marrama of Gloucester, Mass., could not convert his bankruptcy case from one chapter of the code to another, as the law ordinarily allows. … The reason, the Court said, stemmed from his failure to disclose a Maine vacation home placed in a trust. Marrama, who operated a flooring company, listed the value of his interest in the property as zero, according to papers in the case." The AP adds, "After finding out about the home, the bankruptcy trustee said he would recover the real estate for the benefit of Marrama's creditors. Marrama had attempted to convert his case from a Chapter 7 liquidation to Chapter 13, which allows a debtor to keep property and pay debts over time. … Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens said honest debtors possess an absolute right to convert their cases to Chapter 13, but that nothing in the law limits a court's right to take away that right for 'fraudulent conduct.' … In dissent, Justice Samuel Alito said the bankruptcy code 'unambiguously provides' that a debtor has a 'broad right' to convert to Chapter 13. Alito said Chapter 13 contains a number of requirements that protect creditors from any bad faith by a debtor. … In Marrama's case, a bankruptcy judge denied the conversion to Chapter 13, and a bankruptcy appellate panel agreed."

Louisiana Hospital Settles Healthcare Fraud Charges With DOJ. The Moultrie (LA) Observer (2/22, Glenn) reports, "Following a U.S. Department of Justice investigation, Colquitt Regional Medical Center (CRMC) agreed to pay the federal government $475,000 to settle fraud allegations." The Observer continues, "The federal whistleblower case, which was filed Aug. 17, 2004, remained sealed until Wednesday. It centered around a series of claims submitted for Medicaid and Medicare reimbursement by CRMC's Home Care Services office in Sylvester from 2001 to 2005." The Observer adds, "Plaintiff Joyce Dickerson, a registered nurse and former director of the Moultrie Home Care Services office, allegedly reported to the hospital administration and the hospital authority in 2004 what she believed to be years of illegal billing. While hospital officials say the settlement was based on an 'error rate,' Dickerson's attorney Robert Howell of Moultrie said in actuality CRMC owes the federal government double the compromise agreement. … In the complaint, CRMC was alleged to have received payment from Medicare for services that were not reasonable and necessary, upcoded certification diagnoses so that the hospital was overpaid by Medicare and underutilized services after being paid in advance by Medicare allowing defendants to receive payment from both Medicare and patients."

Administration Stance Said To Have Edge In SCOTUS Faith-Based Case. In a Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) op-ed, Stanford Law School fellow Andrew Coan writes, "On Wednesday, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in just such a case. Hein vs. Freedom From Religion Foundation is unlikely to make headlines, but it could deal a sharp blow to the wall of separation between church and state. The plaintiffs are ordinary citizens who object to their federal tax dollars being used to fund the president's program for 'faith-based and community initiatives.' In particular, they claim that several conferences sponsored by the program were propaganda vehicles for religion and therefore violated the establishment clause of the 1st Amendment, which forbids government promotion of religion. The government defendants -- 'Hein' is Jay F. Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives -- dispute the plaintiffs' claim about the conferences. But at this stage, the Bush administration is asking the court to throw the case out on grounds that ordinary taxpayers have no legal interest in how the executive branch spends public money." Indicators "strongly suggest that the administration's position will prevail, despite the threat it poses to the separation of church and state."

LATimes Offers Qualified Praise For SCOTUS Tobacco Ruling. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) editorializes, "The US Supreme Court went further this week -- though not far enough -- in reining in juries in civil cases that award outlandish punitive damages. By a disappointingly narrow 5-4 vote, the justices overturned a jury's decision that Philip Morris should pay $79.5 million to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. The value of her actual damages was only $821,000. The justices could -- and should -- have ruled clearly that the $79.5-million award violated previous rulings that punitive damages may not be 'grossly excessive' and should bear a reasonable relation to the harm actually experienced by the plaintiff. But in returning the case to the Oregon courts, the court did impose a sensible rule that should make it harder for juries to sock deep-pocket and easily demonized defendants. … Without proper guidance, jurors can leap to the conclusion that damages should reflect the harm experienced by everyone who might have tasted tainted water -- or smoked a cigarette. Though it could have gone further, this week's decision should make such leaps less likely."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Initiative Will Strengthen Federal Enforcement Of Religious Freedom Rights. UPI (2/22) reports, "With the Executive Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention as his audience, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the launch of the First Freedom Project, a Justice Department effort to fight religious discrimination. 'Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles,' Gonzales told Executive Committee members Tuesday." UPI continues, "The First Freedom Project will be spearheaded by the Justice Department's civil-rights division and will build on the department's efforts to strengthen and preserve religious liberty throughout the nation, according to Gonzales, who sought the meeting with SBC leaders, Associated Baptist Press reported Wednesday. … 'Throughout our history, nothing has defined us a nation more than our respect for religious freedom,' Gonzales said. 'It is not confined to members of one church or the followers of one set of beliefs. Through this initiative, the Justice Department continues its vigorous efforts to enforce protections against religious discrimination.'" UPI adds, "The attorney general stressed that religious liberty is 'a universal right and applies to people of all faiths.' … Later, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because 'this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom.' He noted the 'timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience.' … Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms." UPI notes, "The First Freedom Project will initiate a program of public education to make certain that people know their rights, Gonzales said. 'People do not understand fully what their rights are,' he explained. … The First Freedom Project will sponsor a series of regional training seminars for leaders interested in religious liberty. The first one will be March 29 in Kansas City, Mo., followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., April 25 and Seattle, Wash., May 10. Other dates and locations will be announced later."

Ohio Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Racial Intimidation. The AP (2/22) reports, "A man accused of serving as a lookout in a scheme to use mercury to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced to two years and three months in federal prison, the Justice Department said. Joseph Kuzlik of Cleveland, who is white, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to interfere with the housing rights of an interracial family because of their race and to making false statements to federal investigators." The AP adds, "Kuzlik also was ordered to three years of supervised release and to pay $23,000 restitution to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and $767 to the Ohio EPA for cleanup. He also must make payments to individual victims."

Rhode Island AG Says State Should Recognize Massachusetts' Gay Marriages. The New York Times (2/22, Zezima, 1.16M) reports, "The Rhode Island attorney general said Wednesday that same-sex marriages performed in Massachusetts, the sole state where they are legal, should be recognized in Rhode Island." Responding to "a request for a legal opinion from the commissioner of the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education," Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch "said the state prohibited discrimination based on sexual orientation and did not explicitly prohibit same-sex marriage.

'Rhode Island will recognize same-sex marriages lawfully performed in Massachusetts as marriages in Rhode Island,' the seven-page opinion said." A spokesman for Gov. Donald L. Carcieri, "a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said Mr. Carcieri and his legal counsel were studying the opinion."

Supreme Court Sidesteps "War On Christmas" Case. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Richey, 59K) reports, "The US Supreme Court has declined to enter the fracas over what some conservatives are calling the war on Christmas. Without elaboration, the court issued a one-line order on Tuesday refusing to take up a potentially important church-state case concerning the use of religious symbols in public school holiday displays." At issue in Skoros v. City of New York was "whether the city's public school system is impermissibly promoting Judaism and Islam while conveying a message of disapproval of Christianity. School rules allow the Jewish menorah and the Muslim star and crescent in multireligious holiday displays but not nativity scenes depicting the birth of Jesus."

Novak Decries Elimination Of U Of Illinois Symbol. In a column for the Washington Post (2/22, A19), Robert Novak writes about the University of Illinois' board of trustees decision to eliminate the (81-year-old symbol of my alma mater" Chief Illiniwek, "bowing to years of pressure from Native American activists, the National Collegiate Athletic Association and liberal politicians." Novak continues, "This is a melancholy moment for me and many other Illinois alumni and university officials, including President B. Joseph White. The university has been forced to yield to blackmail. The death of the Chief epitomizes some unsavory aspects of contemporary American public life: political correctness, hypocrisy and bureaucratic tyranny." Novak, adds, "Only a small minority of Native Americans is shown by polls to oppose Indian nicknames in sports. The campaign against them gained momentum only when the NCAA, which can hardly cope with policing athlete misconduct and illegal payments in college sports, crusaded against dozens of colleges in the name of political correctness. The NCAA, under President Myles Brand, labeled Chief Illiniwek one of the 'hostile and abusive racial/ethnic/national origin mascots.' … But the Chief is no mascot (the university calls him a symbol). The big-headed depiction of the father of this country at George Washington University, the turtle representing the University of Maryland and the Demon Deacon for Wake Forest are mascots. Such college mascots are comical figures who engage in sham battles with each other and go into the stands to hug children. Chief Illiniwek did not. He was always austere and dignified. … The accusation that Illinois and other schools degrade Native Americans is absurd. These schools picked Indian symbols in admiration of their valor, ferociousness and indomitable spirit in the face of overwhelming odds." Novak concludes, "Chief Illiniwek finally was done in by politicians jumping on the NCAA's political correctness bandwagon. Illinois State Senate President Emil Jones Jr., no friend of the university, warned that trustees might not be confirmed unless they dumped the Chief, and university officials feared their appropriations coming under attack. … While I can understand dumping the Chief, I don't like it. I could react by withdrawing from my long-range commitments to support the University of Illinois, but I won't. That would put me in the same class as the petty bureaucrats and politicians who killed Chief Illiniwek."

ANTITRUST:

EMI Seeks Suitors After Warner Bid. The Financial Times (2/22, Reporters) reports, "EMI is in talks with several private equity groups including One Equity Partners, the US group affiliated with JPMorgan Chase, to sound out potential alternatives to Warner Music's $6bn approach for the British music group." The Times continues, "People familiar with the discussions cautioned that no firm offers appeared imminent, as Warner and would-be private equity suitors are demanding the right to conduct extensive due diligence on EMI's operations after it issued two profit warnings in quick succession since the start of the year. … EMI's board is still examining a possible securitisation of its publishing asset which remains its first choice unless a compelling offer is made." The Times adds, "The development comes less than three months after EMI's talks with Permira collapsed after the UK-based private equity group conducted due diligence, and four weeks after Warner's approach, which was disclosed only on Tuesday. … EMI, which would not comment on the discussions, rejected the January 24 approach from its closest rival, which is understood to have been pitched at an indicative price close to 300p. … Warner would not comment, but it is understood to have cut its valuation of EMI sharply since the latter's second profit warning. … Warner said yesterday any offer it made would be all in cash." The Times notes, "The US-listed group is understood to have decided against offering a stock alternative for financial reasons and because of the greater disclosure requirements offering shares would impose on its own investors. … Warner's statement came as EMI wrote to Warner, expressing doubts that the US group had significantly improved the chances of a deal being cleared by regulators. … Warner announced on Tuesday that it had secured the unexpected backing of Impala, an alliance of independent music companies which had opposed previous deals in the sector. … However, EMI's official response to Warner's approach argued it still saw significant regulatory risks."

EU Fines Elevator Makers For Price-Fixing.

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, C12, Cohen) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday fined four elevator and escalator makers a total of €992 million ($1.3 billion) for fixing prices, Europe's largest-ever antitrust penalty." The Journal continues, "ThyssenKrupp AG was fined €479.7 million, United Technologies Corp.'s Otis unit was fined €224.9 million, Schindler Holding AG was hit with a €143.7 million penalty and Kone was fined €142.1 million. The sum of these fines, which topped a €750 million penalty levied last month against makers of power-grid components, reflects the commission's expanded powers to crack down on corporate cartels. … Under new antitrust guidelines established last year, the commission can levy larger fines and apply an automatic 50% increase for repeat cartel offenders. Since ThyssenKrupp had a previous cartel punishment -- a €3.2 million fine in 1998 for fixing stainless-steel prices -- its elevator penalty included this increase, bringing its fine close to the record €497 million Microsoft Corp. paid in 2004 for breaking monopoly laws." The Journal adds, "The commission launched its investigation into the elevator business in January 2004. Its probe showed that the four companies fixed prices and rigged bids in Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Luxembourg between 1995 and 2004. … The commission said Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV, a division of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., participated in the Dutch cartel and it fined the company €1.8 million."

The Financial Times (2/22, Buck) reports, "It was the highest penalty imposed by the European Commission, topping a previous record set only last month. Brussels hopes that the recent increase in antitrust fines will deter companies from abusing the law and encourage people involved in cartels to blow the whistle on co-conspirators in exchange for immunity." The Times continues, "Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner and the -official behind Brussels' get-tough approach, said the lift and escalator cartel had behaved 'outrageously', while her spokesman said taxpayers, public authorities and other customers had been 'ripped off big time' by the cartel." The Times adds, "ThyssenKrupp, the German engineering group, received the toughest penalty, €479.7m ($630m, £322.5m). Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, was fined €224.9m, Schindler of Switzerland was given a €143.7m penalty and Finland's Kone was ordered to pay €142.1m. Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined €1.8m. … Ms Kroes said: 'The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators. For these companies the memory of this fine should last just as long.' … The Commission said the lifts installed in its own headquarters as well as at the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg were covered by the cartel. It urged customers of the companies involved in the agreement to renegotiate their contracts, and said they might have the right to sue for damages."

USA Today/AP (2/22, Brand) reports, "George David, chairman and chief executive of United Technologies, said in a statement that company officials are 'disappointed by the conduct revealed through the Commission's and UTC's own investigations.' … 'UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind,' he said. 'The nine local Otis employees who violated our code of ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide.'" The AP adds, "Otis and United Technologies disclosed the investigation in 2004 and have cooperated with the European Commission, David said. Otis and UTC have received full or partial reductions in penalties for its cooperation and the outcome will have 'no material impact' on UTC's financial condition or Otis' competitive position. … United Technologies is waiting for the full text of the decision and will review it before reporting on its impact on its 2007 earnings guidance. In addition, David said Otis will appeal the decision to a European court."

Bloomberg (2/22, Newman) reports, "Kroes has made fighting cartels a priority for her five- year term. On Jan. 24, she fined Siemens AG, Areva SA and eight other companies that make electricity network gear 750 million euros. The commission fined seven cartels a total of 1.84 billion euros last year, an annual record. … 'oday we see the commission really going forward and really emphasizing its commitment not only to penalizing participants in cartels but also sending a very clear deterrent message to companies that might be tempted to get involved in those types of activities,' John Pheasant, a partner at Hogan & Hartson LLP, said in an interview. … The commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, said the companies set prices in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004. The companies rigged contract bids, allocated projects to each other and shared confidential information, the regulator said."

AFP (2/22) reports, "The US parent company of elevator maker Otis said Wednesday it would appeal against a record EU antitrust fine imposed against a lift cartel." AFP adds, "United Technologies Corp. (UTC) said it had 'cooperated fully' with the European Union's executive commission during the investigation into the market-rigging cartel. … 'Otis will appeal the commission's decision to the European Court of the First Instance,' a UTC statement said."

US Revokes Genetech Patent. The New York Times (2/22, Pollack) reports, "The Patent and Trademark Office has decided to revoke a fundamental patent held by Genentech, the biotechnology company, that was at the center of a recent Supreme Court decision." The Times continues, "The patent office's decision could cost Genentech hundreds of millions of dollars in royalties over the next decade but would save a like amount for rivals that are paying the royalties, including MedImmune, Abbott Laboratories, Johnson & Johnson and ImClone Systems. … In a statement yesterday, Genentech said it would appeal the decision through the patent office and, if necessary, the courts. The company said the patent would remain 'valid and enforceable' through the appeals process." The Times adds, "The decision is the latest in a long controversy, and even mystery, surrounding the patent. The patent was awarded in 2001 even though the inventions on which it was based were made in the early 1980s. If not revoked, the patent, often called the Cabilly II patent after the lead inventor, Shmuel Cabilly, would expire in 2018. … Last month the Supreme Court ruled that MedImmune could challenge the patent even though it had licensed the rights to use it. Lawyers said the decision would have a big impact on how patent licensing deals are structured. … The patent covers techniques for making monoclonal antibodies, which are the basis for many of the biggest selling products made by the biotechnology industry. Genentech shares revenue from the patent with its research partner at the time, the City of Hope, a medical center in Duarte, Calif."

EU OKs Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Stations. AFP (2/22) reports, "EU antitrust regulators gave their approval on Wednesday to Russian energy group Lukoil's plans to buy the filling stations of US oil giant ConocoPhillips in seven European countries." AFP continues, "After probing the deal for its impact on competition, the European Commission said that it had 'ound that the proposed transaction would not impede effective competition'in Europe." AFP adds, "Under the deal, the Russian oil and gas group is buying 400 filling stations from ConocoPhillips in Belgium, the Czech Republic, Finland, Luxembourg, Poland, Hungary and Slovakia. … The two companies have been close partners since ConocoPhillips bought 7.59 percent of Lukoil in 2004. The US company has since increased its stake to 20 percent."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Japan Tobacco's Bid For Gallaher. The AP (2/22) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators on Wednesday cleared Japan Tobacco Inc.'s proposed $14.7 billion purchase of British cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC, saying the deal did not pose competition problems on the European market." The AP continues, "Japan Tobacco, the world's third biggest cigarette company wants to buy Gallaher to give the maker of the Mild Seven brand a bigger share in the European market." The AP adds, "The European Commission said the deal showed overlaps between the two companies 'are generally limited,' with the brands of the two positioned in different market areas. 'Moreover, for all products concerned, the new entity would continue to face several strong, effective competitors with significant market shares,' the commission said in a statement. … The deal would reportedly be the biggest Japanese overseas acquisition. Gallaher, which employs 12,000 people worldwide, dates back to 1857, when Tom Gallaher started a business making Irish roll tobacco in Londonderry, Northern Ireland. Its cigarette brands in Europe include Benson & Hedges, Silk Cut and Sovereign."

AFP (2/22) reports, "The deal is expected to leave the JT group holding some 14 percent of the European Union market, with a 39-percent share in Britain and 45 percent in Austria. … EU regulators also found that the merger would not leave the combined company with crushing market share as it would face 'several strong, effective competitors.' … Japan Tobacco sells brands including Mild Seven, Camel and Winston in about 120 countries and the takeover will give it extra muscle to take on world number one Philip Morris Cos. Inc. of the United States."

Union Questions Steel Mill Sale Order. The AP (2/22, Dishneau) reports, "The United Steelworkers union and Maryland's economic development chief say they disagree with a federal order that global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's planned acquisition of Arcelor SA." The AP continues, "While ordering the sale of the Maryland plant, the consent decree proposed Tuesday by Justice Department would allow Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, which is used primarily for food and aerosol cans." The AP adds, "The United Steelworkers, which represents the mill's 2,106 production workers, said it will seek a reversal of the decision because selling Sparrows Point won't necessarily help workers or the company. … 'It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future,' said David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee. … The Justice Department said Sparrow Point's profitability and port access would help make it a viable competitor. In contrast, the Weirton mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, according to the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers there."

Mittal Says Mill Sale Is Necessary. The Baltimore Sun (2/22, Connolly) reports, "After a day of silence, Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it was disappointed by the Justice Department's decision requiring it to divest its Sparrows Point steel mill to resolve antitrust concerns over tin plate production in the wake of its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA." The Sun continues, "During a previously scheduled conference call with analysts yesterday to discuss fourth-quarter and year-end earnings, Mittal Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company had no choice but to comply with the order even though it preferred to sell its plant in Weirton, W.Va. … A tentative deal to sell Weirton to Chicago-based Esmark Inc. is off the table, Mittal said, because of the Justice Department's decision. … 'We sympathize with everyone in Maryland because we feel the same disappointment,' Mittal said." The Sun adds, "The company has 90 days from Tuesday's ruling to sell Sparrows Point, but is eligible for a 60-day extension. … Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard said his company, which recently won control of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. in Wheeling, W.Va., has not heard from Mittal even though it has signaled its desire to buy Weirton and possibly Sparrows Point. … In yesterday's conference call, Aditya Mittal said the company wants to 'improve profitability' at Weirton. … However, he said tin plate production, while profitable, will likely face some restructuring in the near future because there is excess capacity."

House Judiciary Committee Plans Hearing With Sirius Executive. CNET News (2/22, Broache) reports, "A proposed merger between XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio has only been officially public for a few days, but it's already stirring questions on Capitol Hill." CNET continues, "On February 28, the U.S. House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction over antitrust laws, plans to hold a hearing to examine potential ramifications of uniting the nation's only two satellite radio operators, a deal estimated at $5 billion. Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin is the only confirmed participant so far. … 'We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry,' Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the committee chairman, said in a statement. 'Our members will explore how to define this new marketplace, and whether this merger will lead to increased choices and lower prices for consumers.' … Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), the committee's co-chairman, said the panel plans to pay close attention to 'whether satellite radio competes against terrestrial radio, the Internet, or other emerging technologies'--a consideration that is key to making an antitrust analysis. … It is ultimately up to the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to decide whether the deal merits approval. One of the questions that has been raised is whether such a merger it would amount, as critics say, to a 'monopoly merger.'"

Verizon, Vonage Patent Dispute Heads To Trial. . The Wall Street Journal (2/22, B4, Fam) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc.'s patent-infringement suit against Vonage Holding Corp. opened in federal court, potentially adding to the troubles of the largest Internet telephone start-up." The Journal continues, "The case is closely watched by the nascent Web-calling industry, with some experts saying that a ruling against Vonage could encourage more patent suits in the telecom world." The Journal adds, "Verizon is accusing Vonage of infringing five patents, some related to features such as call forwarding, fraud detection and other technologies. Vonage denies the accusations and argues that the actual goal of the Verizon suit is to eliminate the Internet company, a growing competitor to Verizon's landline phone business. … 'We are firm in our belief that we have not infringed on their patents,' said Brooke Schulz, a Vonage spokeswoman. 'This case is about one thing and one thing only and that's about Verizon's attempts to stifle competition.'" The Journal notes, "Officials at Verizon have said the company is motivated by a straightforward desire to protect its intellectual property. The phone company filed the suit in June in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, a month after Vonage's initial public offering in May. … Pretrial talks between the two competitors failed to result in a settlement. In court yesterday , the judge selected a jury and attorneys delivered opening statements for both sides."

Apple, Cisco Settle Differences Over iPhone Name. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, B4, Wingfield) reports, "Apple Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. agreed to resolve a trademark dispute over the term iPhone that had threatened to put a damper on the introduction of Apple's most eagerly anticipated electronics product in years." The Journal continues, "Under their agreement, Cisco, of San Jose, Calif., and Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., are free to use the iPhone trademark on their respective products throughout the world. Cisco will drop a lawsuit it filed against Apple in federal court in San Francisco, accusing Apple of infringing on a Cisco trademark with a forthcoming cellphone called the iPhone, due out in June." The Journal adds, "In a joint statement, Apple and Cisco said they will explore opportunities for making their products work better together "in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications." The companies said other terms of the settlement are confidential, declining to comment further. … By reaching a deal, the two Silicon Valley icons head off a battle that potentially could have dragged on for years, and possibly led to an injunction to block Apple's use of the iPhone name."

The New York Times (2/22, Stone) reports, "Wednesday night, in a short, ambiguously worded statement, the companies said they would dismiss all legal action against each other regarding the trademark and that Apple could use the name for its device, which it plans to start selling in June. … In addition, the companies said they would explore ways to make their identically named iPhone products work together 'in the areas of security and consumer and enterprise communication.'" The Times adds, "Representatives for Apple and Cisco said other terms of the deal would remain confidential. It is not known if Apple made a cash payment to Cisco, but intellectual property lawyers say some sort of payment is typical in these cases. It is also unclear whether Cisco had sold Apple the name iPhone outright and had then secured permission to use it itself. … But the deal appears to give a partial victory to both sides. Apple can begin selling its phone with the name that its strong-willed chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, seemed to prefer. … Cisco can also continue to use the name, and with the promise of interoperability, it might have some of the hype and magic surrounding Apple's products rub off on its own less prominent offerings."

USA Today (2/22, Kessler) reports, "Apple and Cisco Systems ended their feud over the iPhone name late Wednesday — and Apple appears to have won, tech analysts said." USA continues, "The two Silicon Valley tech giants said they agreed to share rights to the name and end their legal battle over it. … Cisco — the longtime owner of the name — had earlier said it would share it with Apple as long as the electronics-maker made its iPhone compatible with other companies' products. The settlement addressed that concern, with the two companies pledging to "explore opportunities for interoperability in the areas of security, and consumer and (business) communications." … Other terms were confidential." USA adds, "Since the full deal was not made public, it's hard to say for sure which company came out on top, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. But it sure looks like a 'face-saving' agreement for Cisco, he says. … 'It looks like Cisco caved,' says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. The pledge of interoperability talks 'looks like the typical promise that (Apple CEO) Steve Jobs has no intention of keeping,' he says." USA notes, "The controversy over the iPhone name began last year, when Apple was developing a feature-packed cellphone. Long before it had an official name, Apple fans dubbed it the iPhone. That's because many Apple products begin with an 'I', including the iPod music player and iTunes music store. … But there was a problem: Cisco, the world's largest network equipment maker, owned the iPhone trademark. It had originally been registered in 1996 by InfoGear, a networking company later acquired by Cisco. After the deal, Cisco adopted the name and introduced a line of iPhones, which it still sells today."

Justices Consider Patent Case. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A4, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "The Supreme Court, in the latest in a series of cases revisiting the application of patent protections in the high-tech era, heard arguments over where software fits within intellectual-property law." AT&T Inc. "holds a patent for voice-compression technology that makes it easier to transmit and store speech on personal computers and other devices. Microsoft Corp. concedes installing the technology on US-built computers would infringe the patent. But it says it isn't a violation to ship a master disk of the software overseas, where it duplicates the software for installation on computers assembled in Germany, Belgium and other countries." Microsoft "argues the 'component' is a physical disk containing the software, and it is free to duplicate it overseas, much as it could duplicate any other patented device overseas. AT&T contends the software itself is the component, regardless of the medium." Lower courts "have agreed with AT&T." The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Barnes, Sipress, 690K) among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Nine States Sue US Over Mercury Emissions. The AP (2/22, Flesher) reports from Traverse City, MI, "Michigan and eight other states sued the Bush administration Tuesday, saying the White House failed to adequately regulate emissions of mercury and other pollutants at cement plants." The AP continues, "The states contend a rule issued by the Environmental Protection Agency in December does not comply with the federal Clean Air Act." The AP adds, "Mercury comes from raw materials used to make cement - such as limestone, clay, sand and iron ore - and from fuels such as coal, which fires the kilns where the ingredients are baked at high temperatures. … In December, the EPA announced new limits on mercury and hydrocarbon emissions from cement kilns built after Dec. 2, 2005. … But for kilns built earlier, the agency imposes lesser requirements such as operating kilns properly to ensure complete combustion and removing kiln dust when it can no longer be recycled." The AP notes, "Critics say the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to limit mercury from all kilns, not just new ones. … The lawsuit was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, where several environmental groups filed a separate action last week. The other eight states are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania."

Study Says Southwest Droughts, Water Shortages Likely To Worsen. The New York Times (2/22, Dean, 1.16M) reports, "The Colorado River Basin is more prone to drought than had been thought, a panel of experts reported yesterday, and as the climate warms and the population in the region grows, pressure on water supplies will become greater." The "panel recommended an 'action-oriented' study of water use patterns and demands, including drought planning, population projections and possible effects of transferring water to urban areas from agriculture, still the dominant consumer." The Times adds, "Global warming is already making things worse, the experts said."

USA Today (2/22, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Rising population 'will inevitably result in increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices' in sharing the Southwest's most precious natural resource, the report says." The "report says climate reconstructions using tree-ring data and projections with computer models show extended droughts were common in the past and will be longer, more severe and more frequent in the future."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Boxall, 850K) reports, "Global warming will worsen drought and reduce flows on the Colorado River, a key water source for several western states, according to" the report. The "study, prepared by a National Research Council committee, paints a sobering picture as the water needs of a rapidly expanding population test the limits of a river system strained by the effects of climate change." The Times adds, "Such measures as conservation, desalination and water recycling would be helpful, the [study's] authors said, but wouldn't offer a panacea."

Scientists Fear Release Of Carbon From Northern Forests Could Set Off Vicious Cycle. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/22, A1, Struck, 690K) reports, "Nearly half of the carbon that exists on land is contained in the sweeping boreal forests, which gird the Earth in the northern reaches of Canada, Alaska, Scandinavia and Russia. Scientists now fear that the steady rise in the temperature of the atmosphere and the increasing human activity in those lands are releasing that carbon, a process that could trigger a vicious cycle of even more warming." Rising temperatures "could free vast stores of carbon and methane that have been collecting since the last ice age in the frozen tundra and northern forests. Their release would push the world's climate toward a heat spiral that would raise ocean levels, spawn fierce storms and scorch farmlands, scientists believe." But the land "could also be enlisted to help abate global warming, as both a storehouse for man-made carbon dioxide and a natural sponge for greenhouse gases. Policymakers are considering changes to protect and expand the forested areas that store carbon; outside the boreal forest, they are experimenting with techniques to bury man-made carbon dioxide in underground vaults and porous seams."

Group Sues US Over Medical Marijuana Policy. The New York Times (2/22, Marshall) reports, "Frustrated by government policy and inaction, a group of advocates for medical marijuana sued two federal health agencies on Wednesday over the assertion that smoking it has no medical benefit." The Times continues, "The group, Americans for Safe Access, a nonprofit organization based in Oakland, filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court, challenging the government's position that marijuana, 'has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States.'" The Times adds, "In its lawsuit, the group contends that federal regulators have publicly issued 'false and misleading statements' about the medical benefits of marijuana. … The lawsuit, which named the Department of Health and Human Services and the Food and Drug Administration, seeks a court order to retract and correct statements that the group called, 'incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws.' … A lawyer for the medical marijuana group, Joseph Elford, said the lawsuit was filed now because administrative avenues had been exhausted and because of mounting scientific and anecdotal evidence to the contrary."

The AP (2/22, Leff) reports, "Armed with a new study that shows smoking marijuana eased pain in some HIV patients, medical marijuana advocates sued the U.S. government Wednesday over its claim that the drug has no accepted medical benefits." The AP continues, "The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court by Americans for Safe Access accuses the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services of engaging in 'arbitrary and unlawful behavior' that prevents 'sick and dying persons from seeking to obtain medicine that could provide them needed, and often lifesaving relief.'" The AP adds, "The group wants a judge to force the department and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to stop giving out information that casts doubt on the efficacy of marijuana in treating various illnesses. … 'The FDA position on medical cannabis is incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws requiring the government to base policy on sound science,' Joe Elford, chief counsel for the group, said in a statement. … California is one of 11 states where marijuana use is legal for people with a doctor's recommendation, but because the U.S. government does not recognize the drug's medical benefits, patients can still be arrested and prosecuted by federal authorities."

The San Mateo County Times (2/21) reported the lawsuit "comes a week after the release of a controlled, clinical University of California, San Francisco study showing HIV patients who smoked marijuana found relief from chronic foot pain."

Medical Marijuana ID Card Fee To Nearly Quadruple In California. The San Mateo (CA) Daily Journal (2/22) reports state fee increases "due to a shortfall of clients for California's medical marijuana identification cards is trickling down to local programs, including San Mateo County which plans to nearly quadruple the cost by next month. At its meeting Feb. 27, the Board of Supervisors plan to increase fees from $45 to $174. Medi-Cal beneficiaries will still receive a 50 percent discount. … The change is effective March 1 but participants will only feel the pinch as their cards expire annually. The ID program must be funded entirely by fees rather than taxpayer dollars at both the state and county level."

Researchers Say Long-term Marijuana Use May Cause Respiratory Problems. HealthDay News (2/22) reports people who "smoke marijuana for a long time face many of the same kinds of respiratory problems - such as phlegm, coughing and wheezing - as long-term cigarette smokers, say researchers at the Yale School of Medicine. They reviewed previous studies from 1966 to 2005 that examined the association between marijuana and pulmonary function and respiratory complications. Some of the studies found a link between short-term marijuana use and relaxation and opening of the air passages. However, other studies identified an association between long-term marijuana use and increased risk of respiratory symptoms, suggestive of obstructive lung disease."

Marijuana Use Linked To Impaired Memory. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/21, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Marijuana is the most commonly used illegal drug in this country. But in ten states, it's legal for medical purposes. Political maneuvering has intensified the debate over medical marijuana and the growing evidence about its detrimental and dangerous effects. … Proponents of medical marijuana point to its pain-relieving qualities. And a recently-published study with HIV patients with the University of California San Francisco found benefits. But researchers at Brookhaven National laboratory have been conducting research on a different topic: the impact of long-term marijuana use and dependency on the brain." Reporter: "Impaired memory and feelings of anxiety are more than just jokes, they are reality. So too are frequent respiratory infections and concern that the cancer risk of marijuana users is higher, which is why the American cancer society does not endorse smoking marijuana nor its legalization."

NBC Highlights Illegal Internet Drug Sales. NBC News (2/21) reports online that "buying prescription drugs over the Internet has become standard operating procedure for many Americans who used to visit the neighborhood pharmacy. And while many Internet pharmacies are 100-percent legitimate, hundreds of others are not and are seen by law enforcement as a dangerous problem." NBC's Mark Potter "was on a raid of one of these alleged pill mills." NBC adds, "At a drug store near Tampa, agents and investigators from the Drug Enforcement Agency swoop in to suspend the license of an Internet pharmacy for allegedly selling painkillers over the Web illegally. In this case, boxes and boxes of hydrocodone. 'This is probably destined for a customer who's ordered it online somewhere across the country,' says DEA Investigator Chris Grush."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 10, 2:30, Williams) aired, "Authorities say thousands of Web sites and hundreds of illegal pharmacies have sprung up nationwide, cutting corners on medical exams, charging 6 to 10 times the normal price for prescription drugs that are widely abused." Mark Trouville, DEA: "They're hiding behind the profession, they're hiding behind their education and out to make money." NBC added, "The big concern is that many online pharmacies use doctors to write prescriptions for dangerous and addictive drugs, for people they've never met. Federal agents say it is not uncommon for Internet buyers to simply fill out a brief medical questionnaire."

Authorities Say Colombian Woman Is Highest Ranking FARC Member Convicted In US. The Washington Times (2/22, Seper) reports a "high-ranking female member of a left-wing Colombian terrorist organization has been convicted with two others in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on drug charges." Nayibe Rojas Valderama, "was convicted, along with co-defendants Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo, on charges of conspiring to import cocaine into the United States and conspiring to manufacture and distribute cocaine -- knowing it would be unlawfully imported into the United States." Valderama "has been identified by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as the finance officer of the 14th Front of FARC and is the highest-ranking member of the group to be convicted in the United States. … 'The FARC is a double evil -- they poison the blood of our people with their drugs and spill the blood of their own with guns and machetes bought with drug profits,' U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration boss Karen P. Tandy said."

In its "Nation in Brief" section, the Washington Post (2/21, A4) reported prosecutors "cast Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a gun-toting senior FARC official who gathered coca base from farmers and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent more than five tons of cocaine to the United States."

IMMIGRATION:

Kennedy Set To Introduce Immigration Reform Bill. The Washington Times (2/22, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senators and lobbyists are putting the final touches on a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes an easier citizenship path for illegal aliens and weaker enforcement provisions than were in the highly criticized legislation that the Senate approved last year." Sen. Edward Kennedy "will introduce the bill as early as next week, according to Senate sources knowledgeable about the negotiations. If the Senate Judiciary Committee can make quick work of the bill, it could be ready for floor action in April." Kennedy "drafted this year's bill with help from Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and outside lobbyists. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0135404

McCain and the outside groups share Mr. Kennedy's support for increased immigration and leniency for illegals already in the country." Among the "most active participants have been the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition (EWIC) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce."

Arizona Sees Shortage Of Farm Workers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Bowers, 59K) reports, "Empty stations on the harvest lines are more common this year throughout this swath of Arizona farm country, says" Rick Rademacher, "who serves as president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association. The reasons are many: A 40,000-person limit on the number of foreign guest workers allowed into the US, tighter borders that are discouraging illegal crossings, and rising demand for day laborers in other industries, such as higher-paying construction work." The shortage "of farm workers has been driving wages higher. Last season, base pay for day laborers working in this area was $6.50 an hour. Now it's $8.50. Rademacher says it may go higher because farmers here can't attract enough employees." Rademacher would "like to see an expanded guest-worker program to ease the labor crunch here, just five miles from the border. It would ensure that he can get his crop in – and sell it to supermarkets at a price that is competitive with prices of vegetables from overseas."

Advocacy Groups Criticize Conditions At Family Detention Centers. The New York Times (2/22, Swarns, 1.16M) reports a pair of advocacy groups, the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Services, are expected to release a report Thursday criticizing the "prisonlike housing" at detention centers used by the Bush administration to hold immigrant families. "The Department of Homeland Security, which allowed the advocacy groups to visit the two detention centers that house immigrant families, has already corrected several problems identified by the groups." Officials at the agency, "who said they were still reviewing the report, vigorously defended the quality of services provided by" the T. Don Hutto Residential Center and the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, with spokesman Marc Raimondi saying that both "adhere to the highest standards."

The Washington Post (2/22, A3, Moreno, 690K) reports Mustafa Elmi, a 3-year-old living at Hutto, "had to report to his cell three times for headcount" on his birthday. "To be able to get one hour of recreation inside a concrete compound sealed off by metal gates and razor wire he had to pin his picture ID to his uniform." Though "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) routinely separated parents from their children upon apprehension by the Border Patrol" before Hutto was opened last May, the advocacy groups "have termed the facility 'a penal detention model that is fundamentally anti-family and anti-American.'" Their report "lauded the goal of keeping families together but urged DHS to close the Hutto facility, saying that 'prison-like institutions' are not appropriate for families. … In response, ICE spokesman Marc Raimondi said that the Hutto and Berks facilities 'maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare' of the detainees."

McClatchy (2/22, Mondics) reports Berks was found to have "the more humane conditions, but even there detainees reported harassment by staff including the threat of separating parents from their children, the report said. 'Every woman we talked to in the facilities cried,' said Michelle Brane, one of the authors of the report, prepared by the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service and the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children."

Immigration Raids Raise Concerns Among Advocate Groups. The AP (2/22, Barbassa) reports, "Fear has gripped immigrant families across the United States as federal agents raid neighborhoods, work sites and jails in a nationwide crackdown on illegal immigration." The AP continues, "Tens of thousands of people have been rounded up over the past several months, and many more are afraid to leave home, answer a knock on the door or leave their children alone in fear they might be next. Churches and community groups are stepping in with legal advice and financial aid for families split up or left without an income because of the sweeps. … From California to Connecticut, federal officials have launched a full-scale offensive to find and deport illegal immigrants. It's part of a two-pronged approach, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement: secure the nation's borders while stepping up enforcement within." The AP adds, "Groups supporting a reduction in immigration have praised the shift toward more aggressive enforcement. 'Enforcement actions like these play an enormous role in deterrence,' said Steven Camarota, of the conservative think tank Center for Immigration Studies. … But many immigrants and their advocates say it's splitting families and hurting the legal relatives of immigrants who crossed the border illegally, as well as their co-workers, employers and the businesses that serve them."

TAX:

Brother Of Alleged Chicago Mobster Gets Probation For Tax Fraud. The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Gibson, 617K) reports, "The brother of reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo was sentenced Wednesday to 60 months' probation for conspiracy in a tax fraud scheme centered at a strip club in Las Vegas. Sixteen individuals, including Lombardo's brother Rocco, have pleaded guilty to the conspiracy scheme for underreporting cash they received while working at the Crazy Horse Too strip club. The case stems from a lengthy federal investigation of the strip club and owner Ricky Rizzolo." The Tribune notes, "Rizzolo and Rocco Lombardo would dine with Joey Lombardo when Rizzolo came to Chicago on business, court records show. And when Joey Lombardo disappeared, FBI agents went looking for him in Las Vegas."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Promotes Healthcare Plans In Visit To Tennessee. USA Today (2/22, 7A, 2.27M) reports President Bush "flew to Chattanooga, Tenn., on Wednesday to promote his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions and responsibility to individuals. … Under the president's proposal, health insurance benefits would be taxable income, but people would get a standard tax deduction for health insurance: up to $15,000 for family coverage, $7,500 for individual coverage." In Chattanooga, Bush co-hosted a healthcare forum with Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat. The AP (2/22, Feller) says Bush "received a hearty ovation as he described his plan." He "shared a stage with people who hold full-time jobs but can't afford health insurance for their families."

The Chattanoogan (2/21) reported on its website, "Some 500 Chattanoogans, including many of the city's leaders, were in attendance as the President moderated the event aimed at promoting his new policies aimed at making health care more affordable. He was on the podium with selected citizens and business owners -- all of whom said they either could not afford health care coverage or had inadequate coverage."

The Washington Post (2/22, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Democrats in Washington are showing little enthusiasm for the Bush health agenda, but the president is plugging away, insisting he sees hope for compromise before his term ends in less than two years. Indeed, the end seemed on his mind as he bantered with several hundred audience members, arguing for greater transparency in health-care pricing." The Post also reviews Bush's proposed tax-code changes and notes, "Many health economists say they think Bush is overstating the impact of the tax code changes, but they say he might have a bigger bang if he were to give low-income people tax credits to buy insurance, an idea the White House considered and rejected. A study released this week by the Community Research Council of Chattanooga concluded that very few of the uninsured in Hamilton County, which includes Chattanooga and its suburbs, make enough money to benefit under the current Bush plan." The Post also notes, "Even as the president arrived in Tennessee, the local news was full of reports that a change in federal reimbursement policy could cost the state as much as $250 million annually for charity care, countering any relief under the president's new plan."

The New York Times (2/22, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush "held forth for nearly an hour," at the event, where "participants had been carefully selected, the tone was confessional, and the president, describing himself as the 'educator in chief,' sounded more like talk-show host in chief." The Times continues, "The round-table discussion, which followed a similar if less lively event with health insurance executives in Washington on Tuesday, was aimed at pitching the president's proposal to provide tax breaks for low- and moderate-income workers to buy insurance while imposing tax increases on some Americans covered by generous employer-sponsored plans." The Times also notes that Bredesen, who has sponsored an initiative called Cover Tennessee, "said in a phone interview that he was skeptical of the president's tax proposal and had been a bit leery of participating in the event here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Reynolds, 850K) says the President "traded one-liners with a handful of workers and employers, who have had trouble getting health insurance. One of them was an interior designer named Amy Childers, who dropped her health coverage when she turned 35 and the premium was raised to $210 a month. 'Doesn't it make sense to change the tax code so that Amy Childers can better afford health care?' the president asked. Then he joked, 'You don't look a day over 34.' 'Most people say 22,' Childers responded, adding that she would forgive him."

Local TV stations in Tennessee and around the country reported on the President's trip. WVLT-TV Knoxville (2/21, 11:03 pm) reported, "President Bush set his sights on Chattanooga today, promoting his healthcare initiative." The station showed the President saying, "We want there to be price transparency in healthcare. I don't know about you but I don't remember ever asking how much something was going to cost when it came to healthcare." The station added, "President Bush wants Congress to create a tax break to encourage the uninsured to buy health insurance. Opponents argue his plan would give more companies a reason to drop company-provided healthcare." Many other newscasts ran that quote from the President, including WTXL-TV Tallahassee (2/21, 11:15 pm), WBIR-TV Knoxville (2/21, 11:10 pm), WWMT-TV Grand Rapids (2/21, 11:10 pm), WZTV-TV Nashville (2/21, 9:49 pm), WBBJ-TV Jackson, TN (2/21, 6:11 pm), WRCB-TV Chattanooga (2/21, 6:03 pm), and KGTV-TV San Diego (2/21, 5:39 pm).

The AP (2/22) reports that "supporters and protesters" turned out at Bush's events yesterday. The AP says "most carried welcome signs or waved flags on a sunny and unseasonably warm day with temperatures in the mid-60s. Among them were several students from Chattanooga State Technical Community College, who attended in order to earn some credit for a government class." The Chattanoogan (2/22, Frank) runs a similar report.

Democrats Criticize Bush Proposals. As Bush promoted his proposals, congressional Democrats continued to criticize them as insufficient. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Reynolds, 850K) reports Democrats "say the biggest problem facing the system is the 40 million Americans with no health insurance, and they say the president's proposal would help only a small fraction of them become insured. In particular, they point out that the deduction would not help taxpayers who do not itemize their income tax returns, especially poorer paid workers who are the most likely to lack health insurance." Instead, "Democrats favor a tax credit for health care premiums, which would help all taxpayers regardless of their filing status." USA Today (2/22, 7A, 2.27M) notes Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee "that oversees health matters," said yesterday the Bush plan "undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage."

Meanwhile, noting that Bush's plan "has been pronounced dead by leading Democrats on Capitol Hill.," the New York Times (2/22, Stolberg, 1.16M) also says "leading Democrats, including Senator Max Baucus of Montana, chairman of the Finance Committee, and Representative Pete Stark of California, chairman of a subcommittee overseeing health policy, said in interviews that Mr. Bush's plan was far too dependent on the private sector and that they did not envision anything like it becoming law. Mr. Stark called it 'a farcical move' that was 'primarily designed to encourage employers to drop group coverage.' Mr. Baucus said the plan was 'too much focused on the individual market,' though he did give the president credit for 'stirring up the debate' with his tax idea."

The AP (2/22, Feller) reports "key Democratic leaders have denounced Bush's plan," while Market Watch (2/21, Watts) notes "top Senate Democrats on Wednesday charged that…Bush's proposal to change how the tax code treats employer-provided health benefits would do little to help the uninsured."

Army Rushes To Correct Poor Living Conditions At Walter Reed Hospital. ABC World News (2/21, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Many of the wounded being brought home from Iraq, have passed through the Army's Walter Reed Medical Center in Washington. The medical care there has been much praised. But a Washington newspaper investigation has reported that part of the facility itself is ailing. And the Army has been quick to acknowledge that that is, indeed, the case." ABC (Kerly) added, "Just across the street from Walter Reed hospital, this is what greets wounded soldiers. Mold, holes in walls, rats and insect infestation. Building 18 is home for those, who among other things, have lost limbs or suffered brain injuries. And now, a huge embarrassment for the Army." Gen Richard Cody, Army Vice Chief of Staff: "The senior Army leadership takes full responsibility for the lack of quality of life at Building 18. And we're going to fix it." Kerly: "But the Army didn't even know about the problems, until 'The Washington Post' printed the stunning results of a four-month investigation. But it's not just problems with the rooms in this building. 'The Post' investigation found that many of the wounded soldiers here are not getting the services they need. Soldiers face a bureaucratic nightmare and a shortage of trained staff." Rep. Tom Davis (R): "These people gave their lives, their limbs for this country. And they come back here and we treat them very shabbily. And it shouldn't happen."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 4, 2:00, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "As the fallout continued over the shocking conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center's decrepit Building 18 today, top Army officials were front and center. At the Pentagon…" Gen Richard Cody: "I'm the Vice Chief of Staff for the Army. I'll take responsibility for this and make sure it is fixed." Yang: "And at Walter Reed." Major General George Weightman: "It is a leadership problem, but I would say it is my issue as the commander of this organization to take responsibility for that." Yang: "Walter Reed's commanding general said building managers relied too much on soldiers' complaints about conditions, rather than making spot inspection, a system veterans call unacceptable." Officials "blame the problems here at Building 18 on being overwhelmed. Not just by the sheer number of wounded coming here, but by the fact more are staying longer. That is because the military is making an effort to let more of the wounded continue to serve in uniform rather than quickly discharging them."

The Washington Post (2/22, A6, Tyson, 690K) reports Gen. Cody "vowed yesterday to personally oversee the upgrading of Walter Reed Army Medical Center's Building 18, a dilapidated former hotel that houses wounded soldiers as outpatients." The Army Vice Chief of Staff "used terminology similar to that of a military campaign to describe his plan to overhaul the broken building, including giving it a more 'appropriate' name, and the sluggish bureaucracy for outpatient care." Cody "blamed 'a breakdown in leadership' for the troubling conditions but said no one has been fired or relieved of command. He did point to lower-ranking officers and noncommissioned officers lacking 'the right experience and the authority to be able to execute some of the missions.'" Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), "the top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, blasted the Army yesterday, saying in a statement that it has known for years about shortcomings at Walter Reed."

The Hill (2/21, Tiron) reports, "Several lawmakers are taking action to improve the conditions and care for veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) "are sponsoring legislation to improve the lives of recovering veterans at Walter Reed, while Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), a cosponsor of the Obama-McCaskill legislation, said that he would explore ways to direct new funds to Walter Reed and make immediate improvements to its veteran housing." Meanwhile, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) "wrote a letter yesterday to Secretary of Defense Robert Gates demanding information on the current state of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities."

Congressional Quarterly (2/21, Yoest) reports, "Senate Veterans Affairs Chairman Daniel K. Akaka, D-Hawaii, said he would hold a hearing on the issue next month, since many of the soldiers housed at Walter Reed will soon become veterans." Akaka said, "I will purse the situation at Walter Reed and other military treatment facilities that are handling the bulk of returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans to ensure that the government is helping those who have been injured in service to our country, and their families." Democratic Sens. Patty Murray of Washington and Barbara Mikulski of Maryland "sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates calling for an inspector general's investigation into outpatient care and the availability of psychological counseling for soldiers and their families."

AARP Backs Effort To Reform Social Security. The Politico (2/22, Patch) reports AARP officials "said Wednesday they will push hard to revamp Social Security to maintain the social insurance program's solvency and fiscal health." CEO Bill Novelli, legislative policy director David Certner and John Rother, executive officer for policy and strategy said "changes need to be made in the program to head off rising health care costs and declining financial security, especially among baby boomers." Novelli said, "The next generation could be the first in American history that is less well off than their parents." Though Social Security "is often deemed a 'third rail' of American politics for its sensitivity, the program can and should be reformed, Novelli said." The Politico adds that AARP "released a poll showing a consensus for reform in some of the key areas of Social Security." Of eight "possible options, a majority of respondents favored three measures that would raise revenue for Social Security in some fashion: increasing the income cap to $150,000; increasing the payroll tax by 0.5 percent for both workers and employers, and changing the benefit formula to make the program more progressive."

Female Members Criticize Baca's Leadership Of Hispanic Caucus. The Washington Post (2/22, A17, Layton, 690K) reports that the "congressional recess has provided a timeout for feuding members of the Hispanic Caucus," and Chairman Joe Baca "is trying to hold together the group of 20 Democrats and smooth over multiple rifts." But several female members of the "mostly male caucus say Baca himself is a source of problems, and one, Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), resigned last month in protest. There were six female members and 15 male members before Sanchez quit. … At a closed meeting last week designed to mend fences, Sanchez made an appearance and, along with several other women, aired grievances, said sources familiar with the caucus's workings. The women said their requests of the caucus staff are not taken seriously, among other things."

Snow, Correspondents Meet For Friendly National Press Club Forum. The Washington Post (2/22, A2, Milbank, 690K) writes about what CBS's Bob Schieffer called a "man bites dog" story at the National Press Club Tuesday night, when six White House correspondents" had agreed to submit to questioning" by White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, "who usually is at the receiving end of such grillings. But Snow wouldn't bite. 'For those of you who are expecting theatrical savagery on my part, forget about it,' Snow advised the crowd of 250 and a live C-SPAN audience. … Snow argued that reporters are not the jackals that the public supposes them to be. The reporters reciprocated with warm tales about covering the Bush White House; one spoke about the perk of seeing Snow's bare knees. 'If there is a flash of tempers between me and Tony, it's not about him and me, it's nothing personal,'" said NBC's David Gregory, "whose televised clashes with Snow have become legend. Snow grinned. 'What you see quite often at the briefings are sharp exchanges, but David's right: It's not personal,' the press secretary agreed. 'I not only like but admire everybody else sitting up here on this podium. It is a real pleasure and a privilege to work with them, to get to know them. … It is a wondrous thing." The Politico (2/22, Allen) also runs a story on the event.

District Of Columbia House Vote Bill "Cruising Along." The Washington Post (2/22, A17, Romano, 690K) writes, "It can't be easy being in Congress without a vote," but District of Columbia Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, "has stuck it out for 16 long years, never truly a part of the club but always relentlessly knocking on the door seeking admittance. Now, Norton is sure, success is in her sights. With Democratic leaders pledging to get it done and ample Republican support, the bill giving both the District of Columbia and Utah an additional voting seat is cruising along. 'Won't we be surprised if it doesn't happen -- but I tell you, it's in the stars,' Norton said yesterday." The bill "must clear two committees before it is brought for a floor vote. Norton is hoping that will happen in March." A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Pelosi "is committed to finalizing the bill's language, moving it through committees and having a floor vote as soon as possible."

Cheney Says McCain Wrong On Rumsfeld. The AP (2/22, Sidoti) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "on Wednesday challenged GOP presidential hopeful John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld was one of the country's worst defense secretaries." Cheney said, "John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong." In an interview with ABC News, Cheney "also disclosed that the Arizona senator had apologized to him for a previous comment that the vice president had 'badly served' President Bush on Iraq." Cheney said, "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld." The AP adds that at a campaign event in Los Angeles, McCain "said he stood by his remarks about Rumsfeld. He did not mention the vice president, and his campaign declined to comment on Cheney's remarks."

The Politico (2/22, Allen) reports Cheney "made it clear during an interview with ABC News Wednesday that he was none too pleased with McCain's declaration on Monday at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.: 'I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history.' McCain was greeted with applause."

The Washington Post (2/22, A4, Fletcher, 690K) reports Cheney "objected yesterday to Sen. John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld 'will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history' and added that the senator had apologized to him for saying Cheney had misled President Bush on Iraq."

Documentary Suggests Rumsfeld Policies Led To Abu Ghraib. In the Washington Post (2/22, C1, 690K), Tom Shales reviews the new HBO documentary "Ghosts Of Abu Ghraib," saying it "daringly approaches a scandal that hardly anyone wants to see reexamined -- least of all, one can safely assume, the Bush administration and the Pentagon. The reason is not just that what happened at Abu Ghraib is, to understate in the extreme, unpleasant. The documentary says it's also because this breakdown was not so much nervous as inevitable -- and not so spontaneous, having been sanctioned by the top brass, including former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld." Kennedy "suggests the torture was not an outbreak of lunacy but the direct result of policies handed down by Rumsfeld that were designed to circumvent the Geneva Conventions…and U.N. conventions against torture, to which the United States is, at least technically, a signatory."

Davis Measure Would Extend Health Care Premium Savings Benefit To Retirees. The Washington Post's (2/22, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Since 2000, federal employees have been able to pay their health insurance premiums on a tax-free basis," and many "federal retirees think they should get similar treatment. But extending 'premium conversion,' as it's called, to retirees would require a change in tax law, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and others, who have pushed for that change in the last three congressional sessions, are back at it." The Post quotes Davis who called the change "modest" and said that "to those on fixed income, this could have a real impact," noting that the measure "would result in average savings of $820 a year for federal retirees, he estimated. Under the bill, federal civil service and military retirees would pay their monthly health-care premiums through a pretax deduction from their annuities. The bill also would permit active-duty military personnel to deduct from their taxable income certain supplemental premiums or enrollment fees for Tricare, their military health insurance." The Post notes that in previous efforts to gain approval the "likely cost of the bill appears to" have been "the sticking point. According to a Congressional Budget Office estimate, extending the tax break to federal retirees would cost about $600 million over 10 years."

OTHER NEWS:

Inflation Gauge Rose More Than Expected In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "A widely watched gauge of consumer prices rose last month at the fastest rate since June, interrupting what had been a steadily improving inflation outlook in recent months." The Labor Department "said its index of 'core' consumer prices, which excludes food and energy, rose 0.3% in January, after a string of three consecutive monthly increases of 0.1%. Those modest gains had begun to persuade economists that inflation was decelerating. … Last month's increase in core prices was fueled by unusually sharp price increases for health care, which rose 0.8% from December, and in tobacco and smoking products, which leapt 1.5%." Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen "acknowledged yesterday that core inflation was 'on the high side of expectations.'" But "in a speech to a business group in Santa Clara, Calif., she added: 'This followed three straight months' of low core inflation."

The New York Times (2/22, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "Though inflation growth, as represented by the Consumer Price Index, slowed from December, it advanced faster than economists and Wall Street investors had expected." The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Henderson, 690K) runs a similar story under the headline "Slowing Economy Isn't Cooling Prices."

USA Today (2/22, Hagenbaugh, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports "Brian Bethune of Global Insight says recent indicators show economic growth wasn't as rosy as the Fed estimated at last month's meeting. Still, the bump in the consumer price index means the Fed needs to keep a close eye on inflation. He expects rates to be steady for most of 2007."

The Financial Times (2/22, Callan, Guha) reports, "The Federal Reserve grew more confident that inflation was moderating at its January policy meeting, minutes released on Wednesday revealed, but policymakers still did not see a downward trend in core inflation as 'definitely established.'" The minutes "show that all members of the Federal Open Market Committee agreed that the predominent risk remained inflation rather than growth."

Central Bankers Confident In World Economy. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Hayashi, Perry, Ip, 2.04M) reports, "The Bank of Japan's move to raise interest rates for the first time since July underscores the surprisingly upbeat state of the world's major economies, which continue to perk along despite the damage done by high energy prices and sagging housing markets. The world's central bankers are so confident that growth will remain steady and inflation under control that their main worry is less the immediate future than whether conditions are breeding excessive speculation in financial markets." Although "the U.S. economy has slowed substantially from its torrid pace of a year ago, it has kept growing fast enough to keep unemployment down despite the housing slump. In the 13 countries that use the euro, growth is expected to abate from last year's six-year high but remain well above the sluggish pace of prior years."

Stocks Mixed. NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 7, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, a mixed finish at the end of the day. The Dow was down more than 48 points [to close at 12,738.41]. NASDAQ gained over five points on the day's trading [to close at 2518.42.]" The Wall Street Journal (2/22, C1, McKay, Karmin, 2.04M) says "the stock market reacted with little more than a shrug -- with the Dow down and the Nasdaq up -- as crude oil topped $60 a barrel for the first time this year and investors fretted about monetary policy in the U.S. and Japan."

McCain Criticizes Bush On Global Warming, Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Finnegan, 850K) reports McCain "was anything but subtle Wednesday as he took swipes at the Bush administration during a meticulously staged appearance with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on the bustling docks of Los Angeles Harbor. President Bush's record on global warming? 'Terrible,' McCain declared. His pursuit of the Iraq war? 'A train wreck.'" If the "point of the Arizona senator's visit was to put distance between himself and his party's unpopular president, McCain was following a pattern set by Schwarzenegger last year in his re-election campaign. For McCain, the task is especially important, because his vocal support for Bush's recent troop buildup in Iraq threatens a voter backlash." In what "was billed as a nonpolitical event to call for tougher federal action to stop global warming, McCain joined Schwarzenegger for a hazy-morning helicopter tour of the Long Beach and Los Angeles ports. The Republican duo flew over the future site of a hydrogen power plant that would pump carbon dioxide into the ground instead of the air." On the San Pedro docks, Schwarzenegger "offered McCain access to his usual retinue of trailing television crews, and McCain used the opportunity to pound Bush on a number of fronts."

Schwarzenegger Extols McCain At Los Angeles Event. The AP (2/22, Blood) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "offered his most lavish praise yet Wednesday for any 2008 presidential candidate, calling John McCain a 'great senator' and 'very good friend' who shared his views on critical issues like the environment." Schwarzenegger "stopped short of a formal declaration of support for McCain's budding candidacy, but their appearance together in the Port of Los Angeles was a strong reminder that the two maverick Republicans share a well-developed friendship." McCain "joked that he was endorsed by Schwarzenegger. Then Schwarzenegger said their joint appearance wasn't about politics." McCain said, "We share common philosophy and goals for this country."
